Detraction tends to reduce the best men to a level with the worst, and thus to bring worth itself into disrepute. It tends to chill the ardour of doing good, and to produce a general belief that all the virtue which exists among men, is imaginary and counterfeit. It involves in itself a high degree of depravity, and is connected with the violation of every moral tie. Is it not adverse to justice? Is it not incompatible with charity? Is it not a plain dereliction of our duty to God? For, is it not principally occupied in lessening the estimation of the good and wise, who are more especially the objects of his favour, and the excellence of his rational creation? Must not the practice, therefore, bring us under the divine displeasure? Is there not in the habit so large a mixture of malevolence, as necessarily implies that we are strangers to the love of God; and, if we will persist in so hateful a practice, can we hope to escape that place of torment, in which there are weeping and gnashing of teeth? Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 352, 367; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii. p. 90.

DEVIL, Διάβολος, signifies an accuser, a calumniator. This word seldom occurs in the Old Testament. Sometimes it answers to the Hebrew Belial; and sometimes to Satan. The former signifies a libertine; the latter, an adversary, or an accuser.

That there are wicked and malignant spirits, is undeniably true from Scripture. 'If God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment.' (2 Pet. ii. 4.)—'The angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day.' (Jude 6.) To be cast down to hell, and delivered into chains of darkness, in St. Peter, is the same as to be reserved in perpetual chains under darkness, in St. Jude; and each may signify no more than that they are degraded from their former high and glorious state, and chained, or confined to, a much lower, narrower, and darker situation, without any hope of favour, unto the judgment of the great day, when they, with all workers of iniquity, shall be cast into everlasting fire. (Matt. xxv. 41. Rev. xx. 10. 15.) For any thing, therefore, advanced in these places, those fallen angels may at present reside in our air, and be permitted to wander about on the earth.

It must be observed, that there is an ambiguity in the words Satan and Devil.

The former denotes any adversary among men and good angels, as well as among evil spirits. 'And the angel of the Lord said, Behold, I went out to withstand thee,' for an adversary, a satan. (Numb. xxii. 32.) 'Ye sons of Zeruiah are adversaries,' in the original, satans. (2 Sam. xix. 22.) Peter was Satan, an adversary, to our Lord. (Matt. xvi. 23.) Devil signifies an accuser, slanderer:—'And one of you is a devil;' this is spoken of Judas. (John vi. 70.)

These two words, Satan and Devil, are used in Scripture to signify the same wicked spirit, who, with many others, his angels, or under-agents, is conversant in our world, and endeavours to draw men into sin, and to do us mischief. This is very evident from revelation, as in the case of our first parents; of Job, whose children and substance were destroyed, and his body afflicted with a grievous disorder, by Satan, (Job i. 12, &c.; ii. 6, 7;) and of Christ, who was tempted of the Devil or Satan. (Matt. iv. 1. 3. 10. Mark i. 13. Luke iv. 2.) This temptation, under all its circumstances, cannot be resolved into an allegory; much less can it be supposed to have been transacted within our Saviour's own mind, as if the Devil or Satan was no other than the suggestions, or thoughts, that arose in his own heart. The following texts also cannot be understood of any other than a real Devil or Satan: 'The enemy that sowed the tares is the Devil.' (Matt. xiii. 39.)—'Ye are of your father the Devil.' (John viii. 44.)—'For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.' (2 Cor. xi. 13, 14.)—'That through death he might destroy him that had the power of' subjecting our first parents, and their posterity, to 'death, that is, the Devil.' (Heb. ii. 14.)—'Recover themselves out of the snares of the Devil.' (2 Tim. ii. 26.)—'Resist the Devil, and he will flee from you.' (Jam. iv. 7.) Many other passages of a similar nature might be added.

The characters which the Devil or Satan sustains in Scripture are, the great Dragon, or fierce Devourer, the old Serpent, full of villanous subtilty, (Rev. xii. 9.); the Wicked One, (Matt. xii. 38. 1 John iii. 12.); a Murderer and Liar, (John viii. 44.); 'Ye are of your father the Devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do. He was a murderer from the beginning,' in effecting the death of Adam and his posterity; and thus he may be said to have had the power of death. (Heb. ii. 14.) 'When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar,' as he was to Eve, 'and the father of it.' He is also called the Accuser of the brethren, (Rev. xii. 10.); a roaring Lion, seeking whom he may devour; the Prince of the World, as it is now corrupt and wicked, (John xii. 31.; xiv. 30.; xvi. 11.); the Prince of the Power of the Air, the Spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, the idolatrous heathens. (Ephes. ii. 2.) Here the Devil is represented as a prince, or sovereign, at the head of a kingdom, which stands in opposition to, and is at war with, the kingdom of Christ, who was manifested as his antagonist, that he might destroy the works of the Devil. (1 John iii. 8.)

These vicious spirits, the Devil and his angels, when permitted, are capable of doing any mischief to the estate, body, or mind. (1 Sam. xvi. 14. Job i. 12.; ii. 6, 7. Mark iii. 23, 26. Luke xiii. 16. 1 Cor. v. 5. 1 Tim. i. 20.) Nor is there any absurdity, any thing inconsistent with the divine goodness, in supposing that evil spirits may inflict calamities and disorders on mankind. They are only instruments in God's hands, and under his direction and control, as much as any other cause whatever; and they must, therefore, be subject to the same rules, as any other means which Providence may employ in distressing or destroying human life, as storms, inundations, the passions and powers of wicked men, a putrid air, vitiated humours in the body, &c. In all these cases, whatever is the instrumental, God is the appointing and directing cause.

That which most of all requires our attention is, that the Devil delighteth in seducing mankind; he takes every advantage and employs every art, to effect his wicked purpose. Of this we have a proof in his temptation of our first parents. It was the Devil or Satan, an evil or malignant spirit, which tempted Eve, in the body, or assuming the form and shape, of a Serpent; which then might be a very beautiful as well as sagacious animal, familiar with Adam and Eve, and much admired by them. Dr. Taylor's Scheme of Scripture Divinity, in Bishop Watson's Theo. Tracts, vol. i. p. 49.

DEVOTION, a religious and fervent exercise of some public act of religion, or a temper and disposition of the mind rightly affected with such exercises. A taste and relish for religious exercise are marks by which we may judge whether our heart be right towards God. The Almighty is unquestionably an object of devotion to every creature, whom he has made capable of devotion; and, therefore, our minds can never be right towards him, unless they be in a devotional frame. That devotion to God is a duty, rests on the same proof as that God exists. The author and giver of all things, on whose will and whose mercy we depend for every blessing we possess, and for whatever we look for or expect, ought to live in the thoughts and affections of his rational creatures. 'Through thee,' says the Psalmist, 'have I been holden up ever since I was born: thou art he that took me out of my mother's womb: my praise shall be always of thee.' Devotion is strictly an act of the mind. In a certain sense, duty to a fellow-creature may be discharged if the outward act be performed. But it is not so with devotion, which is altogether an act of the mind. God is a Spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit, that is, in mind and thought. The devotion of the mind may be, and ought to be, testified and accompanied by outward performances and expressions; but unless the mind accompany these outward performances and expressions, no form, no solemnity can avail, as a service to God.

If a devotional frame of mind be within us, it will show itself in our meditations; in the warmth, the earnestness, and the frequency of our secret applications to God in prayer; in the deep, unfeigned, and heart-piercing sorrow of our confessions and our penitence; in the sincerity of our gratitude and our praise; in our admiration of the divine bounty to his creatures; and in our sense of particular mercies to ourselves. We shall pray much in secret. We shall address ourselves to God of our own accord, in our walks, and in our closets. In these addresses, form will be nothing; every thing will proceed from the heart. We shall feed the flame of devotion by continually returning to the subject. No person endued with the taste and relish of devotion will have God for any length of time out of his mind. Under one view or other, God will be continually present to a devout heart. The true taste for devotion will bring a man to the public worship of God; and, what is more, it will bring him in such a frame of mind, as to enable him to join in public worship, with effect as to his own soul.

A spirit of devotion is one of the greatest blessings, and the want of it one of the greatest misfortunes, that a Christian can experience. When it is present, it gives life to every act of worship we perform; it renders every such act interesting and comfortable to ourselves. It is experienced in our most retired moments; in our beds, in our closets, our rides, and our walks. It is felt within us, when we are assembled with our children and servants in family prayer. It leads us to church, to the congregation of our fellow Christians there assembled. In an especial manner, it accompanies us in our joint offices of religion; and it returns us to our homes holier, happier, and better. But that which greatly enhances its value to every anxious Christian, is, that it affords to himself a proof that his heart is right towards God. When it is followed by an abstinence from sin, and endeavours after virtue, by avoiding evil and doing good, the proof and the satisfaction to be drawn from it are complete. Dr. Paley's Sermons, Serm. vi.

DEUTERON'OMY, the fifth book of Moses, and the last of the Pentateuch. The Greeks gave it the name of Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, or a repetition of the law, because in it Moses recapitulates what he had ordained in the preceding books. The Hebrews call it elle haddebarim, which are the first words of the book. Some Rabbins call it Mishnah, the second law; others, the book of reprehensions, because of the reproaches which occur in chap. i. viii. ix. xxviii. xxx. xxxii. This book also contains the history of what passed in the wilderness, from the beginning of the eleventh month, to the seventh day of the twelfth month, in the fortieth year after their departure from Egypt, that is, about six weeks.

In the book of Deuteronomy, Moses addresses the people, and recites what had passed since their coming out of Egypt. He states to them the laws of God which he had received at Sinai, and which he explains, and adds some others. He also exhorts the people to obedience, and declares that Joshua was appointed by God to succeed him. He wrote this transaction, committed the writing to the Levites and elders, and commanded them to read it every seven years, in a general assembly of the people, at the feast of tabernacles. (Deut. xxxi. 9, 10, 14.) It also includes his last song, to which is added the history of his death.

Some have questioned whether this book was written by Moses, because it mentions his death, and the author speaks of the land beyond Jordan, as if the writer had been on this side, west of that river. The account of Moses's death was certainly added to this book by some other person, very probably by Joshua. The word heber, translated beyond Jordan, may also be translated on this side, or rather alongside of the place to which it refers.

DEW. Dews in Palestine are very plentiful, like a small shower of rain every morning. Gideon filled a basin with the dew which fell on a fleece of wool. (Judg. vi. 38.) Isaac, blessing Jacob, wished him the dew of heaven, which fattens the fields. (Gen. xxvii. 28.) In those warm countries where it seldom rains, the night-dews supply the want of showers. Isaiah speaks of rain as if it were a dew, (xviii. 4.) He also says, that the dew which God causes to fall on his people, is a bright dew: a dew which revives, enlightens, and restores liberty to the captives. (xxvi. 19.)

DIAL is not mentioned in Scripture before the reign of Ahaz, in the year of the world 3278, and before Christ 726. It is not clearly ascertained, that, even after his reign, the Jews generally divided their time by hours, but continued to reckon it after their former manner. The word hour, or perhaps only the parts of an hour, occur first in Daniel and Tobit: Tobit and Tobias continued prostrate three hours, says the Vulgate; and this is also the reading of the Chaldee. This may confirm the opinion of those who maintain, that the invention of dials came from beyond the Euphrates. But others believe, that this invention was derived from the Phœnicians, and that the first traces of it are discoverable in Homer, (Odys. xv. 402,) who speaks of 'an island called Syria, lying above Ortygia, where the revolutions of the sun are observed.' As the Phœnicians are thought to have inhabited this island of Syria, it is presumed that they left there this monument of their skill in astronomy. About three hundred years after Homer, Pherecydes, as we are told by Laertius, set up a dial in the same island to distinguish the hours. The Greeks confess that Anaximander first divided time by hours, and introduced sundials into Greece. Usher fixes the death of Anaximander to the year of the world 3457, before Christ 547, under the reign of Cyrus, and during the captivity of Babylon. Vitruvius, mentioning the various kinds of dials, places first of all, as most ancient, that of Berosus the Chaldæan. Berosus lived above three hundred years before Christ. He was a priest of Belus at Babylon; and passing thence into Greece, he taught astronomy first at Cos, and afterwards at Athens. His history contained astronomical observations for 480 years, which carry us higher than the date of Ahaz: but we must allow some time for these dials to have reached Israel from Babylon, if we suppose the invention to be adopted at that period of time.

Interpreters differ concerning the form of the dial of Ahaz, (2 Kings xx.) The generality of expositors think that it was a stair-case so disposed, that the sun showed the hours upon it by the shadow. Others suppose, that it was a pillar erected in the middle of a very level and smooth pavement, on which the hours were engraven. According to these authors, the lines marked on this pavement are what the Scripture calls degrees. Grotius describes it as follows: It was a concave hemisphere, and in the midst was a globe, the shadow of which fell on several lines, engraven in the concavity of the hemisphere; these lines were twenty-eight in number. This description answers pretty nearly to that kind of dial, which the Greeks called scapha, a boat or hemisphere, the invention (rather introduction) of which Vitruvius ascribes to Berosus the Chaldæan. It would seem, indeed, that the most ancient sun-dial known is in the form of a half circle, hollowed into the stone, and the stone cut down to an angle. This kind of dial was invented in Babylon, and was very probably the same as that of Ahaz. It appears, that on some ancient sun-dials in the East, every hour is divided into three parts, which, varying with the season, contain from twenty to twenty-four of our minutes each, according to the length of the day. These divisions are called ghuri. Now, supposing that the dial of Ahaz was in the form of a half circle, and that each hour was divided into three parts, the shadow in the morning would move down till it would be nearly noon when Isaiah spake to Hezekiah. Perhaps Isaiah had said, that Hezekiah should die at noon, as his sickness was in its nature mortal. If so, Isaiah's instant return was necessary, and the instant beginning of the shadow to retrograde. The shadow retrograded then ten stations or degrees, or one-fourth of the circle; and having reached this station, it thence re-assumed, and re-accomplished, its natural course. This sign aptly alluded to the period of Hezekiah's life: Hezekiah was not quite thirty years of age, the meridian of life; the shadow going back one quarter of a circle added to his days fifteen years, so that he died about the age of forty-five years. He did not entirely reach the semicircle of the dial; but he stopped short at one quarter's distance of the sun-setting, or evening of life. Commentators are divided in opinion respecting the retrogradation on the shadow of this dial, and the manner of it, whether the sun did really go back, or whether the reflection of his rays was occasioned by some cloud formed suddenly, which produced this effect supernaturally. The opinion of the ancients, both Jews and Christians, was, that this miracle was wrought not on the shadow, but on the body of the sun; or, as archbishop Usher expresses it, that the sun and all the heavenly bodies went back, and as much was taken from the night, as was added to this day. On the other hand, Le Clerc, Lowth, the authors of the Universal History, and some others, maintain, that the whole miracle was wrought on the dial, and occasioned only by a reflection of the sun's rays, or by a peculiar refraction of the atmosphere for a time, while the sun proceeded in its ordinary course. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. Nos. ii. p. 5.; cii. p. 3.

DIA'NA, Ἀρτεμις, a celebrated goddess of the Heathens, who was honoured especially at Ephesus. She was one of the twelve superior deities, and was also called Hebe, Trivia, and Hecate. In the heavens she was the moon, on earth Diana, and in hell Hecate. She was invoked by women in child-birth under the name of Lucina. She was painted with a crescent upon her head, a bow in her hand, and dressed in a hunting habit. She passed for a virgin; and bees were consecrated to her.

Diana of Ephesus was otherwise represented. Her statue was covered with breasts, sometimes from head to foot; sometimes her bosom only and her belly, and all below was a kind of pedestal, adorned with heads of stags, dogs, oxen, &c. The breasts were an emblem of her fertility, as sustaining men and beasts.

Diana was said to be the daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and twin sister to Apollo. She was worshipped in Palestine, in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah, under the name of Meni, the goddess of months, the moon. She was also adored as the queen of heaven; and cakes were offered to her on terraces upon the tops of houses, at the corners of the streets, or doors of houses. 'The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven,' says Jeremiah, (vii. 18.) See also Jerem. xi. 13.; xlv. 17, 18. Ezek. xvi. 25.

DI'NAH, דינה, signifies judgment, or who judges, and was the name of the daughter of Jacob and Leah. (Gen. xxx. 21.) She was born after Zebulun, about the year of the world 2250. When Jacob returned into the land of Canaan, Dinah, who was at that time about the age of fifteen or sixteen, had the curiosity to attend a festival of the Shechemites, and see the women of the country. (Gen. xxxiv. 1, 2.) Shechem, son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the city, having seen her, conceived a great affection for her, and ravished her. He afterwards desired his father Hamor to procure this young woman for his wife. Dinah's brothers being informed of what had passed, were strongly exasperated. They offered insidious proposals to Shechem, to his father Hamor, and to the inhabitants of their city, whom they afterwards slew and plundered, and thus revenged the affront offered to their sister. All this they performed without the knowledge of their father Jacob, who cursed them for their conduct. What became of Dinah after this affair is unknown. The Hebrews assert, that she was married to Job; but of this there is no proof. May not this opinion, however, suggest their idea of Dinah's inconsiderate character? See Job ii. 9.

DIOCESE, the circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction. It is derived from the Greek word δωικησις, government. In the first century, the bishops who resided in large and populous cities, prompted by the neighbouring converts, whose attendance on public worship was always inconvenient, and sometimes impossible, erected new churches in the adjacent towns and villages. These naturally continuing under their care and inspection, the districts grew imperceptibly into ecclesiastical provinces, and obtained the name of dioceses. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 50.

DIRECTORY, a kind of regulation for the performance of religious worship, drawn up by the assembly of divines in England, at the instance of the parliament, in 1645. It was intended to supply the use of the Liturgy, or Book of Common Prayer, the use of which had been abolished. It prescribed no form of prayer, or circumstances of external worship, and did not oblige the people to any responses except Amen.

The Directory enjoins, that the people shall enter the churches reverently, and in a grave and becoming manner, without adoration, or bowing towards one place or another; that the minister is to begin with prayer, to which all present are to give due attention, and to abstain from all private conferences or salutations; that the reading of the Scriptures in the congregation, which is a part of the worship of God, be performed by the pastors and teachers; that all the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, but none of those called Apocryphal, be publicly read in the vulgar tongue, and in the best allowed translation; that the portion to be read at once be left to the minister, but that commonly one chapter of each Testament be read at every meeting; that all the canonical books be read over in order, that the people may be the better acquainted with the Scriptures; that when the minister shall judge it necessary to expound any part of what is read, he is not to begin his exposition till the whole chapter or psalm be ended, and that after reading the Scripture, and singing the psalm, the minister who preaches is to begin with prayer. It then prescribes heads for the prayer; enjoins that the subject of the sermon be a text of Scripture, which teaches some principle or head of religion, or is otherwise suitable to the occasion; and recommends that the introduction to the text be brief and perspicuous, and drawn from the words or context, or from some parallel passage of Scripture. In dividing the text, the minister is to regard the order of the matter, rather than that of the words; he is not to burden the memory of his hearers with too many divisions, nor perplex their understandings with logical phrases, and terms of art; he is chiefly to insist on those doctrines which are principally intended, and most likely to edify his hearers; he is not to propose nor answer any unnecessary objections, but to confute error, and satisfy the judgments of his audience; and he is to be very sparing in quotations from ecclesiastical or other human writers, ancient or modern, &c. The Directory recommends the use of the Lord's Prayer, as a perfect model of devotion. It forbids private or lay persons to administer baptism, and enjoins it to be performed in the face of the congregation. It orders, that the communion-table at the Lord's Supper be so conveniently placed, that the communicants may sit about it. It enjoins that the Sabbath be observed with the greatest strictness, both in public and private; that marriage be solemnized by a lawful minister of the word, who is to give counsel to, and pray for the parties; that the minister teach the people not only in public, but in private; that the sick be visited by the minister, under whose charge they are, and who shall administer spiritual good to their souls; that the dead be buried without any prayers or religious ceremonies; that days of fasting be observed when the judgments of God are abroad in the world, or when some important blessings are desired; that days of thanksgiving for mercies received be also kept; and, lastly, that as it is the duty of Christians to praise God publicly, the whole congregation join together in singing psalms.

In an Appendix to this Directory, it is enjoined, that all festivals, vulgarly called holy days, be abolished, and that no day be observed except the Lord's day; and that, as no place is capable of any holiness under pretence of consecration, or subject to pollution by any superstition formerly employed, the places of worship now used be still continued.

This Directory, which is still partly, but by no means strictly, adhered to by Presbyterians in general, is commonly bound with the Westminster Confession of Faith, and may be also found at the end of Neale's History of the Puritans.

DISCIPLE. The proper signification of this word is well known. Absolutely taken, it signifies, in the New Testament, a believer, a Christian, a scholar, a follower of Christ. It is often used instead of apostle, in the Gospels; but in other places, apostles are distinguished from disciples. The apostles were twelve in number.

The seventy-two, who followed our Saviour from the beginning, were called disciples; and this name is also given to those who were merely professors, and bore no office, and to some who for a time only professed to follow Christ.

DISCONTENT, dissatisfaction with our condition. Distrust in the Divine goodness is the most frequent and the most fatal origin of despondency. The mind easily brings itself to endure these temporal evils and corporeal pangs, of which it feels a rational persuasion that they are designed for its good, and must be ultimately subservient to its happiness. One of the principal sources of discontent is worldly care, of which our Saviour seems to attribute the origin to our distrust, and which of course will be diminished, in proportion as our faith is established in the good providence of God. Reproving the temporal solicitude of his followers, our Saviour says, 'Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin; but I say unto you, that Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. If God then so clothe the herb of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, O ye of little faith? Take, therefore, no anxious thought, saying, what shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed, for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things.' (Matt. vi. 28—32.) Our Saviour does not prohibit the moderate, but only the immoderate pursuit of sensual and perishable things. He forbids us to seek them with that rapacity which is the effect of covetousness, or the operation of distrust. When we have so many tokens of God's goodness, in the ample provision he has made for the inferior, we surely ought not to question his affectionate concern for the rational creation. He who shows himself so paternally mindful of the fowls of the air, and even of the flowers of the field, cannot be indifferent to the welfare of sentient and intellectual man! Besides, is not the life more than meat? Is it not absurd to suppose, that God should bestow the greater, and then refuse the lesser gift? God has not conferred life, without affording the means of supporting it.

In the hour of sickness or misfortune, or under any of the manifold afflictions of life, we are apt to vent expressions of impatience, and exclamations of discontent; and in our hearts, if not with our lips, we are prone to accuse the divine justice or beneficence. We ought, however, to consider, that what God freely gave, he may as freely take away; that health and affluence are not so much due to our desert, as the effect of his beneficence; and that therefore we ought not to repine at any sufferings or deprivations which he, in his wisdom, may inflict, even though these visitations of his providence had no immediate reference to our advantage. But when we consider that God, so unbounded in love, never exposes us to any pain or misery which is not expressly designed for our advantage, and has a tendency to increase the aggregate of our enjoyment at some future period of our lives, we have every reason to acquiesce, with a cordial satisfaction, even in those measures of his government, which are, at the time, the most contrary to our hopes, and the most adverse to our inclinations, and to say, even under the most grievous pressure of calamity, 'It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good.'

It is probable that the discontent, which is greatest in degree, and most corrosive in kind, proceeds not so much from the sense of actual ills, as from the dread of those which are imaginary; not so much from the privation of what is necessary, as from the impatient desire of what is superfluous. It is a maxim of our Saviour, of which the truth is established by common experience, that 'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.' To vex ourselves about evils which may never happen, and of which we cannot avert the issue, but may increase the pain by anticipation, is not only to disquiet ourselves in vain, but to distrust the good providence of God, and to lose the enjoyment of those things which we possess, in the anticipation of calamity that we may never experience. It is inconsistent with our trust in the providence of God, to anticipate distant and uncertain evils; and it behoves us to be satisfied with the good before us.

If our sufferings in this life can be alleviated, or our condition be improved, by our natural exertions, we can reasonably impute the hardships which we experience, and the consequent discontent which we feel, only to ourselves. Why do we complain of hardships, which, if we will, we can remove, or of a disease, which, if we will, we can cure? But if our wretchedness, our indigence, or our pain, be beyond the power, or, in this life, beyond the hope of cure, still there is a patience, a fortitude, not impossible to be exercised, and capable of blunting the edge or lessening the pressure even of irremediable ills. There is a force of endurance, and a meekness of resignation, which both philosophy and religion, the perfection of philosophy, inculcate and inspire.

In short, in whatever light we consider the subject, we shall find that the grounds of our discontent are generally to be attributed more to our minds than to our circumstances. Though there be much affliction in the world, we ought to remember, as Christianity teaches, that it is most beneficial to us; that 'whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth;' and that whatever the immediate consequences of adversity may be, it will always in the end be found subservient to our happiness. The goodness of God is not subject to any capricious variations. His regard for his creatures is immutable; and their happiness is the object of all his dispensations. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 436, &c.; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, Essay xii.

DISEASES. Diseases and death are the consequences of sin: this idea of them

we receive from Scripture. The ancient Hebrews, who were not much accustomed to recur to physical causes, frequently imputed diseases to evil spirits. If their infirmities appeared unusual, and especially if their cause was unknown to them, they concluded it was a blow from the avenging hand of God: to him the wisest and most religious had recourse for cure; and king Asa is blamed for placing his confidence in physicians, under a very painful fit of the gout in his feet, and for not applying to the Lord. (2 Chron. xvi. 12.) Job's friends ascribed all his distempers to God's justice. Leprosies were treated as sacred diseases; the priests judged of their nature and qualities, shut up the diseased, and declared them to be healed or still affected with leprosy. Miriam, Gehazi, and king Uzziah, were suddenly smitten with a leprosy: the first as a punishment for detraction; the second, for avarice; and the third, for presumption.

In the Gospel many diseases are ascribed to the devil. 'Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath-day?' (Luke xiii. 16.) The same person is mentioned as having a spirit of infirmity, (ver. 11.) We hear of a dumb devil, and of another that could scarcely speak, that is, of demons who caused these infirmities; and whenever Jesus Christ, or his apostles, restored such persons to health, they began with driving out the devil, and the cure of the person was quickly accomplished.

St. Paul delivers the incestuous Corinthian to Satan, 'for the destruction of his flesh,' that the evil spirit might afflict him with diseases. (1 Cor. v. 5.) The same apostle attributes the deaths and diseases of many Corinthians to their communicating unworthily. (1 Cor. xi. 30.) He also ascribes the infirmities with which he was afflicted to an evil angel:—'a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, to buffet me.' (2 Cor. xii. 7.) An angel of death slew the first-born of the Egyptians; a destroying angel wasted Sennacherib's army; and an avenging angel smote with a pestilence the people of Israel after David's sin. Saul fell into a fit of deep melancholy, an hypochondriacal depression; and it is said, that 'an evil spirit seized him.' Abimelech, king of Gerar, for taking Sarah, the wife of Abraham, was threatened with death. (Gen. xx. 3, 4.) The Philistines were smitten with an ignominious disease, because they did not treat the ark with adequate respect. These diseases, and others of which we read, were evident interpositions of Providence, by whatever agency they were produced.

DISSENTER is a very comprehensive negative term, and denotes every religionist, of whatever denomination, who dissents or separates from the worship and communion of the established church. Dissenters from the Church of England first appeared about the year 1565, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, when, from their refusing to subscribe to the articles, &c. and from their professing extraordinary purity in religious worship and conduct, they were reproached with the name of Puritans. Indeed, there were men of this description in the time of Edward VI.; but that name was not given them before the sixth year of Elizabeth. By the Act of Uniformity, which took place on Bartholomew's Day, 1662, the Dissenters were greatly increased; for two thousand ministers thought themselves in conscience obliged to quit the established church and refused to conform to certain conditions, whence they obtained the name of Non-conformists. During the last century, their descendants have been usually called Protestant Dissenters, a moderate appellation, sanctioned by Acts of Parliament, and originally given at the Revolution, when they first received a legal security, by having the Act of Toleration extended to them. This Act, as amended by an Act passed in the fifty-third of his majesty king George the Third, includes Dissenters of every denomination; but the name Protestant Dissenters is now generally confined, or rather perhaps was at first given, to the three denominations of Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists.

It appears from Neale's History of the Puritans, that the sufferings of the Dissenters at different times have been exceeded only by their religious zeal. Ever since their first separation from the church, various disputes have arisen between Churchmen and Dissenters; and these disputes have not unfrequently been carried on with some degree of warmth on both sides. The Puritans first objected to the order of bishops, the liturgy, the clerical dress, the sign of the cross in baptism, &c.; and the general principles on which their descendants declare that they dissent from the Church of England, are no other than those on which she separated from the Church of Rome. These principles are reduced by Mr. Evans to three: first, 'The right of private judgment;' secondly, 'Liberty of conscience;' and thirdly, 'The perfection of Scripture as a Christian's only rule of faith and practice.'

The Test Act, which was passed in the reign of Charles II., excluded all from places of trust and profit under government, except those who took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, made the declaration against transubstantiation, and received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, within six months after their appointment. This last qualification was considered by many of the Dissenters as burdensome to the conscience. Hence loud complaints were made respecting this exclusion, since, 'as members of the civil community, they conceived themselves entitled to all the common privileges of that community.' This Act, indeed, was originally intended against the Roman Catholics, of whom several had been promoted by the court; but it was so expressed as to exclude also the Protestant Dissenters, who made several unsuccessful applications for its repeal. In 1787, the question was warmly agitated in the House of Commons; and numerous publications on each side issued from the press. In 1828, the Dissenters were more successful; and an Act was passed for repealing so much of several Acts as imposed the necessity of receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a qualification for certain offices and employments.' By this Act, in lieu of the sacramental test, a declaration is to be made, signed, and subscribed, in the presence of such person or persons who ought to administer the oath for the due execution of the offices or places. The person appointed to any office, or place, is 'solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, to profess, testify, and declare, upon the true faith of a Christian, that he will never exercise any power, authority, or influence, which he may possess by virtue of the said office, to injure or weaken the Protestant Church as it is by law established in England, or to disturb the said Church, or the Bishops and Clergy of the said Church, in the possession of any rights or privileges to which such Church, or the said Bishops and Clergy, are or may be by law entitled.' In neglect of making and subscribing this declaration, it is not lawful for any person to execute the office or place to which he is appointed; and every person who shall be admitted into any office or employment, which before the passing of this Act required him to take the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, is to make and subscribe the said declaration within six months, or his appointment to be wholly void. This Act did not pass without much debate. The principal argument urged for the continuance of the Test Act, was 'the safety of the Established Church;' and the chief arguments for its repeal were, that it is 'a prostitution of the Lord's Supper,' and that 'to withhold civil rights on account of religious opinions, is a species of persecution.'

By the Act of Toleration, which was passed at the Revolution, the statutes of Queen Elizabeth, and of King James I., concerning the discipline of the church, were not to extend to Protestant Dissenters, who were by this means exempted from suffering the penalties which the law inflicted, and permitted, on certain conditions, to worship God according to their own consciences. The conditions by which the Act was limited, and to which the Dissenters themselves in general consented, are as follows: all dissenting ministers are required 'not only to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and to make the declaration against popery, but also to subscribe to the doctrinal articles of the Church of England;' they are not to hold their meetings till their place of worship is certified to the bishop of the diocese, or to the justices of the quarter sessions, and registered, and not to keep the doors of their meeting-houses locked during the time of worship; and to secure to them the free exercise of their religion, whoever disturbs or molests them in the performance of divine worship, on conviction at the sessions, is to forfeit 20*l.*, by the statute first of William and Mary. As this Act provided no relief to dissenting tutors and school-masters, who, before they could be legally qualified to keep a school, or instruct youth, were obliged to obtain a licence from the archbishop, bishop, or ordinary, and to make a declaration of conformity to the church of England; and as the subscription to the doctrinal articles of the established church was afterwards considered by the Dissenters as another grievance; the Dissenters applied to parliament in 1772, and again in 1773, without effect, for the redress of these grievances. However, without any farther application on their part, an Act of Parliament passed in 1779, 'by which the benefits of the Toleration Act were granted to Protestant Dissenting ministers and school-masters, on condition of their taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, making the declaration against popery, and declaring their belief of the Holy Scriptures as containing a divine revelation.' By an Act passed in the 52d year of his majesty George the Third, several former acts are repealed, and the following regulations substituted: 'All places for religious worship shall be certified and registered, and every person knowingly permitting such assembly to meet in any place not registered, to forfeit not exceeding 20*l.* nor less than 20*s.*; any person preaching in a place, without the owner's consent, to forfeit not more than 30*l.* nor less than 40*s.*; and preachers and persons resorting to religious assemblies so certified and registered, are exempted from penalties in 1 William and Mary, and preachers on taking the oaths in 19 George the Third, from civil offices and the militia.' By an Act passed in the 53d year of his majesty George the Third, so much of the Act of Toleration as provides that the said Act should not extend to give any ease, benefit, or advantage to persons denying the Trinity, is repealed; and the provisions of another Act, passed in the ninth and tenth years of King William, and intituled, 'An Act for the more effectually suppressing Blasphemy and Profaneness,' so far as relates to persons denying the Trinity, are also repealed.

Dissenting ministers, except those of the Particular Baptists, are, in general, wholly supported by the voluntary contributions of their congregations. They may perform any clerical function, except that of marriage, which, by an Act of Parliament, is limited to parish churches, and the established clergy only. Their baptisms are registered in a book, in the public library of Dissenters, in Red Cross Street, London; and, by Act of Parliament, these registers are held valid in law. They are not entitled to a steeple and bells for their places of worship; and Jews, Quakers, and all denominations of Dissenters, must, as well as the members of the established church, pay their church rates and tithes, and serve parish offices, or forfeit the penalty.

As a body, the Dissenters are not more respectable in point of numbers, than of virtue and talents. Among them have appeared many, who have been eminently conspicuous for both piety and learning; and those of the present time by no means seem to discredit their predecessors. Among their ornaments may be reckoned Baxter, Bates, Howe, Owen, Williams, Neale, Henry, Stennet, Evans, Gale, Foster, Leland, Grosvenor, Watts, Lardner, Abernethy, Doddridge, Grove, Chandler, Gill, Orton, Furneaux, Farmer, Towgood, Robinson, Price, Kippis, and Priestley. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 33, &c. Evans's Sketch, p. 127. &c.; Brewster's Secular Essay, pp. 261, 275, &c.

DISSOLUTION OF THE WORLD is an article of our faith, frequently alluded to in the Old, and clearly predicted in the New Testament. It is an article of faith so far from being incredible, that many appearances in nature lead to its belief. All terrestrial substances change their form; and nothing which consists of matter is formed for perpetual duration. Every thing around us is impaired and consumed by time, waxes old by degrees, and tends to decay. There is reason, therefore, to believe, that a structure, so complex as the world, must be liable to the same law, and shall, at some period, undergo the same fate. It appears, from various proofs, that a great portion of what is now dry land, was once covered with water. Continents bear the marks of having been violently rent, and torn asunder from each other. New islands, thrown up by the force of subterraneous fire, have risen from the bottom of the ocean. In different quarters, formidable earthquakes have shaken the globe, and at this hour terrify many parts of it with their alarms. For ages, burning mountains have been discharging torrents of flame; and, from time to time, they renew their explosions in various regions.

All these circumstances show, that in the bowels of the earth the instruments of its dissolution are formed. To our view, who behold only its surface, it may appear firm and unshaken; whilst its destruction is preparing in secret. The ground on which we tread is undermined. Combustible materials are stored. The train is laid. When the mine is to spring none of us can foresee. The Scripture mentions the presages of the approaching fatal day; 'There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring.' (Luke xxi. 25.) The race of men then living shall clearly perceive, that universal nature is tending to ruin. They shall feel the globe shake; shall behold their cities fall; and the final conflagration begin to kindle around them.

The Supreme Being will direct the dissolution, as he directed the original formation, of the world. He is the great agent in this wonderful transaction. By him it was foreseen; by him it was intended; and it entered into his plan from the moment of creation. From the beginning, this world was destined to fulfil a certain period, when its duration was to terminate. This dissolution is thus described by Moses: 'A fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains.' The prophet Isaiah says, 'Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner.' St Paul assures us, 'that the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.' St. Peter also expressly tells us, 'that the heavens and the earth which are now, are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men; and that the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens will pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up.' The dissolution of the world by fire is one of the most ancient traditions, and an opinion that has universally prevailed. It was sung of by poets. The ancient philosophers, of different sects and countries, taught that fire and water were the two elements which should destroy the world; and that as God suffered the waters to overflow the earth, so he will permit fire to consume the habitable globe. This was the commonly received opinion, and the ancient belief of the heathen part of mankind.

The Almighty saw it meet, that after the probationary course was finished, which the generations of men were to accomplish, their present habitation should be made to pass away. The dissolution of the world will be the introduction to a greater and nobler system in the government of God. 'We look, according to his promise, for a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.' Temporal things will give place to things eternal. 'Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?' The important discoveries which have been made to us of the designs of the Almighty, and of the destiny of man, ought to exalt our sentiments, and purify our life from what is vicious or vain. Whilst we pursue the business and cares of our present station, and partake of the innocent pleasures which the world affords, let us maintain that dignity of character which becomes us as immortal beings; let us study to be what we would wish to be found, if to us the day of the Lord should come. Many prophecies yet remain to be fulfilled, many preparatory events must take place, before the world is ripe for final judgment; but the day of death is to every one the same as the day of the dissolution of the world. Blair's Sermons, Sermon 50.; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iv. p. 341.

DIVINATION, a conjecture or surmise, formed concerning future events, from things which are supposed to presage them.

The eastern people were always fond of divination, magic, the curious arts of interpreting dreams, and of obtaining a knowledge of future events. When Moses published the law, this disposition had long been common in Egypt, and the neighbouring countries. To prevent the Israelites from consulting diviners, fortune-tellers, interpreters of dreams, &c. he forbade them, under very severe penalties, to consult persons of this description, and promised to them the true spirit of prophecy as infinitely superior. He commanded those to be stoned who pretended to have a familiar spirit, or the spirit of divination. (Deut. xviii. 9, 10, 11.) The writings of the prophets are full of invectives against the Israelites who consulted diviners, and against false prophets who by such means seduced the people.

Divination was of several kinds, by water, fire, earth, air; by the flight of birds, and their singing; by lots, by dreams, and by the wand, &c.

DIVORCE, or repudiation, is the dissolution of marriage, or the separation of husband and wife. Moses tolerated divorce for very good reasons. 'When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her, then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house.' (Deut. xxiv. 1, 2, &c.) Commentators are much divided on the sense of these words, 'because he hath found some uncleanness,' or, as it is in the Hebrew, 'matter of nakedness in her.' The school of Shammah, who lived a little before our Saviour, taught that it imported some action really infamous, and inconsistent with virtue. On the contrary, the school of Hillel, Shammah's disciple, taught that small reasons authorized divorce; for instance, if the wife did not dress meat well, or if the husband found any other woman whom he liked better. Akibah, another famous Rabbini, was still more indulgent than Hillel. He explained the text of Moses thus, 'If she find no favour in his eyes;' this was the first reason: the second was, 'If he find any uncleanness in her.' Josephus and Philo show sufficiently, that in their time the Jews practised divorce for very trivial causes. That the Pharisees explained this toleration of Moses in the same extensive manner, is evident from the question which they proposed to our Saviour, 'Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?' (Matt. xix. 3.) Our Saviour, in answer, referred them to the first institution of marriage, and shows that such divorce was a transgression of the moral law, and therefore a sin against God. In another place, he limits divorce to the single case of adultery: 'Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery.' (Matt. v. 32.) These words of our Saviour have been interpreted different ways. Some by adultery, or fornication, have understood any kind of great crimes, idolatry, infidelity, &c. which in Scripture are frequently called fornication: but almost all interpreters have taken our Saviour's words in their literal sense.

The late Dr. Paley observes, that the law of Moses, for reasons of local expediency, permitted the Jewish husband to put away his wife; but whether for every cause, or for what cause, appears to have been controverted amongst the interpreters of those times. Christ, the precepts of whose religion were calculated for more general use and observance, revokes his permission as given to the Jews for their hardness of heart, and promulges a law which was thenceforward to confine divorces to the single case of adultery in the wife. (Matt. xix. 9.)—Inferior causes may justify the separation of husband and wife, although they will not authorize such a dissolution of the marriage contract as would leave either at liberty to marry again; for it is that liberty in which the danger and mischief of divorces principally consist. The law of this country, in conformity to our Saviour's injunction, confines the dissolution of the marriage contract to the single case of adultery in the wife; and a divorce even in that case can only be effected by an Act of Parliament founded on a previous sentence in the spiritual court, and a verdict against the adulterer at common law. These proceedings, taken together, compose as complete an investigation of the complaint as a cause can receive.

Among the Jews, divorces have become less common since their dispersion among nations which do not permit the dissolution of marriage on light occasions; yet, some divorces obtain among the Jews. To prevent the Jewish men from abusing their liberty of divorcing, the Rabbins appoint many formalities, which consume much time, and give the married couple leisure to be reconciled. When there is no hope of accommodation, a woman, a deaf man, or a notary, draws the letter of divorce. He writes it in the presence of one or more Rabbins, on vellum which is ruled, and contains only twelve lines, in square letters; and abundance of little trifling particulars are observed, as well in the characters as in the manner of writing, and in the names and surnames of the husband and wife. Besides, neither he who writes the letter, nor the Rabbins, nor the witnesses, ought to be relations either to the husband or wife, or to one another. The substance of this letter, which they call Gheth, is as follows: 'On such a day, month, year, and place, I N. divorce you voluntarily, put you away, restore you to your liberty, even you N. who were heretofore my wife, and I permit you to marry whom you please.' The letter being written, the Rabbi examines the husband closely, in order to learn whether he acts from voluntary inclination in divorcing his wife. The Jews endeavour to have at least ten persons present at this action, without reckoning the two witnesses who sign, and two other witnesses to the date. If the Rabbi finds the husband fully determined, he commands the wife to open her hands, and bring them close to each other, in order to receive the deed, lest it fall to the ground. He then examines the wife again; and the husband gives her the parchment, and declares her free. Afterwards, the Rabbi cautions the woman against marrying within three months, lest she should be with child. From this time the man and woman are not to continue in private together in any place, and either of them may marry again.

Among the Jews, a girl betrothed under ten years of age, whether she has a father or not, if her husband be not agreeable to her, may be unmarried at any time previously to her reaching the age of twelve years and a day, at which period she is reputed a woman. She declares that she is not willing to have such a person for her husband, and takes two witnesses of this declaration, who authenticate it in writing; after which, she may marry whom she pleases. Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, vol. i. p. 327, edit. 1810.

DOCTOR, or TEACHER, of the law, may perhaps be distinguished from scribe, as teaching viva voce, rather than giving written opinions. When the expression 'counsel in the law' is used among us, it is not easy to divest ourselves of the idea that the political law, and administration of the country, are intended; but if we could restrict the phrase to learned in the divine law, we should not be far from forming a tolerably accurate conception of the doctors of the law in Judea. They had studied the law of Moses in its various branches, and the numerous comments which had arisen from it, or had been grafted on it, in later times; and, on various occasions, they gave their opinion on cases referred to them for advice. Nicodemus, himself a doctor (ὁ δάσκαλος, teacher) of the law, comes to consult Jesus, whom he compliments in the same terms as he was accustomed to receive from his clients: 'Rabbi, we know that thou art didascalos, a competent teacher, from God;' and he probably added, 'What is your opinion of such and such matters?' As if he had said, 'Our glosses have been too much strained, and have never satisfied my mind; I am desirous of hearing your sentiments.' In like manner, our Lord, (Luke ii. 46.) not only heard the opinions of the doctors, but asked them questions, and examined their answers whether they were agreeable to the law of God; and the doctors were in ecstasies at the intelligence of his mind, and the propriety of his language and replies.

Doctors of the law were chiefly of the sect of the Pharisees: but they are sometimes distinguished from that sect. (Luke v. 17.) Doctors, or teachers, are mentioned among divine gifts. (Ephes. iv. 11.) It would seem that the apostle, in this place, does not mean such ordinary teachers (or pastors) as the church now possesses; but as he reckons them among the extraordinary gifts of God, and uses no mark of distinction between the apostles and them, he appears to refer to the nature of the office of the Jewish doctors, as above stated. He probably meant well-informed persons, to whom inquiring Christian converts might have recourse, for clearing their doubts and difficulties, and for receiving from Scripture the demonstration that 'this is the very Christ.' Such a gift would be very serviceable in that infant state of the church; which, indeed, without it, would have seemed, in this particular, inferior to the Jewish institutions. With this agrees the distinction between doctors (teaching, διδάσκων) and exhorters. (Rom. xii. 7.) As if the apostle had said, 'He who gives advice privately, and resolves doubts, &c. let him attend to that duty; he who exhorts with a loud voice (παρακαλῶν), let him exhort' his hearers, with proper piety. In another place (1 Cor. xii. 28.) the same apostle ranges, first, apostles, public instructors; secondly, prophets, occasional instructors; thirdly, didascalous, doctors, or teachers, private instructors. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

DOG, a domestic animal, well known. By the law the dog was unclean, and was despised among the Jews. To compare a person to a dog, living or dead, was a most degrading expression, and is so used by David: (1 Sam. xxiv. 14.) 'After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog.' Mephibosheth also says, (2 Sam. ix. 8.) 'What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?'

The name of dog is also used for one who has lost all modesty; one who prostitutes himself to abominable actions. In this sense several understand the injunction (Deut. xxiii. 18.) of not offering 'the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog,' Christ in the Revelation (xxii. 15.) excludes 'dogs, sorcerers, whoremongers, and idolaters,' &c. St. Paul (Philip. iii. 2.) says, 'Beware of dogs,' of impudent, sordid, greedy professors. Solomon (Prov. xxvi. 11.) and St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 22.) compare sinners, who continually relapse into sins, to dogs returning to their vomit. By the law of Moses, game killed by dogs would have been unclean, and not to be used. (Levit. xvii. 15.) Dogs are not mentioned in Scripture, when hunting is spoken of; nor hunting, when dogs are mentioned.

Dog is used for persecutor. (Psalm xxii. 20.) The Jews gave degrading names to other nations, whom they called hogs, (Dan.) and dogs. Our Lord, in a certain degree, adopts their language to the Syrophenician woman, and calls the Jews children, and the Gentiles dogs. (Mark vii. 27.) It is probable that in Judea formerly, as now in the East, dogs had no owners, but ran about the streets in troops, and were fed by charity, or by caprice, or on such offal as they could obtain. They appear to have been numerous in Jezreel, when directed to fulfil the prophecy of Elijah. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

DOMINICANS, an order of monks, sometimes called Jacobins, sometimes Predicatores, or preaching Friars, and in England Black Friars. They were denominated Dominicans from their founder Dominic, a Spaniard, who was a descendant of the illustrious house of Guzman, and regular canon of Osma. He attacked the Albigenses, and other enemies of the church, with the power of eloquence, the force of arms, the subtilty of controversial writings, and the terrors of the Inquisition, which owed its form to this violent and sanguinary priest. He was honoured by the Roman pontiffs, Innocent III. and Honorius III., with the most distinguished marks of favour; and from them he obtained the privilege of erecting this new fraternity, whose principal design was the extirpation of error, and the destruction of heretics. The first rule which he adopted for the new society was that of the Canons of St. Augustin, to which he added several austere precepts and observances. Afterwards he changed the discipline of the canons for that of the monks; and, in a chapter of the order at Bologna, in 1220, he obliged the brethren to take a vow of absolute poverty, and to abandon entirely all their revenues and possessions. To this vow, however, as a society, they by no means adhered.

The first monastery of this order was established at Toulouse, whence Dominic sent missionaries to procure converts to his rules in every part of Europe. In the year 1218, he founded a convent in St. James's-street, in Paris; and hence they obtained the name of Jacobins. Within four years after, there were upwards of forty convents of Dominicans in Italy, France, Germany, and Spain. At Rome he obtained from pope Honorius III. the church of St. Sabina, in which he and his companions took the habit that they pretended the Blessed Virgin showed to the holy Renaud of Orleans. This habit was composed of a white garment and scapular, to which were added a black mantle and hood, ending in a point. St. Dominic died at Bologna in 1221, and his order increased so fast, that they had many convents in every European nation. The same year in which Dominic died, twelve of his followers came over to England, and founded a convent at Oxford, and another in London. In 1276, the mayor and aldermen of London gave them two streets near the Thames, where they had a most magnificent monastery, of which now nothing remains besides the name, the place where it stood being still called Blackfriars. There have been of the order of Dominicans four popes, sixty-three cardinals, one hundred and fifty archbishops, and eight hundred bishops, besides the lords of the Inquisition.

Of all the monastic orders, none enjoyed a higher degree of power and authority than the Dominican friars, whose credit was great, and their influence universal. But the measures they employed to maintain and extend their authority were so perfidious and cruel, that their influence began to decline towards the beginning of the sixteenth century. The Franciscans maintained, that the Virgin Mary was born without the blemish of original sin; the Dominicans asserted the contrary. The tragedy acted at Bern in 1509, for determining this uninteresting dispute respecting the immaculate conception, reflects indelible disgrace on the order of the Dominicans. They were perpetually employed in stigmatizing with the name of heresy numbers of learned and pious men; in encroaching upon the rights and properties of others, to augment their possessions; and in laying the most iniquitous snares and stratagems for the destruction of their adversaries. They were the principal counsellors, by whose instigation and advice Leo X. was determined to the public condemnation of Luther. The papal see never had more active and useful abettors than this order, and that of the Jesuits. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 54.; Hurd's Hist. of Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 193.

DONATISTS, a sect that arose in Africa about the beginning of the fourth century, and derived their name from Donatus, their leader. The doctrines of this body, however, were strictly conformable to those of the church from which they separated. Cæcilianus, the archdeacon of Carthage, had, on the demise of the bishop, been consecrated to the vacant see by some of the African bishops, without waiting for the assent of the bishops of Numidia. These offended prelates convened a council, consisting of seventy bishops, by whom Cæcilianus was deposed, and Majorinus, his deacon, declared his successor. This sentence, which divided into factions the Carthaginian church, and in fact gave it two bishops at the same time, was occasioned by a variety of causes, independent of the irregularity attending the consecration of Cæcilianus. Constantine appointed this controversy to be examined by the bishop of Rome, assisted by three others; and the result of their deliberations was favourable to Cæcilianus. But the restoration of the degraded bishop was not calculated to satisfy the minds of his adversaries; who, headed by Donatus, an African bishop, fomented fresh discontents, and occasioned the emperor to convene a council at Arles, where they were again condemned. Their dissatisfaction still continued; and two years afterwards, Constantine, to whom the different parties had consented to refer their cause, approved the consecration of Cæcilianus. The resentment and contumely with which the Donatists received this decision, added to their former behaviour, exasperated the emperor so much, that he deprived them of their churches, banished the seditious bishops, and even condemned to death some of the party. This violent, and perhaps imprudent, resentment was not calculated to produce peace. The Donatists asserted that the apostolical succession had been interrupted; that the whole ecclesiastical body in Europe and Asia was infected with guilt and schism, since they held communion with the degraded African church; that the preservation of the catholic church was confined to those African believers who had preserved their faith and discipline inviolate; and that all communion with other churches ought to be avoided, lest they should be contaminated by their impurity. This rigid theory was accompanied by conduct equally austere. Every proselyte was carefully re-baptized and re-ordained; and all who had communicated with other churches were obliged to perform public penance, previously to their admission into this immaculate church. The Circumcellians, exasperated by the severe execution of the laws of Constantine against the Donatists, collected in formidable bodies, assumed the titles of captains and saints, rushed out as the avengers of those who had been the victims of the law, and spread consternation and terror throughout the African provinces. Constantine, hoping that time might be more conducive than force in calming these disturbances, abrogated the laws against the Donatists; and his son Constans laboured earnestly to heal the divisions of the African church. These efforts, however, were in vain. Donatus the Great, who had succeeded Majorinus, and from whom the party derived its name, with the other factious prelates, opposed every attempt towards a reconciliation. The whole party rose in arms, and were defeated by the imperial army: numbers fled, a considerable part were sent into banishment, and many were punished with extreme severity. The Donatists divided into many sects, of whom the Rogatians contended that the church of Christ existed only in their community. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 197, &c

DORT, SYNOD OF, a national synod assembled by the authority of the states-general, and held at Dort in 1618. The states, indeed, were not unanimous; three of the seven provinces, namely, Holland, Utrecht, and Overijssel, protested against the holding of this Synod. The most eminent divines of the United Provinces, and also deputies from the churches of England, Scotland, Switzerland, Bremen, Hessia, and the Palatinate, assembled on this occasion, in order to decide the controversy between the Calvinists and the Arminians. The leading men among the Arminians appeared in this famous assembly to defend their cause; and at the head of them was Simon Episcopius, professor of divinity at Leyden, who had been a disciple of Arminius, and was justly admired on account of his eloquence, his great judgment, and extensive learning. The synod had scarcely commenced its deliberations before a dispute on the mode of proceeding prevented the conference which the Arminians had demanded, and obliged the Arminian party to leave the assembly. The Arminians proposed to begin the defence of their cause with a refutation of the Calvinistic doctrines, especially that of reprobation. This proposal was rejected by the synod, who determined, that, as the Arminians were accused of departing from the reformed faith, they ought first to justify their own opinions by producing proofs from Scripture. All means to persuade the Arminians to submit to this manner of proceeding having failed, they were banished the synod for their refusal. However, the synod proceeded in their examination of the tenets of the Arminians, who were pronounced guilty of pestilential errors, and condemned as corrupters of the true religion. This sentence was followed by the excommunication of the Arminians, the suppression of their religious assemblies, and the deprivation of their ministers.

The supralapsarian doctors were desirous of imposing their tenets on the synod, but the moderation of the British divines prevented their establishment. The authority of this synod was far from being acknowledged either in Holland or England. The provinces of Friesland, Zealand, Utrecht, Guelderland, and Groningen, could not be persuaded to adopt its decisions, which were also opposed in England by king James I. and archbishop Laud. *Mosheim's Eccles. DOVE, a tame bird, declared pure by the law. In Leviticus, (xii. 8.) it is ordained, that when a woman went to the temple after child-bearing, she should offer a lamb, and a dove, or turtle; or else a young pigeon, or a young turtle. (Numb. vi. 10.) The lamb was offered as a burnt-offering, the pigeon as a sin-offering. If she could not afford a lamb, she might offer two pigeons or two turtles, of either sex. As it was difficult for all who came from distant places to bring doves with them, the priests permitted the selling of these birds in the courts of the temple. One day Jesus Christ entered the temple, and with a scourge of cords drove out those who traded there in pigeons. (Matt. xxi. 12. Mark xi. 15.)

On other occasions, also, birds might be offered. The rich offered four-footed animals; but the poor, only pigeons for the ceremonies. (Levit. i. 14, 15, &c.) The priest took the turtle-dove, and wrung its neck. Some expositors think that he plucked off the head entirely; but others more truly, that he only wrung the neck.

The dove is used as a symbol of simplicity and innocence. At the baptism of Jesus, the Holy Spirit appeared in the form of a dove. (Matt. iii. 16.) Jesus Christ recommends to his disciples the wisdom of the serpent, and the harmlessness of the dove. (Matt. x. 16.) The prophet Hosea, (vii. 11.) compares the Israelites to a silly dove, which had no heart or understanding. The spouse in the Canticles is compared to a dove, by reason of her innocence, gentleness, and fidelity. Noah sent a dove out of the ark to discover whether the waters of the deluge were abated. (Gen. viii. 8. 10.) He chose a dove, which is a tame bird, and an enemy to carrion and ordure.

It is said in the Second Book of Kings, (vi. 25.) that, during the siege of Samaria, the fourth part of a cab (a little more than half a pint) of dove's dung was sold for five pieces of silver, or about twelve shillings. It is well known that dove's dung is not a nourishment for man. Josephus and Theodoret were of opinion, that this dove's dung was bought instead of salt, to serve as a kind of manure, for the purpose of raising esculent plants of quick vegetation. The Rabbins think it was not the dung of pigeons, but the corn in their crops, which they had gathered in the fields, whither, during the siege, they went to feed. Junius and Fuller suppose the dove's belly to be meant. Bochart thinks, that we should understand a sort of moss growing on trees. The general opinion of writers, since Bochart, is, that this signifies a kind of chick-pea, or tare, which has very much the appearance of dove's dung, and might thence be so named. In the Arab writers, the words kali and ugnen denote equally the dung of pigeons and chick-peas. Great quantities of chick-peas are sold in Cairo, to the pilgrims going to Mecca. At Damascus, says Belon, 'there are many shops where nothing else is done but preparing chick-peas. These peas, parched in a copper pan, are of great service to those who take long journeys.' This accounts for the stock of them stored up in the city of Samaria. Scheuzer inclines, instead of pigeon's dung, to render pigeon's food, which consists in pulse, peas, &c. See the article Ass. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 116.

DOWRY. In Europe, the father usually gives a portion to his daughter, which becomes the property of her husband, and which often forms a considerable proportion of his aggregate possessions: but in the East, the bridegroom offers to the father of the bride a sum of money, or value to his satisfaction, before he can expect to receive his daughter in marriage. The Scriptures afford instances of this mode of proceeding in the earliest times. When Jacob had nothing which he could immediately give, or pay down for a wife, as it would have been a disgrace to his intended spouse to suppose that she was not worth buying, he purchases her by his skill and attention in the service of her father Laban. Shechem, when proposing to Jacob's family, notwithstanding what had happened, to treat for Dinah in an honourable manner, offers to pay any value as a dowry: 'Ask me never so much dowry and gift.' (Gen. xxxiv. 12.) In this passage is mentioned a distinction, which is still observed in the East: 1. a dowry to the family, as a token of honour, to engage their favourable interest in the desired alliance; 2. a gift to the bride herself, e. g. of jewels, and other decorations, as a compliment of honour, as Abraham's servant gave to Rebecca. King Saul, (1 Sam. xviii. 25.) instead of wishing for a pecuniary dowry from David, which David was sensible he could not pay in proportion to the value of the bride, required one hundred foreskins of the Philistines, and by that means proposed his daughter as the reward of valour. In like manner, Caleb promised his daughter Achsah to the man who should take Kirjath-sepher.

The dowry was considered as so essential, that Moses orders it even in a case in which it might otherwise, perhaps, have been dispensed with. (Exod. xxii. 16.) 'If a man entice a maid, that is not betrothed, he shall endow her as his wife;' he shall make her the usual nuptial present. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

DREAM, חלום chalom, ἐνύπνιον. Dreams which were prophetic, or significative of future events, are thus denominated. The eastern people, and particularly the Jews, greatly regarded dreams, and applied for their interpretation to those who professed to explain them. The ancient Greeks and Romans held the same opinion. The antiquity of this attention to dreams is seen in the history of Pharaoh's butler and baker; Pharaoh himself, and Nebuchadnezzar, are instances of the same. God expressly forbid his people to observe dreams, or to consult those who pretended to explain them. He condemned to death all who pretended to have prophetic dreams, or to foretell events, even though what they foretold came to pass; if they had any tendency to promote idolatry. But they were not forbidden, when they thought they had a significative dream, to address the prophets of the Lord, or the high-priest in his ephod, to have it explained.

Saul, before the battle of Gilboa, consulted a woman who had a familiar spirit, because the Lord would not answer him by dreams, or by prophets. (1 Sam. xxviii. 6. 15.)

The Lord sometimes discovered his will in dreams, and enabled persons to explain them. He informed Abimelech in a dream, that Sarah was the wife of Abraham. (Gen. xx. 3. 6.) He showed Jacob the mysterious ladder in a dream, (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13.) and in a dream an angel revealed to Jacob a way of multiplying his flocks. (Gen. xxxi. 11, 12.) Joseph was favoured very early with prophetic dreams, the signification of which was easily discovered by Jacob. (Gen. xxxvii. 5.) God said, that he spake to other prophets in dreams, but to Moses face to face. The Midianites gave credit to dreams; as appears from that which a Midianite related to his companion, from whose interpretation Gideon took a happy omen. (Judg. vii. 13. 15.) The prophet Jeremiah, (xxiii. 25. 28.) exclaims against impostors who pretended to have had dreams, and abused the credulity of the people. Joel, (ii. 28.) promises from God, that in the reign of the Messiah the effusion of the Holy Spirit should be so copious, that the old men should have prophetic dreams, and the young men receive visions.

Dreams ought carefully to be distinguished from visions. The former happen during sleep, and are therefore liable to much ambiguity and uncertainty; the latter, when the person is awake, and has full possession of his natural powers and faculties. God spake to Abimelech in a dream, but to Abraham by vision. Jacob saw in a dream the method of producing certain effects on his cattle. God told Laban in a dream not to injure Jacob. In these, and other instances of dreams, the subjects dreamed of appear to be the very matters which had occupied the minds of these persons whilst awake, and when asleep, Providence overruled, or improved, their natural thoughts to answer the intended purposes. In the case of visions, the thing seen was unexpected; the mind was not prepared for it, and could not previously imagine what was about to occur. It is not easy, nor necessary, to distinguish always, when the word dream is used in Scripture, whether it may not denote a vision; but it would seem probable, that, when the interference of an angel is mentioned, as giving counsel, or advice, or direction, more than a mere dream is implied; as, to Jacob, (Gen. xxxi. 11.) to Joseph, (Matt. i. 20.; ii. 13, 19.); &c.

The subject of dreams is among the most curious that belong to human nature; and to understand it thoroughly demands no mean skill in the affections, dispositions, sympathies, and agitations, of the human mind. Wolfius was of opinion, that every dream takes its rise from some sensation, and is continued by the succession of imaginary ideas. M. Formey adopted the opinion of Wolfius, and thought that every dream begins by a sensation, and is continued by a series of acts of the imagination, or of phantasms; and that the cause of this series is to be found in the law of the imagination. Hence he concludes those dreams to be supernatural, which either do not begin by sensation, or are not continued by the law of the imagination. Mr. Baxter asserted that our dreams are prompted by separate immaterial beings; and that the phantasm, or what is properly called the vision, is not the work of the soul itself, nor the effect of mechanical causes. Hence he seems to conclude that this phantasm must be the work of separate spirits acting on our minds, and giving us ideas whilst we sleep. We shall not attempt to investigate the subject farther, but simply state the conviction, that, whilst the body rests, and is asleep, there is a something, which is distinct from the body, which is extremely active, volatile, and sensible; which sees without employing the organs of sight, hears without employing the organ of hearing, and performs a thousand actions with all the appearance of reality, and without the intermediation of the bodily agents. What is this power, this something controlled yet uncontrollable, dependent yet independent, retained by the tenement of clay, yet winging its devious course to regions, to events, and to actions, of which the tabernacle of the body is utterly unconscious? Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

DRUIDS, the priests or ministers of the ancient religion of the Gauls, Britons, and Germans. The druidical religion was at first extremely simple, and consisted of the following leading principles: 1. The professors of this religion were to honour the Divine Being as the maker and governor of the universe; but they were to seek the assistance of subordinate deities, who were supposed to act rather as messengers, than as having any power of their own. 2. The Druids taught the people to believe that the souls of men were immortal, but that they passed from one body to another; a sentiment which could never have existed, had they been reconciled to the events of Providence. 3. Those who had been found guilty of notorious blasphemy were to be put to death; and, in such cases, the priests were the sole judges. 4. Men were to do to others, as they would that others should do unto them; neither to wrong their neighbours, nor to injure themselves. 5. It was deemed highly criminal to eat flesh, milk, or eggs, because it was supposed that human souls inhabited animal bodies. 6. The first appearance of the new moon was reverently observed, as that planet was supposed to have great influence on the actions of men. 7. Women were common among them; but he who deflowered a virgin was the responsible father. 8. It was taught, that those who acted unjustly would be tormented in the bodies of snakes, or of other reptiles, till they should make an atonement for their sins, according to the directions of their priests.

Such were the theological tenets which the Druids taught their followers, but which were soon debased by abominable rites and ceremonies. The Druids worshipped their gods in groves, and under tall oaks. On every great festival, the high-priest, or arch-druid, appeared under a tall, venerable oak, dressed in fine linen, with a cope or mitre upon his head, and attended by priests of subordinate rank. A prisoner taken in battle was sacrificed by him to the gods. The victim, stripped naked, and his head adorned with flowers, was chained with his back to an oak, opposite to the place where the arch-druid stood. Whilst music was playing, the high-priest, having invoked the gods to accept of the sacrifice, walked forward with a knife in his hand, and stabbed the victim in the bowels. The people danced to the music; and the sacrificing Druid pretended to foretell events from the manner in which the blood flowed.

The Druids had such regard for the mistletoe, which grows upon the oak, that, when the season of its appearance approached, persons were sent to procure the most early intelligence of its being found. As soon as the Druids were informed of the fortunate discovery, the arch-druid, assisted by his inferior priests, cut off the mistletoe with a consecrated golden knife, or pruning hook, and carried it to the principal grove in triumph. The mistletoe was considered as a sovereign remedy for all diseases, and the peculiar gift of Heaven. In all their ceremonies of a public nature, the priest turned his eyes to heaven, and his face towards the east. Hurd on Religious Rites, Ceremonies, &c. p. 37; Heckford's Account of Religions, p. 233.

DRUNK, DRUNKENNESS, are words not always taken in Scripture in an odious sense. They often signify simply to drink to satisfaction, to exhilarate the spirits, as we freely may, at an entertainment made by a friend. 'Joseph's brethren drank, and were merry with him.' (Gen. xliii. 34.) Though the Hebrew word used in this place often signifies to drink to excess, yet it is not credible that they would forget themselves so far on this occasion, as to be really drunk before so great a man as Joseph, whom they did not know to be their brother. In John ii. 10. it is said, 'Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine, and when men have well drunk,' &c. It is not to be believed, that our Saviour waited till the guests were drunk, in order to perform the miracle at Cana. St. Paul (1 Cor. xi. 21.) says, 'One is hungry, and another is drunken,' that is, one wants, and another abounds.

The wise man (Prov. v. 15.) exhorts his disciple 'to drink water out of his own cistern;' to content himself with the lawful pleasures of marriage, without wandering in his affections. 'To eat and to drink,' is used (Eccles. v. 18.) to signify people's enjoying themselves; and in the Gospel for living in a common and ordinary manner. 'John (Matt. xi. 18.) came neither eating nor drinking, and they say He hath a devil: the Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber.' The apostles say, they ate and drank with Christ after his resurrection; that is, they conversed, they lived freely with him. (Acts x. 41.) Jesus Christ commands us to drink his blood and to eat his flesh: we eat and drink both, figuratively, in the eucharist.

Drunkenness is a state which is as pernicious to him who is led into it, as it is disgusting to those who calmly behold it. Considering this excess in itself, we may not, at first sight, think it a vice of so deep a die, because it is generally connected with a love of society. But, if we view it in a right light, we shall see it in all its horrors and deformities, and we shall decide as to the danger of that indulgence, which may be the parent of all the crimes of which human nature can be guilty. Is it not clear, that he must be prepared, and completely ready, for all manner of wickedness, for every degree of sin, whose passions and desires are inflamed to the highest pitch, and whose reason is either wholly banished, or so extremely weakened, as to deprive it of all authority and restraint over him? The immediate effect of excessive drinking is, to render a man deaf to the voice of reason and of conscience, prepared to utter the most profane words, and open to the commission of the foulest and the blackest deeds. One of the first ill effects which is likely to attend the drunkard, in what is called genteel or high life, is neglecting his affairs, and an unfitness to discharge his various duties. For the time which he wastes, and the talents which he buries, he is just as accountable to God as another man. If the drunkard belong to the middle class of life, by his neglect of business, and his extravagance, he cannot, for any length of time, support his family in the respectable manner to which they have been used. But when he, who has barely enough to supply the wants of the passing day, indulges in this vice, he soon wastes his little stock, and reduces himself and his family to the greatest distress. Another evil which attaches itself to the drunkard, is, the general contempt of all sober and well-disposed persons. It is too sad a truth, that the poor man is often slighted and undervalued by the great, even if his low state be owing to no vice or fault of his own; but when poverty is the effect of drunkenness and extravagance, contempt and disdain are justly its due. Indulgence in excessive drinking cannot long be continued, without making great ravages in a man's health; the powers of life become gradually weakened, and nature gives way to intemperance. Various disorders prey upon the constitution of the drunkard, from which the sober are free. They may, indeed, not assail him at first; but the longer their attacks are delayed, the more violent is their assault at last. They either lead him by gradual steps, or hasten him to the grave. Sometimes they bring on an untimely old age, and the man walks about as the ghost of what he was, deprived of strength of body, or of mind, feeble and tottering, a spectacle of misery, and a warning to all around to avoid his fatal excesses. Were the sorrows of the drunkard confined to these temporal evils, it might be enough, one would think, to deter him from a vice so very frightful and disastrous. But what are these when compared to the spiritual miseries, that are the fruits and punishments of this vice? Is not he criminal who destroys his health, and impairs his understanding? In destroying his health, he also shortens his life, and is so far guilty of self-murder, that he quits the world before his great Master calls him to do so; and, by destroying his reason, he renders his life useless and burdensome to the world. Excessive drinking is not more apt to drown reason than to banish all sense of shame and modesty from the mind. It fans the passion of the drunkard into a raging flame, turns him out like a wild beast without any restraint, and drives him into every species of wickedness. Clapham's Selected Sermons, vol. ii. p. 323; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. p. 214.

DUNKERS, a sect that arose in the year 1724. This sect was founded by a German, who, weary of the world, retired to an agreeable solitude within fifty miles of Philadelphia, for the more free exercise of religious contemplation. Curiosity attracted followers, and his simple and engaging manners rendered them proselytes. They soon settled a little colony called Euphrata, in allusion to the Hebrews, who used to sing psalms on the banks of the river Euphrates. This sect seem to have obtained their name from baptizing their converts by plunging. They are also called Dumplers and Tumblers. This last denomination they obtained from the manner in which they performed baptism, which is, by putting the head of the person, whilst kneeling, first under water, so as to resemble the motion of the body in the act of tumbling. These contemplative persons did not amount in 1777 to more than 500 in number. At that time their territory was about 250 acres in extent, the boundaries of which are marked by a river, a piece of stagnant water, and a mountain covered with trees.

Their life is spent in labour, prayer, and sleep. Twice every day and night they are called from their cells to attend divine service; and even the dean or prior himself is said to go to church regularly at midnight. Like the Methodists and Quakers, they permit any individual among them to preach, who may think himself inspired; and the favourite subjects on which they discourse in their assemblies, are humility, temperance, chastity, and other Christian graces. They are strict observers of the Sabbath, and some of them keep the seventh day. They never allow any law-suits; and they may be cheated, robbed, and abused, without their retaliating, or uttering the least complaint. Religion seems to render them insensible to every kind of insult; and hence they are sometimes called the Harmless Dunkers.

Their dress, which is very plain, seems to be peculiar to themselves, and chiefly to resemble that of the Dominican friars. It consists of a long white tunic or coat, reaching down to their heels; a sash, or leathern girdle, round their waist; a cap, or hood, hanging from the shoulders, which serves instead of a hat; thick shoes; and very wide breeches. The men never shave the head or beard. They live chiefly on roots and other vegetables; because they suppose that Christianity teaches an aversion to blood. However, on particular occasions, when they hold what they call a love-feast, the brethren and sisters dine together, and eat mutton, but no other kind of meat. In each of their little cells they have a bench fixed for the purpose of a bed, and a small block of wood for a pillow. Each individual follows with cheerfulness the branch of business allotted to him; and the produce of their labour is deposited in a common stock, in order to supply the necessities of every member. Though the sexes live separate, the Dunkers do not, on that account, foolishly renounce matrimony, and become like monks, as some have asserted; but they who are disposed to marry leave the town, and form an establishment in the country, which is supported at the public expence. This is afterwards repaid by the produce of their labours, which is put into the public treasury; and their children are sent to be educated in the mother country.

The doctrines of the Dunkers seem to be a mixture of those of the Baptists, Universalists, Calvinists, Lutherans, Jews, Methodists, and Roman Catholics. They lament the fall of our first parent, which, they say, might have been avoided, if Adam had preferred the celestial Sophia to Eve for his wife; but they deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity. They use the trine immersion in baptism, with the laying on of hands in prayer, even when the person baptized is in the water.

They deny the eternity of future punishments, and believe that the dead have the Gospel preached to them by our Saviour, and that the souls of the just are employed to preach the Gospel to those who have had no revelation in this life. But the following appears to be their principal tenet:—That future happiness is only to be obtained by penance and outward mortification in this life; and that as Jesus Christ, by his meritorious sufferings, became the redeemer of mankind in general, so each individual of the human race, by a life of abstinence and restraint, may work out his own salvation. They even admit of works of supererogation, and declare that a man may do much more than he is in justice or equity obliged to do, and that, therefore, his superabundant works may be applied towards accomplishing the restoration of others. They use the same form of government, and the same discipline, as the English Baptists, except that every person is allowed to speak in public, and the best speaker is usually ordained to be their minister. They have also deacons and deaconesses, from the number of their ancient widows, who may employ their gifts, and exhort at appointed times.

This sect is peculiar to America, and confined to Euphrata, or, at least, to the neighbourhood of Pennsylvania, and to Upper Canada, where a few Dunkers now reside. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 429. Hannah Adams's View of Religions, p. 128. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 538.

E.

EAGLE, נֶשֶׁךְ nescher, ἀετός. This bird is frequently mentioned in Scripture. It is unclean, with all its species, including the vulture, the hawk, kite, and other birds of prey.

In Psalm ciii. 5. it is said, 'Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.' Respecting the renewed youth of the eagle, the conjectures of commentators have been various. But the youth of the eagle is, probably, that renovation of health and spirits, which is experienced by this bird after moulting. The eagle is a long-lived bird; and this renewal of youth might, perhaps, be a familiar phrase.

Moses says (Exod. xix. 4.) that 'God delivered his people out of Egypt, and bore them upon eagles' wings;' and (Deut. xxxii. 11.) that the Lord led his people, 'as an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings.' It is, however, probable, that the word racham, rendered eagle by translators, is by no means of this class of birds; it should seem to be a water-bird. There is a bird in Egypt called racham, which is supposed by many to be that alluded to by Moses. It is a kind of domesticated vulture, which feeds on the carrion and refuse of the city of Cairo; but it does not appear that travellers have noticed any uncommon affection for its young, or any decisive manners which determine this bird to be that intended by Moses. Besides, the racham of Moses should seem to be a water-fowl, which we are not told that this Egyptian racham, or vulture is. Some have thought that the flamingo, or phenicopteros of the Greeks, is the racham of Moses. It is said to inhabit the Nile, to be common in Africa, and to be very careful of its nest and young.

In Micah (i. 16.) it is said, 'Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle.' This may refer to the eagle which is mentioned by Mr. Bruce in his Travels, vol. v. p. 155, and the crown of whose head is said to have been bare or bald, as well as the front where the bill or skull joined. If so, the prophet advises to extend the baldness of mourning over the whole head, as this bird's baldness occupies not only the crown of his head, but also his forehead. However, Onkelos renders the word naked, which leads us to the vulture; and in this he is supported by the Septuagint and Vulgate.

Our Saviour in the Gospel alludes to Job xxxix. 29, 30: 'Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.' In common, eagles do not eat carrion, but vultures do, and prefer it. This is the literal meaning of Job; but our Saviour uses it figuratively, intimating that where the body of the Jewish people were assembled, that is, at Jerusalem, there would the Roman eagles follow, and consume them. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cclxxxvii. p. 187. Scripture Illustrated.

EARS. The servant who renounced the privilege of freedom, in the sabbatical year, had his ear pierced with an awl, at his master's door, in the presence of the judges. (Exod. xxi. 6. Deut. xv. 16, 17.) The Psalmist, speaking in the person of the Messiah, says, 'Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened.' The Hebrew reads, 'Mine ears hast thou digged,' hast thou opened, removed impediments, and made attentive; or, thou hast pierced them, as those of such servants were pierced, who chose to remain with their masters; or, thou hast dug my ears in their form and structure, as they are sunk deep in the head. St. Paul (Heb. x. 5.) reads, 'A body hast thou prepared me;' and in this manner we find the passage in the Septuagint, and the generality of the ancient fathers. Is not to dig the ears by formation equivalent to preparing a body? One action seems to imply the other.

The Lord says to Isaiah (vi. 10.) 'Make the hearts of this people fat, and make their ears heavy;' perhaps, repeat thy admonitions to them till their ears are tired of them; or, tell them, that I will suffer them to harden their hearts, and stop their ears against my word. The Scripture sometimes says, that the prophets do what they only foretell.

EARTH is used in the following senses: 1. For that gross element which sustains and nourishes us; which nourishes plants and fruits; is barren, watered, &c.; for the continent as distinguished from the sea. 'God called the dry land earth.' (Gen. i. 10.) 2. For that rude matter which existed in the beginning. 'God created the heaven and the earth;' the matter of all sensible beings. (Gen. i. 1.)

3. For the terraqueous globe, and its contents, men, animals, plants, metals, waters, &c. 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.' (Ps. xxiv. 1.) 4. For the inhabitants of the earth, or continent. 'The whole earth was of one language.' (Gen. xi. 1.) 5. For Judea, or the whole empire of Chaldaea and Assyria. Thus Cyrus says, (Ezra i. 2.) 'The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth.' The restricted sense of this word to Judea is more common in Scripture than is usually supposed; and this acceptance of it has great effect on several passages, in which it ought to be so understood.

Hence both in the old Old and New Testaments, the word γῆ, which is sometimes rendered earth, is by the context in many places determined to mean the promised land of Israel; as, 'they be come to search out all the country,' (Septuagint τὴν γῆν, Josh. ii. 3.); 'the meek shall inherit the earth,' (γῆν, the land, Matt. v. 5.); 'great famine was throughout all the land,' (ἐπὶ πάντων τὴν γῆν, Luke iv. 25.) In like manner, οἰκουμένην, which primarily means the inhabited world, and is often so rendered, is by the connexion of the discourse restrained to a particular country, (Isaiah xlii. 5. Septuag.) and to the land of Judea. (Luke ii. 1.; xxi. 26. Acts xi. 28. James v. 17.) See CYRENIOUS.

Earth in a moral sense is opposed to heaven and spirit. 'He that is of the earth is earthly, and speaketh of the earth; he that cometh from heaven is above all.' (John iii. 31.) 'If ye then be risen with Christ, set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth.' (Col. iii. 1, 2.) Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 1, 2.

EARTHQUAKE. The Scripture speaks of several earthquakes; and, indeed, Palestine being mountainous and near the sea, is often shaken by earthquakes. One of the most remarkable is that which swallowed up Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, when the earth cleaving where their tents stood, engulfed them all. This was doubtless a miraculous event: but whether the miracle consisted in the earthquake itself, or in the circumstances attending it, is not clear. It is possible there would have been an earthquake, if Israel had not been encamped around that spot, or if Korah had not rebelled: but in that case Korah and his associates would have escaped from it. The punishment might be miraculous, though the earthquake was natural. Another earthquake is that which happened in the twenty-seventh year of Uzziah, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3221. This is mentioned in Amos, (i. 1.) and in Zechariah (xiv. 5.) Josephus says, that its violence divided a mountain which lay west of Jerusalem, and drove one part of it four furlongs.

A very memorable earthquake is that which happened at our Saviour's death, (Matt. xxvii. 51.) Many have thought that this was perceived throughout the world. Others are of opinion, that it was felt only in Judea, or even in the temple at Jerusalem. St. Cyril of Jerusalem says, that the rocks upon Mount Calvary were shown in his time, which had been rent asunder by this earthquake. Maundrell and Sandys testify the same, and say that they examined the breaches in the rock, and were convinced that they were the effects of an earthquake. It must have been terrible, since the centurion and those with him were so affected by it, as to acknowledge the innocence of our Saviour. (Luke xxiii. 47.) Phlegon, Adrian's freedman, relates that, together with the eclipse, which happened at noon-day, in the fourth year of the two hundred and second Olympiad, or A.D. 33, a very great earthquake was also felt principally in Bithynia.

Earthquake often alludes to prodigious agitations of mountains, shocks of the foundations of the universe, effects of God's power, wrath, and vengeance; but these are figurative expressions, which denote the greatness, strength, and power of God, (Psalm xviii. 7.; xlv. 2.; cxiv. 4.)

Earthquake signifies also dissolution of the powers of government in a country, or state, &c.

EAST. The Hebrews express east, west, north, and south, by before, behind, left, and right, according to the situation of a man whose face is turned eastward. By the east they describe frequently not only Arabia Deserta, Moab, and Ammon, which are truly east of Palestine, but also Assyria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldaea, which lie north-east, and north of Judea.

It is said, (Gen. xi. 1, 2.) that the sons of Noah 'departed from the east, and came into the land of Shinar.' Here difficulties have been raised; for the land of Shinar is not west of Armenia, where the ark is supposed by some to have rested, nor Armenia east of Shinar or Babylon. On the contrary, it is north of that country. To obviate these difficulties, interpreters have given different explanations of this passage. Some by Kedem, or east, have understood the country afterwards peopled by Kedemah, the youngest son of Ishmael; some, 'the beginning,' and that Moses intended to note the time, at which, after the deluge, men spread themselves into different countries; some, that Moses spoke according to the custom of the Assyrians, who called their provinces beyond the Tigris, Kedem, or east, and those on this side of that river, Arab, or west. Others, instead of they 'departed from the east,' translate, they 'departed eastward.' This last interpretation appears to some to be the true import of the passage: as (Gen. ii. 8.) a garden in Eden eastward: and thus the idolatrous Jews are described, (Ezek. viii. 16.) with their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and their faces towards the east, worshipping the rising sun, as the Gaurs, or Gabres, in Persia and India, do to this day. Yet this is not the only sense in which Kedem may be taken.

It appears from many places in the Old and New Testaments, that the sacred writers called the provinces beyond the Tigris and Euphrates (Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Persia,) Kedem or the east. Moses, who was educated in Egypt, and lived long in Arabia, might probably follow this custom; especially as Babylonia, Chaldaea, Susiana, Persia, much of Mesopotamia, and the rivers of Euphrates and Tigris, for the greatest part of their course, are east of Palestine, Egypt, and Arabia.

Besides, as those who came from Armenia, Syria, Media, and Upper Mesopotamia, entered Palestine and Egypt on the east side, the Hebrews might say, that these people lay east of them. It is evident, that these countries were known among the Hebrews by the name of east. Balaam says, (Numb. xxiii. 7.) that 'Balak, king of Moab, had brought him from the mountains of the east,' that is, from Pethor on the Euphrates. Isaiah says, (xli. 2.) that Abraham came from the east into the land of Canaan; and it is known, that he came from Mesopotamia and Chaldaea. The same prophet says, (xlvi. 11.) that Cyrus should come from the east against Babylon; and (ix. 12.) he places Syria east of Judea. St. Matthew (ii. 1.) says, that the wise men, who came to worship Christ, came from the east. All this, observes Calmet, seems to confirm the opinion, that, in the language of Scripture, the east is often used for the provinces which lie easterly, though, perhaps, inclining to the north of Judea and Egypt.

The verbal import of the word Kedem is ancient, primary, of old, the first, originally; in which sense it is perhaps applied geographically, and implies the primary province where mankind first settled. Now, if we accept the idea, which some have entertained, that the ark lodged upon the mountains of Caucasus, it will appear, that mankind journeyed strictly from the east, (Gen. xi. 2.) There is, however, another acceptation of the word east, that it signifies a specific country, or province; and this sense, in effect, will coincide with the other, since the present Bahkter signifies the east, and since Bactria, or Bactriana, was the most eastern province of the Persian empire. This province originally included other parts much more south and east; and the city Balk or Bactria, which formed a part of that province, might probably give name to it. If it be supposable, that the provinces known in very early ages by the name of Kedem, 'the east,' were afterwards known by another word denoting the east, as they are now by the name Bactria, which also denotes 'the east,' then the idea that this very country was the place whence this portion of mankind journeyed, would be rendered still more probable. Taylor's Sacred Geography; Scripture Illustrated, Exposit. Index, p. 27.

EASTER, the day on which the Christian church commemorates our Saviour's resurrection. It is not much to the honour of our translation of the New Testament, that it uses the word Easter, instead of Passover. Easter is a word of Saxon origin, and imports a goddess of the Saxons, or rather of the east. This goddess was Astarte, in honour of whom sacrifices were annually offered about the passover time of the year, the spring; and hence the Saxon name Easter became attached by association of ideas to the Christian festival of the resurrection.

About the middle of the second century, a considerable controversy arose between the eastern and western churches concerning the celebration of Easter. The Asiatic Christians, on the authority of a tradition which derived the custom from the apostle John, contended for the propriety of observing this institution on the fourteenth day of the first Jewish month, on which the Jews celebrated their passover, when they distributed a lamb in remembrance of the Last Supper, and in three days after, they commemorated the resurrection of Christ. This regulation, which confined the observance of this institution precisely to the fourteenth day of the month, whatever day of the week it might be, gave much offence to the western churches, who regarded it as extremely indecent to interrupt the solemn abstinence of the great week, and to commemorate the resurrection on any other day of the week than that on which it actually took place. In their turn, they pleaded the example of the apostles Paul and Peter. Victor, bishop of Rome, demanded from the eastern churches a compliance with the ritual of the west, and, on their resolute opposition to his command, assailed them with numberless reproaches, anathemas, and excommunications. However, this dissension, so injurious and degrading to the church, was healed by the prudent counsels of some members of the different churches. Each party retained its peculiar practices and opinions till the fourth century, when the council of Nice abolished the custom of the Asiatics, and ordered Easter to be celebrated at the same time by all the Christian churches. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol.

EATING. The ancient Hebrews did not eat indiscriminately with all persons. They would have esteemed themselves polluted and dishonoured by eating with people of another religion, or of an odious profession. In the time of Joseph, they did not eat with the Egyptians, nor the Egyptians with them, (Gen. xliii. 32.); nor, in the time of our Saviour, with the Samaritans, (John iv. 9.) The Jews were scandalized that Christ ate with publicans and sinners, (Matt. ix. 11.) As there were several sorts of meats, the use of which was not allowed them, they could not conveniently eat with those who partook of them, lest they should receive some pollution by touching such food, or any particles of it should fall upon them.

The ancient Hebrews, at their meals, had each his separate table. Joseph entertaining his brethren in Egypt, seated them separately, each at his particular table; and he himself sat down separately from the Egyptians who ate with him: but he sent to his brethren portions out of the provisions which were before him, (Gen. xliii. 31, &c.) Elkanah, Samuel's father, who had two wives, distributed their portions to them separately. (1 Sam. i. 4, 5.) The ancient manners observable in Homer, we see also in Scripture, and with regard to eating, drinking, and entertainments. We find great plenty, but little delicacy; great respect and honour paid to the guests, by serving them plentifully. Joseph sent to his brother Benjamin a portion five times larger than those of his other brethren. Samuel set before Saul a whole quarter of a calf. In entertainments with the men, the women did not appear at table. This would have been thought an indecency, as it is this day throughout the east.

The Hebrews anciently sat at table as we do at present; but they afterwards imitated the Persians and Chaldæans, who lay down on table-beds while eating. That they sat at table is evident, (Prov. xxiii. 1, &c.); and it does not appear, that the use of beds at entertainments was general among the Hebrews. At the banquet of Ahasuerus, (Esth. i. 6.) the company lay on beds; and also at that which Esther gave the king and Haman, (Esth. vii. 8.) In like manner, our Saviour lay at table when Mary Magdalene anointed his feet with perfume, (Matt. xxvi. 7.); and when John, at the Last Supper, rested his head on his bosom, (John xiii. 25.)

For want of proper discrimination in respect to the attitude at table, several passages of the Gospels are rendered unintelligible. We are told in Luke, (vii. 37.) that "a woman in the city who was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment, and stood at his feet behind him, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment." This is rendered intelligible only by considering that our Saviour lay on the bed while eating; and that his feet being outermost, might be easily saluted, or otherwise treated, by a person standing behind them. See also John xii. 3.; xiii. 5, &c. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. civ. p. 6.

E'BAL, עֵבֶל, ἑβὲλ, signifies a heap, or collection of old age; or a mass that runs away, and disperses. Ebal was a mountain in Ephraim, near Shechem, over against Mount Gerizim. These two mountains are separated by a valley of about two hundred paces wide, in which stands the town of Shechem. Both mountains are much alike in length, height, and form. They are not more than half a league in length. But if they are alike in some particulars, in others they are very unlike; for Ebal is barren, and Gerizim is beautiful and fertile.

Moses commanded Israel, as soon as they had passed the Jordan, to go to Shechem, and divide into two bodies, each composed of six tribes, one placed upon, or adjacent to, Ebal, the other upon, or adjacent to, Gerizim. The six tribes upon, or at Gerizim, were to pronounce blessings on those who should faithfully observe the law; and the six upon Mount Ebal were to pronounce curses against those who should violate it. This Joshua executed, in the year of the world 2553. (Josh. viii. 30, 31.) Moses enjoined them to erect an altar of unhewn stones upon Mount Ebal, and to plaster them over that the law might be written on the altar. But the Samaritan Pentateuch, instead of Ebal, reads Gerizim; because the altar, sanctuary, &c. of the Samaritans were, and are at this day, upon Mount Gerizim. The Scripture seems at first to intimate that six entire tribes were upon one mountain, and six upon the other; but, besides that the tribes were too numerous to stand upon these two mountains, it was not possible for them to see the ceremony, nor to hear the blessings and curses, in order to answer to them. The Hebrew particle signifies near, over against, as well as at the top of. (Josh. viii. 33.) With respect to the great stones set up and plastered over, to receive the law, expositors are not agreed whether this monument was the altar on which the peace-offerings were sacrificed. It would appear, however, by comparing verses 30—32. with Deut. xxvii. 2—5. that the altar is distinguished from the pile formed by the stones.

EBIONITES, a sect who appeared in the second century, and whose tenets were considered as destructive of the fundamental principles of Christianity. It is not certain whence the Ebionites derived their name, whether from that of their leader, or from their poverty. Though they believed the celestial mission of Christ, and his participation of a Divine nature, yet they regarded him as a man born of Joseph and Mary, according to the ordinary course of nature. They likewise asserted, that the ceremonial law instituted by Moses, was obligatory not only upon the Jews, but also upon all others, and that the observance of it was essential to salvation. They observed both the Jewish Sabbath, and the Lord's-day; and in celebrating the eucharist, they used unleavened bread. They abstained from the flesh of animals, and even from milk. They rejected the Old Testament, and in the New Testament received only the Gospel of St. Matthew. They made great use of a book which they denominated 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews.' Traces of this sect appeared so late as the fourth century. It has been contended whether the Nazarenes and Ebionites were the same, or a different sect. Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestley, by Bishop Horsley; Mosheim, vol. i. pp. 173, 174.

ECBAT'ANA, אַחְמֶתָא Achmetha, 'Εκβά-rava, signifies brother of death. It was the name of a city of Media, built by Dejoces, king of the Medes, and encompassed with seven walls of unequal heights; the largest, according to Herodotus, was equal in extent with those of Athens, being 178 furlongs, or nearly eight leagues. The battlements of these walls were of different colours. The first was white, the second black, the third red, the fourth blue, the fifth a deep red, the sixth overlaid with silver, and the seventh gilded. The First Book of Judith attributes the building of this city to Arphaxad, whom Archbishop Usher and Dr. Prideaux suppose to be the same as Dejoces, but whom Calmet thinks to be the successor of Dejoces.

In Ezra vi. 2. we read, that there was 'found at Achmetha, in the palace (that is in the province) of the Medes, a roll,' &c. The word achmetha may denote, as is observed in the margin of our Bible, a coffer, or it may be an office for records; but it is commonly understood to denote Ecbatana, the principal city of Media.

ECCLESIAS'TES, a canonical book of the Old Testament. It is called 'the words of the preacher, the son of David, king of Jerusalem,' that is, of Solomon, who, from the great excellency of his instructions, was emphatically styled the preacher. The author also describes his wisdom, his riches, his writings, and his works, in a manner applicable only to Solomon; and to the internal evidence we may add the concurrent testimony both of Christian and Jewish tradition. It is generally thought that Solomon wrote this book, after he repented of the idolatry and sin into which he fell towards the end of his life. Though of the didactic kind, it differs from the preceding book, inasmuch as it seems to be confined to a single subject, namely, an inquiry into the chief good. Solomon here introduces himself as discussing this important question; and by a just and comprehensive consideration of the circumstances of human life, he points out the vanity of all secular pursuits, in a manner not to excite a peevish disgust of this world, but to induce us to prepare for that state in which there will be no 'vanity or vexation of spirit.' It is very difficult to distinguish the arrangement and connexion of the parts of this work; and there is so little of elevation or dignity in its language, that the Rabbins will not allow it to be reckoned among the poetical books of Scripture. That this work was written after Solomon repented of his idolatry and sin, appears from the marks of repentance contained in it. He tells us that he had studied every gratification, and had denied himself no pleasure, but that he had found only vanity. He closes his inquiry after worldly happiness, by saying, 'Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.' Bishop Tomline's Elements of Theology, vol. i. p. 103; Du Pin's History of the Canon.

ECLECTICS, certain philosophers who, though they held Plato in the highest esteem, yet scrupled not to join with his doctrines whatever they thought conformable to reason in the tenets and opinions of others. The founder of this sect was Potamon, an Alexandrian, who had become weary of doubting of all things, with the Sceptics and Pyrrhonians. It appears that this philosophy was in a flourishing state at Alexandria in the time of our Saviour. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 30, &c.

ECTHESIS, an edict issued by the emperor Heraclius, in the year 639, for the purpose of composing the troubles occasioned by the Eutychian heresy. This Ecthesis, or confession of faith, prohibited all controversies on the question whether in Christ there were one or two operations; though in the same edict the doctrine of one will was plainly inculcated. A considerable number of the eastern bishops declared their assent to this law, which was also submissively received by Pyrrhus, the new patriarch of Constantinople. In the west, the case was quite different. The Roman pontiff, John IV., assembled a council at Rome, A.D. 641, in which the Ecthesis was rejected, and the Monothelites were condemned. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. pp. 33, 34.

E'DEN, עֵדֶן, signifies pleasure, or delights, and was a province of Asia, in which Paradise was situated. (Gen. ii. 8.) Many attempts have been made to fix the site of the garden of Eden. Some have placed it in Syria. Huetius supposed it to have been in Babylonia, near the mouth of the river Euphrates. Reland conjectured, that it was situated in Armenia, where issue the heads of the Euphrates and Tigris, two of the Paradisaical rivers, well ascertained; and two others whose springs are in the neighbourhood, agree in many respects with the third and fourth rivers mentioned by Moses. This last opinion has been chiefly adopted. Captain Wilford, however, has given the Indian account of the situation of Eden, published in the Asiatic Researches. By this account it appears, that, 'according to an uniform tradition of very long standing, as it is countenanced by the Hindu sacred books, and Persian authors, the progenitors of mankind lived in that mountainous tract, which extends from Bálkh and Candáhár to the Ganges: we may then reasonably look for the terrestrial Paradise in that country; for it is not probable, that Adim'a and Ioa should have retired to any great distance from it.' See PARADISE. Sacred Geography.

EG/LON, עֵלֹן, signifies heifer, chariot, round. Eglon, king of Moab, oppressed Israel eighteen years. (Judg. iii. 12, 13, 15.) In conjunction with the Ammonites and Amalekites he advanced to the city of palm-trees, that is Jericho or Engedi, which he took, and where was his usual residence. The Lord delivered Israel from his oppression by the hand of Ehud.

E'GYPT, מִצְרַיִם, Mizraim, Αἴγυπτος, signifies that binds or straitens, or that troubles or oppresses. Egypt, a country of Africa, is situated between the forty-eighth and fifty-third degrees of longitude, and the twenty-fourth and thirty-third degrees of north latitude: its length, from north to south, is nearly six hundred miles; and the breadth of its coast on the Mediterranean, from east to west, about three hundred miles; but it grows much narrower about the division of the Nile. The boundaries of this country are, the kingdom of Sennar, and the cataracts of the Nile on the south; the Mediterranean Sea on the north; the Red Sea and the Isthmus of Suez on the east; and a region of Libya, called Marmarica, on the west. The name by which Egypt is commonly denoted in Scripture is the land of Mizraim, who was a son of Ham; and hence the Arabians and other oriental nations still call it Misr. The reason of its being denominated Egypt is variously accounted for.

Egypt is frequently divided into three parts, distinguished by the appellations of the Upper Egypt, or Thebais; the Middle Egypt, or Heptanomis; and the Lower Egypt, which includes the Delta. If, however, we adhere to the opinion received among the Greeks, we are to consider the whole of Egypt, commencing from the Cataract, and the city Elephantina, as divided into two parts, with distinct appellations: the one belonging to Libya, and the other to Asia. These may be called Western and Eastern Egypt. This may throw some light on the expression, (Ezek. xxix. 10.) 'I will make the land of Egypt waste from the tower of Syene to the border of Cush,' meaning the Cush on the Red Sea. This threat, therefore, includes the eastern district of Egypt according to the Greeks; and it begins as the Greeks began 'from the tower of Syene,' which is opposite to the island of Elephantina, along the confines of Cush, that is, running up the Red Sea, from the port of Berenice south, to Suez and Colsum north. This gives a different meaning to the denunciation of the prophet, 'no foot of man or beast shall pass through (rather across) it,' that is from the Nile to the Red Sea, from Coptos to Berenice or Kosseir, as the caravans of merchants with their goods used to pass, 'neither shall it be inhabited forty years.' We know of no interval in which this has happened to Egypt, generally taken; but it is very credible, that after the ravages of Nebuchadnezzar, and till the death of Cambyses, this tract of mercantile conveyance was stopped, and the foot of man or beast did not pass that way in conveying goods. The passage by this road was afterwards very much promoted by the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt. In confirmation of this division of Egypt into two parts, it is observable, that this country is usually spoken of in the dual number, even when the word land is connected with it. (Ezek. xxx. 13.)

Besides the division of the country of Egypt into two parts, we ought also to notice one or more cities of this name. After Ezekiel had spoken of the land of Egypt with a double application, he mentions several places in this country, as Pathros, Zoan, No, Sin, the strength of Egypt. He then mentions the following cities: 'I will cut off the multitude of No; and I will set fire in Egypt; Sin shall have great pain.' He also adds No, Noph, Aven, Pibeseth, and Tehaphnehes. It seems probable, that Coptos, whence some have thought the Egyptians were named Copts, is really an ancient city; but whether it might originally be denominated Misr is uncertain. The town now called Fostat, a little south of Cairo, is also denominated 'Misr el attik,' Old Misr: in situation it agrees sufficiently with the Misr of Moses, to justify the idea that not far from it stood, in ancient times, a city of the same name. It is evident, that in the early part of Exodus, a distinction is ob-observed. Sometimes 'Egypt' is mentioned without addition; and sometimes the phrase is 'the land of Egypt.' Besides, the transactions are occasionally too rapid to admit of any interval of country between Pharaoh and Moses. In Exodus ix. 29, Moses says, 'As soon as I am gone out of the city,' and at verse 33, 'Moses went out of the city;' but no city is mentioned in this history, unless it be Misr. With this double acceptance of the word agrees also the Hindoo account; and the Hebrew word aretz, rendered land, seems to be used like the Persian and Hindoo sthan, which is of the same import. But, Misra sthan denotes, 1. the country of Egypt at large; 2. the city of Misr. It would seem, indeed, that one of these cities of Misr was on the island, called the land of Egypt; the other on the eastern shore opposite to the former; and that both together are denominated, in the dual, Mizraim.

The inhabitants of Egypt may be considered as including three distinctions: 1. the Copts, or descendants of the ancient Egyptians; 2. the Fellahs or husbandmen, who probably represent the people called Phul in Scripture; 3. the Arabs, or conquerors of the country, including the Turks, Mamelukes, &c. The Copts have seen so many revolutions in the governing powers, that they concern themselves very little with respect to the successes or misfortunes of those who aspire to dominion. The Fellahs suffer so much oppression, and are so despised by the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, and by their despotic rulers, that they seldom acquire property, and very rarely enjoy it in security. The Arabs hate the Turks; yet the Turks fill most offices of government, but hold their authority by no very certain tenure.

The fertility of Egypt, and the excellence of its productions and fruits, are much celebrated by ancient writers, and by Moses himself (Gen. xiii. 10.) This fertility depends on the annual inundation of the Nile, which obtains its increase from Ethiopia and Abyssinia.

The Scripture calls Egypt the land of Ham, (Psalm cv. 27.) but so was the whole of the African continent denominated. It is also called the land of Misr, in the singular, in the opinion of some of the most learned commentators, (2 Kings xix. 24. Isa. xix. 6.; xxxvii. 25. Micah vii. 12.); in every other place it is written Mizraim, in the plural. This plural arose from the division of the country into north and south, or east and west; which division appears to be of the earliest antiquity. There can be no doubt that Egypt was peopled from the east; but the tribes which first entered it seem to have been under no regular guide. After Ham had founded in Asia several potent kingdoms, he might visit Africa, and his son Mizraim might govern Egypt. However, we find that Egypt was peopled in the time of Abraham, and also governed by a Pharaoh. The Hamites, who settled in the provinces allotted to the posterity of Shem, probably expelled the Shemites, and were the cause of their transmigration into Egypt. At least, appearances indicate, that the Pharaohs of Egypt spoke the same language as Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph; and that Jehovah, the God of these patriarchs, was not to them unknown. Between the periods of Joseph's exaltation in Egypt, and the Exodus of Israel, perhaps an invasion of Egypt by the Palli or shepherds from India took place, and to this race we might probably refer that 'king which knew not Joseph.' We read little more of Egypt in Scripture for many ages, till the kings of Israel had official intercourse with that country.

The ancient history of Egypt is narrated in so fabulous a manner, that, however it may be founded in truth, it is impossible to separate truth from falsehood. The Egyptians claimed an antiquity of ten, twenty, or even fifty thousand years. They affirmed that their country was originally governed by gods, and that their first mortal king was Menes. We know not what length of time answered to that which is termed a year; nor whether the same word which is rendered gods did not also signify judges, as it does in the Hebrew. It cannot be ascertained whether Noah was the Menes of the Egyptians; or whether this term does not import son of Nueh, and consequently denote either Ham or Mizraim. Opinion may safely rest on the latter. From him the Egyptians deduced a list of kings, comprising about 330 in 1400 years. Of these princes the Scripture has given us the proper names of four only; Shishak, Necho, So, and Hophrah. Others are designated by the name of Pharaoh only, which is allowed to be a title of dignity, honour, exaltation, and is probably analogous to that of Highness among ourselves.

In the government of Egypt, established by Selim, who conquered this country in 1517, the Mamelukes possess a considerable share of power. It is impossible to be acquainted with the history of Egypt, without perceiving the import and fulfilment of the prediction recorded by Ezekiel, (xxx. 13.) who says, that there never should be any more a reigning prince of the Egyptian nation over this country. Egypt was to be a base kingdom: and what can be more base than a government composed of rulers who have been slaves, and the property of others? The governors of Egypt are not hereditary, nor elective by the people, nor promoted through merit; but, degraded by the foulest of crimes, as well political as personal, they raise themselves by intrigue, from the lowest stations. Sacred Geography; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. lxxxix. p. 149.

EGYPT, River of. This stream was the limit of Judea towards Egypt. That which in Isaiah (xxvii. 12.) is rendered 'unto the river of Egypt,' is translated in the Septuagint 'to Rhinocolura.' This town was certainly distant from the Nile, the proper river of Egypt. In confirmation of this idea it may be observed, that it is very doubtful whether the power of the Hebrew nation ever extended to the Nile, and if it did, it was over a mere desert. As this desert is indisputably the natural boundary of the Syrian dominions, no reason can be assigned why the political boundary should exceed it. Sacred Geography.

ELCESAITES, a denomination in the reign of Trajan, in the second century. They derived their name from Elcesai, their leader. His fundamental doctrine was, that Jesus Christ, who was born from the beginning of the world, had appeared from time to time under different bodies. The Elcesaites were an absurd sect, who grafted many opinions derived from the oriental philosophy on a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. History of Religion, vol. iv. Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. i. p. 103.

ELDERS OF ISRAEL, the heads of tribes, or rather of the great families in Israel, who, before the settlement of the Hebrew commonwealth, had a government and authority over their families, and the people. When Moses was sent into Egypt to deliver Israel, he assembled the elders of Israel, and told them that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, had appeared to him. (Exod. xii. 16. 21.; iv. 29, &c.) Moses and Aaron treat the elders of Israel as the representatives of the whole nation. When God gave the law to Moses, he said, (Exod. xxiv. 1. 9, 10.) 'Take Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, his sons, and the seventy elders of Israel, and worship ye afar off.' They advanced to the foot of the mountain. On all subsequent occasions, we find this number of seventy elders is mentioned. But it has been thought probable, that as there were twelve tribes, there were seventy-two elders, six from each tribe, and that seventy are mentioned instead of seventy-two; or that Moses and Aaron were added to the number of seventy, and there were only four elders of the tribe of Levi. Some, among whom is Grotius, have been of opinion, that these seventy elders formed a kind of senate in Egypt, and that hence was derived the famous Sanhedrim in later ages. But Calmet thinks it more credible, that in the beginning, each of these elders exercised over his respective tribe, and all together over the whole people, a jurisdiction similar only to that which fathers of families exercise over their children, and which is founded on the respect and obedience due to parents.

After Jethro's arrival in the camp of Israel, Moses made a considerable change in the government of the people. He established over Israel heads of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, that justice might be readily administered; and only difficult cases were referred to Moses. (Exod. xviii. 24, &c.) However, when the people murmured at the encampment called the Graves of Lust, (Numb. xi.) Moses appointed seventy elders of Israel, to whom God communicated part of that legislator's spirit, and who began to prophesy, and did not afterwards cease. This, according to the generality of interpreters, was the beginning of the Sanhedrim. The establishment of the seventy elders by Moses continued not only during his life, but also under Joshua, and the judges. But we are not much acquainted with the authority of these elders under the judges, and still less with it under the kings who succeeded the judges. See SANHEDRIM.

ELDERS is also a name given to certain laymen in the Presbyterian discipline, who are ecclesiastical officers, and in conjunction with the ministers and deacons compose the kirk sessions in Scotland. The number of elders is proportioned to the extent and population of the parish, and is seldom less than two or three, but sometimes exceeds fifty. 'They are laymen in this respect, that they have no right to teach, or to dispense the sacraments; and on this account they form an office in the Presbyterian church inferior in rank and power to that of pastors. They generally discharge the office, which originally belonged to the deacons, of attending to the interests of the poor. But their peculiar business is expressed by the name ruling elders; for in every question of jurisdiction within the parish, they are the spiritual court, of which the minister is officially moderator; and in the Presbytery, of which the pastors of all the parishes within its bounds are officially members, lay-elders sit as the representatives of the several sessions or consistories.'

It has long been a matter of dispute whether any such officers as lay-elders are mentioned in Scripture. It appears certain, however, that the elders mentioned by St. Paul (1 Tim. v.) did not hold the same office as those in the Presbyterian churches, but 'laboured in the word and doctrine.' In this place, the apostle seems to mean only ministers, when he directs that double honour should be paid to the elders that rule well, especially those who labour in the word and doctrine; and the distinction does not appear to consist in the order of officers, but in the degree of their diligence, faithfulness, and eminence, in laboriously fulfilling their ministerial duties. It is said, that Calvin admitted lay-elders into church courts, on what he conceived to be the sanction of primitive practice, and 'as an effectual method of preventing the return of inordinate power in a superior order of clergy.' To this it is answered by Episcopalians, that neither the name nor office of lay-elder was ever known to any general or provincial council, or even to any particular church in the world before the time of Calvin. *Dr. Hill's Theolog. ELECTION, the choosing, appointing, or separating, of any person or thing to some particular purpose. The doctrine of absolute election, as held by some Christian sects, appears to be unscriptural, and in different ages of the church has been the fruitful source of a great variety of controversies. God is represented in Scripture as having pre-ordained the redemption of mankind through Christ, before the foundation of the world. This redemption was to be in the nature of a covenant between God and man; and the salvation of every individual was to depend on his observance of the proposed conditions. Men, in consequence of their free agency, would have it in their power to accept or reject this offered salvation; and God, by his prescience, foresaw who would accept or reject it. We cannot, indeed, suppose that a Being of infinite justice and mercy would arbitrarily select out of his rational creatures a determinate number on whom he would bestow the blessing of eternal happiness, while he consigned all the rest to eternal punishment, or passed them over as unworthy of his regard and attention. Such an idea of election ought surely to be rejected. We are to consider men as elect according to the foreknowledge of God, that is, as he foresaw they would be obedient to his laws.

'The errors and vain disputes,' says Mr. Pyle, 'that have arisen in the latter ages of Christianity concerning faith and works, justification and sanctification, election and reprobation, that have distracted the minds of many Christians, have proceeded from applying particular phrases or passages in the Epistles to particular persons, which originally referred to the state and condition, not of particular persons, but of whole churches in their collective capacity. Thus the body of heathens, while in their heathen state, are called aliens, strangers, enemies to God, &c.; but such of them as were converted (the churches to whom the apostles wrote) are styled no longer strangers, but of the household of God, a chosen or elected generation, a royal priesthood, justified, sanctified, saints, &c. So the major part of the Jewish nation, who obstinately rejected the Gospel of Christ, instead of being any longer the holy nation, the people of God, are called the vessels of wrath, fitted (by their own obstinacy) for destruction, reprobate; while the believing Jews became vessels of mercy, fore-ordained, to be called into the kingdom or covenant of the Gospel, chosen to eternal life; which expressions mean no more than their having been offered the means and opportunities of attaining to the future happiness of heaven, by their knowledge and practice of Christ's religion. Their actual enjoyment of future happiness depended entirely on their virtuous obedience to the Gospel; on their diligence to make their calling and election sure, that is, effectual to their salvation. No private persons are ever mentioned in these writings as elected to eternal life by any absolute decree of God. Paul was a chosen vessel; but he was chosen as a proper minister of Christ's Gospel, to bear his name to the Gentiles; his being chosen to the crown of life hereafter, was the fruit of his earnest endeavours to keep the faith, (his fidelity) to finish his course, and of his labouring abundantly. To take these expressions otherwise, is to pervert the design of these writings.'

It is observed by Dr. Clarke, 'that the true Scripture doctrine of election and reprobation is this, that it pleased the Almighty, of his own free grace and mercy, to determine, before the world was, to invite the Gentiles, as well as Jews, to repentance and faith in his only-begotten Son, at the time appointed for his appearing among men; and it pleased him to decree, that all who should obey his invitation, should be assisted here with his grace, and obtain eternal glory; whilst those who abused and rejected his mercy, should suffer the severe punishments due to their impenitency, both in this world and the next. So that this decree is both general and conditional; it does not personally relate to any one, but in general to all, to whom the glad tidings of the Gospel have been brought. And as to another life, it is not absolute, without regard to the actions of men; but conditionally founded on their faith and obedience. The divulging the Gospel to some men and nations and not to others, is matter of mere grace and favour, and is to be resolved into the divine wisdom and goodness. No man can merit this at the hands of God, for all have sinned and offended him. But the election of those who embrace the faith, thereby to inherit the promises hereafter, will depend on their having on the wedding-garment of faith and charity; for those rewards will be distributed to every man, only according to his works.' Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. p. 369; Pyle's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans; Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 299, 300, &c.; Mesurier's Sermon on Predestination and Assurance.

E'LI, אֵלִי, signifies elevation, offering. Eli, high-priest, of the race of Ithamar, died in the year of the world 2888, having been forty years judge of Israel. (1 Sam. iv. 18.) He succeeded Abdon, and was succeeded by Samuel, in the government; but in the high priesthood by his third son Ahitub. How Eli came to possess the high priesthood, and by what means this dignity was transferred from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, from which Eli was descended, we are not informed. Some think this was done on account of the negligence, the minority, or want of proper qualifications, of Eleazar's family. Others say, that this dignity was bestowed on him as judge of Israel. That it was not done without an express declaration of God's will, appears from the language of the man of God, who was sent to reproach him with the ill conduct of his sons. (1 Sam. ii. 27, &c.)

The great fault of Eli was his negligence, and his indulgence of his sons. Instead of vigorously punishing them, and removing them from the sacred ministry, he was satisfied with reprimanding them. God admonished him by Samuel, then a child; and Eli received those awful admonitions with a mind fully resigned to the Divine will. 'It is the Lord,' said he, 'let him do what seemeth him good.' God deferred the execution of his vengeance twenty-seven years. At length, however, Hophni and Phinehas, the sons of Eli, were slain by the Philistines; the ark of the Lord was taken; and Eli himself, hearing this melancholy news, fell backwards from his chair, and broke his neck, in the ninety-eighth year of his age. (1 Sam. iv. 12—18.)

ELIE'ZER, אֱלִיעֶזֶר, signifies help, or court of my God. The Mahometans believe that Eliezer was a black slave given to Abraham by Nimrod. Abraham conceived such regard for him, that he gave him the superintendence of his whole family, and before the birth of Isaac designed him for his heir. Gen. xv. 2. is thus translated in our Bible: 'I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer, of Damascus.' In the original it is as follows: 'And the son of the steward of my house, is this Damascus-(born) Eliezer.' The omission of the word son in our Bible, shows that the translators had considered the passage as interpolated by that word. Schultens renders it 'filius pectinationis domus meæ,' the son of combing of my house, that is, who keeps it in order. Mr. Parkhurst renders it, not without difficulty, 'the son of him who runs about my house, (that is as overseer) is my help.' These harshnesses, and some other differences of versions, prove that the passage is obscure. Now, if our translators had considered the word steward, instead of son, as supplementary, or rather explanatory, the passage would have been as follows: 'I go childless; and the son of my house (the steward) is this Eliezer, of Damascus.' This would have rendered the passage at least in conformity to the usages of the East. The phrase 'son of my house,' which has been the stumbling-block to translators, signifies in the eastern countries the freed man, who had been patronized by his master, and is sometimes called the child of the house. Hence we may infer, that Eliezer, who was a native of Damascus, had been purchased as a slave by Abraham, and had behaved so well, that his master gave him his liberty, and at length promoted him to the superintendence of all his property. A similar occurrence took place with respect to Joseph. (Gen. xxxix.)

When Abraham sent Eliezer into Mesopotamia, he said to him, Put thy hand under my thigh, and promise with an oath that thou wilt not take a Canaanite for a wife unto my son; but go into the country where my relations live, and there take a wife to my son Isaac. Eliezer departed with many camels and rich presents, and went to the city of Nahor, in Mesopotamia, whence he brought Rebecca for Isaac. (Gen. xxiv.) Whether Eliezer might live so long as to be the person here mentioned is uncertain; but by his fidelity he seems likely to have been the same person, and so he is usually understood. The passage is, 'And Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had;' in which he is not called the 'son of the house,' possibly because Isaac was now the natural heir of Abraham. If it be supposed that this was not Eliezer, the omission of the name, &c. in the history, may countenance the supposition. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Diet. No. xliii. p. 75.

ELIJAH, אֵלִיָּהוּ, signifies God the Lord. Elijah or Elias, a prophet, was a native of Tishbe beyond Jordan in Gilead. Some think that he was a priest descended from Aaron, and say that one Sabaca was his father: but this has no authority. He was raised up by God, to be set like a wall of brass, in opposition to idolatry, and particularly to the worship of Baal, which Jezebel and Ahab supported in Israel. The Scripture introduces Elijah saying to Ahab, (1 Kings xvii. 1.) in the year of the world 3092, 'As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word.' It is remarkable, that the number of years is not here specified; but in the New Testament, we are informed, that it was three years and six months. By the prohibition of dew as well as rain, the whole vegetable kingdom was deprived of that moisture, without which neither the more hardy, nor more delicate, kinds of plants could shoot into herbage, or support that herbage to maturity.

The Lord commanded Elijah to conceal himself beyond Jordan, near the brook Cherith. He obeyed; and God sent ravens to him morning and evening, which brought him flesh and bread. Scheuzer observes, that he does not think the orebim of the Hebrews, rendered ravens, means the inhabitants of a town called Oreb;—nor a troop of Arabs called Orbhim; but the birds, ravens. Suppose that Elijah was concealed from Ahab in some rocky or mountainous spot, where travellers never came; and that here a number of voracious birds had built their nests upon the trees which grew around it, or upon projecting rocks, &c. These flying every day to procure food for their young, the prophet availed himself of a part of what they brought, and while they, obeying the dictates of nature, designed only to provide for their offspring, Divine Providence directed them to provide at the same time for the wants of Elijah. What, therefore, he collected, whether from their nests, from what they dropped, or brought to him, or occasionally from all these means, was enough for his daily support. ‘And the orebim furnished him bread, or flesh, in the morning, and bread, or flesh, in the evening.’ But as there were probably several of them, some might furnish bread, and others flesh, as it happened; so that a little from each formed his solitary but satisfactory meal. To such straits was the exiled prophet driven! and such was the dependence of this zealous man of God! God’s commanding the ravens, is a mode of speech used, where vocal commands were not employed. Perhaps these orebim were not strictly ravens, but rooks. The word rendered raven, includes the whole genus, among which are some less impure than the raven, as the rook. Rooks living in numerous societies are supposed by some to be the kind of birds employed on this occasion, rather than ravens, which fly only in pairs. According, however, to the Arabic version, Elijah was fed by the Orebim, or natives, who might be the descendants of Oreb, slain by Gideon. (Judg. vii. 25.) It seems, therefore, most likely, notwithstanding the opinion of Scheuzer, that some of the inhabitants of Oreb or Orbo, furnished the prophet with food, being specially and divinely directed so to do.

After a time the brook dried up, and God sent Elijah to Zarephath, a city of the Sidonians. At the city gate he met with a widow woman gathering sticks, from whom he desired a little water, adding, Bring me, I pray thee, also a morsel of bread. She answered, As the Lord liveth I have no bread, but only an handful of meal, and a little oil in a cruse; and I am gathering some sticks, that I may dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die. Elijah said, make first a little cake, and bring it me, and afterwards make for thee and thy son; for thus saith the Lord, the barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth. His prediction was accomplished, and he dwelt at the house of this widow.

Some time after, the son of this woman fell sick, and died. The mother, overwhelmed with grief entreated the assistance and interposition of Elijah, who, taking the child in his arms, laid him on his own bed, and cried to the Lord for the restoration of the child’s life. The Lord heard the prophet’s petition, and restored the child.

After three years of drought, the Lord commanded Elijah to show himself to Ahab. The famine being great in Samaria, Ahab sent people throughout the country, to inquire after places where they might find forage for the cattle. Obadiah, an officer of the king’s household, being thus employed, Elijah presented himself, and directed him to tell Ahab, Behold, Elijah is here! Ahab came to meet the prophet, and reproached him as the cause of the famine. Elijah retorted the charge on the king, and on his iniquities, and staked his credit and innocence on the event of a miracle from Heaven, on a sacrifice to be openly offered in the sight of Israel, who should determine between Jehovah and Baal. Ahab therefore convened the people of Israel, and 400 prophets of Baal. The prophets of Baal prepared their altar, sacrificed their bullock, placed it on the altar, and called on their gods. They leaped upon the altar, and cut themselves after their manner, crying with all their force. Elijah insulted them, and said, Cry louder, for Baal is perhaps asleep, or on a journey, and does not hear you. When mid-day was past, Elijah repaired the altar of the Lord; and with twelve stones, in allusion to the twelve tribes of Israel, he built a new altar. He then laid his bullock upon the wood, poured a great quantity of water three times upon the sacrifice and the wood, so that the water filled the trench which was dug round the altar. After this, he called on the Lord. In answer to his prayer, the Lord sent fire from heaven, and consumed the wood, the burnt sacrifice, the stones and the dust of the place, and even dried up the water in the trench. On this, all the people fell on their faces, and said, ‘the Lord he is the God.’ Elijah then excited the people to slay the false prophets of Baal.

After this, Elijah said to Ahab, go home, eat and drink, for I hear the noise of abundance of rain. Elijah went to the top of Carmel, and throwing himself on the earth, sent his servant to look toward the sea. The servant went six times without seeing any thing; but the seventh time he told his master, that he saw a cloud rising out of the sea as large as a man's hand. Elijah said to his servant, 'Go up, say unto Ahab, Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not.' The king obeyed the prophet's advice. Elijah girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab to Jezreel; and the rain fell in abundance.

Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, threatened Elijah for having slain her prophets. The prophet, therefore, fled to Beersheba, in the south of Judah, and thence into Arabia Petrea. In the evening, being extremely fatigued, he laid himself down under a juniper-tree, and prayed God to take him out of the world. An angel touched him, and said, Arise and eat. He arose, and saw a cake baked on the coals, and a cruse of water; and he ate and drank, and slept again. The angel awakened him, and said, Rise and eat, for the journey is too great for thee. He rose, ate and drank, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb, the mount of God.

When he was come thither, he lodged in a cave, and the Lord said to him, What dost thou here Elijah? He answered, I have been very jealous for the Lord of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I only am left, and they seek my life to take it away. The Lord said, Go forth, and stand at the entrance of the cave. While he stood there, a strong wind passed by, but the Lord was not in the wind; after the wind, the earth trembled, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; after the earthquake was a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; after this fire was the breathing of a gentle wind, which when Elijah heard, he immediately prostrated himself on the earth, and covered his face in his mantle. The Lord asked him as before, What dost thou here Elijah? And he repeated his former answer. The Lord said to him, Return to the wilderness of Damascus, anoint Hazael king over Syria, and Jehu king over Israel, and appoint Elisha thy successor in the prophetic office. Whosoever escapeth the sword of Hazael, shall Jehu slay: and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay. Do not think, that thou only hast continued faithful to my covenant; for I have reserved seven thousand men in Israel, who have not bowed their knees to Baal, who have not adored him by lifting up their hands to their mouths and kissing them. Elijah, therefore, departing from Horeb, went into the tribe of Ephraim, and called Elisha.

Some years after, Ahab having seized Naboth's vineyard, and Jezebel having condemned that honest Israelite, the Lord commanded Elijah to reproach Ahab with the crime he had committed. Elijah met him going to Naboth's vineyard to take possession of it, and said, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall they lick thy blood, even thine. And the dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel.

Ahaziah, king of Israel, being hurt by a fall from the platform of his house, sent to consult Baalzebub, the god of Ekron, whether he should recover. Elijah met the messengers, and said to them, Is it because there is no God in Israel that ye go to inquire of Baalzebub, the god of Ekron? Now therefore saith the Lord, Thou shalt surely die. The messengers of Ahaziah returned, and informed the king, that a stranger had told them he should certainly die; and Ahaziah knew that this was the prophet Elijah. The king, therefore, sent a captain to him with his company of fifty men; and when the officer was come to Elijah, who was sitting upon a hill, he said, 'Thou man of God, the king commands thee to come down.' Elijah answered, 'If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty.' The prophet's words were followed with the effect predicted. The king sent another captain, who was also consumed. A third captain, going to Elijah, entreated him to save him and his people's lives. Elijah, therefore, accompanied him to the king.

Elijah, understanding by Revelation, that God would soon translate him out of this world, was desirous of concealing it from Elisha, his inseparable companion. He, therefore, said to Elisha, Tarry thou here, for the Lord hath sent me to Bethel; but Elisha answered, I will not leave thee. At Bethel, Elijah said, Tarry thou here, the Lord hath sent me to Jericho; but Elisha replied, he would not forsake him. At Jericho, Elijah desired him to stay; but Elisha would not leave him. They went therefore together to Jordan, and fifty of the sons of the prophets followed them at a distance. When they were come to the Jordan, Elijah took his mantle, and with it struck the waters, which divided, and they went over on dry ground. Elijah then said to Elisha, Ask what I shall do for thee before I be taken away from thee. I pray thee, said Elisha, let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me, that is, obtain the gift of prophecy from God for me, in the same measure that thou possessest it. Double may signify like; or give me a double share in thine inheritance, a double portion of thy spirit, the gift of prophecy, and of miracles in a degree double to what thou dost possess, or to what I now possess. Elijah answered, Thou hast asked me a very hard thing: yet, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so. As they journeyed, a fiery chariot, with horses of fire, suddenly separated them, and Elijah was carried in a whirlwind to heaven. At the same time, Elisha cried out, 'My father, my father, the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.' Stackhouse says, 'the account of Elijah's ascension is not to be taken in a literal sense, since a fiery chariot and horses would not have been a vehicle so proper for a nature as yet not impregnated with immortality.' He then observes, that those, who think that angels assumed on this occasion the form of the chariot and horses, do not appear to err much.

The prophets of Jericho were convinced that the spirit of Elijah had rested on Elisha; and they went out to meet him, and desired that he would give them leave to send fifty strong men in search after Elijah. Elisha gave them leave, but told them the search would be useless.

Eight years after the miraculous ascension of Elijah, a letter of reproof, admonition, and threatening, was brought to Jehoram, king of Judah, from the prophet Elijah. Some believe, that this letter was written from the place where Elijah is at present; some, that it was sent before the prophet's translation; and others, that Jehoram dreamed this. It is, however, observable, that in 2 Chron. xxi. 12, the Masorete text reads Elisha, instead of Elijah, by whom the letter to Jehoram appears to have been sent.

Elijah and Enoch are believed to be still living, and some, both Jews and Christians, imagine, that they are to come at the end of the world to encounter Antichrist: they suppose them to be the two witnesses, who 'shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth.' (Rev. xi. 3.)

The author of the book of Ecclesiasticus has dedicated an encomium to the memory of Elijah. (Eccles. xlviii.) Malachi (iv. 5, 6.) has this passage: 'Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord: and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.' Our Saviour informs us, (Matt. xi. 14.; xvii. 10, 11, 12.) that Elijah is already come in spirit, in the person of John the Baptist. The Evangelists tell us, that, in the transfiguration of our Saviour, Elijah and Moses both appeared and conversed with him respecting his future passion. (Matt. xvii. 3, 4. Mark ix. 4. Luke ix.

30.) Many of the Jews in our Lord's time believed him to be Elijah, or that the soul of Elijah had passed into the body of Jesus Christ. (Matt. xvi. 14. Mark vi. 15. Luke ix. 8.)

The Mahometans have several traditions relating to Elijah; and the Magi of Persia pretend that their master Zoroaster was one of Elijah's disciples. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Ind. pp. 109, 110; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. pp. 421, 428; Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. p. 559.

ELIS'ABETH, אלישבע, Ἐλισαβέτ, signifies God of the oath, or the oath of God, and was the name of the wife of Zacharias, and mother of John the Baptist. St. Luke, (i. 5.) tells us, that she was of the daughters of Aaron, of the race of the priests. An angel having foretold to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist, Elisabeth conceived, and for five months concealed the favour which God had done her; but the angel Gabriel discovered to the virgin Mary this miraculous conception, as an earnest and assurance of the birth of the Messiah.

Mary visited her cousin Elisabeth, and saluted her. The child with which Elisabeth was big, leaped in her womb; and Elisabeth, full of the Holy Ghost, said, 'Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.' When her child was to be circumcised on the eighth day, his mother named him John.

ELI'SHA, אלישע, signifies it is my God; otherwise, lamb of God; otherwise God that gives help. Elisha, son of Shaphat, Elijah's disciple and successor in the prophetic office, was of the city of Abelmeholah. (1 Kings xix. 16, &c.) Elijah, having received God's command to anoint Elisha as a prophet, came to Abelmeholah; and finding Elisha plowing with twelve pairs of oxen, he threw his mantle over the shoulders of Elisha, who left the oxen, and accompanied him.

In the article ELIJAH, we have observed that Elisha was following his master, when the Lord took the prophet up in a whirlwind; and that he inherited Elijah's mantle, with a double portion of his spirit. Elisha smote the waters of Jordan, and divided them; and he cured the water of a rivulet near Jericho. As he was going afterwards to Bethel, the children, rather youths, of that place ridiculed him, saying, Go up thou bald pate, go up thou bald pate. Elisha cursed them in the name of the Lord, and at the same time two bears came out of a neighbouring forest, and lacerated or wounded forty-two of them. It is usually said, that the children from Bethel who mocked Elisha, were destroyed by two bears; and Calmet, with others, tells us, the two devoured two-and-forty children. However, our own translation keeps clear of this error, and renders 'two she bears tare these children;' that is, not limb from limb, not to death, but scratched, wounded, clawed them, agreeably to the meaning of the Hebrew root (קצב), which signifies to cleave, to separate adjoining parts, to divide, in short, to tear more or less.

The kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom, having taken the field against the king of Moab, who had revolted from Israel, were in danger of perishing for want of water. Elisha was at that time in the camp; and seeing Jehoram, the king of Israel, he said, 'What have I to do with thee? get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother. As the Lord liveth, were it not out of respect to Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, who is here present, I would not so much as look on thee. But now send for a minstrel. And while this man played, the spirit of the Lord fell upon Elisha, and he said, Thus saith the Lord, make several ditches along this valley, for ye shall see neither wind nor rain, yet this valley shall be filled with water, and you and your cattle shall drink of it.'

The widow of one of the prophets told Elisha, that her husband's creditor was determined to take her two sons and sell them for slaves. Elisha multiplied the oil in the widow's house, and enabled her to discharge the debt.

Elisha went frequently to Shunem, a city of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, and was entertained by a certain matron at her house. As she had no children, Elisha promised her a son; and his prediction was accomplished. Some years after, the child died. Elisha, who was then at Mount Carmel, was solicited by the mother to come to her house. The prophet went, and restored the child.

At Gilgal, during a great famine, one of the sons of the prophets gathered wild gourds, which he put into the pot, and they were served up to Elisha and the other prophets. It was soon found that they were mortal poison; and Elisha ordered meal to be thrown into the pot, and corrected the virulence of the poison.

Naaman, general of the king of Syria's forces, having a leprosy, was advised to visit Elisha in order to be cured. Elisha appointed him to wash himself seven times in the Jordan; and by this means Naaman was perfectly healed. He returned to Elisha, and offered him large presents, which the man of God resolutely refused. But Gehazi, Elisha's servant, did not imitate the disinterestedness of his master. He ran after Naaman, and in Elisha's name begged a talent of gold, and two changes of raiment. Naaman gave him two talents. Elisha, to whom God had discovered Gehazi's action, reproached him with it, and told him, that the leprosy of Naaman should cleave to him and his family for ever.

The king of Syria, being at war with the king of Israel, could not imagine how all his designs were discovered by the enemy. He was told that Elisha revealed them to the king of Israel. He therefore sent troops to seize the prophet at Dothan; but Elisha struck them with blindness, and led them in that condition into Samaria. When they were in the city, he prayed to God to open their eyes; and after he had made them eat and drink, he sent them back to their master.

Some time after, Benhadad, king of Syria, having besieged Samaria, the famine became so extreme, that a certain woman ate her own child. Jehoram, king of Israel, imputing to Elisha these calamities, sent a messenger to cut off his head. Elisha, who was informed of this design against his life, ordered the door to be shut. The messenger was scarcely arrived, when the king himself followed, and made great complaints of the condition of the town. Elisha answered, 'To-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria.' One of the king's officers said, 'Were the Lord to open the cataracts of heaven, and rain corn from heaven, it might be so.' The prophet answered, 'Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof.' It happened according to Elisha's prediction.

Elisha sent one of the sons of the prophets to anoint Jehu, the son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, to be king, in pursuance of an order given to Elijah some years before. See АНАБ, JEHU, JEZEBEL.

Elisha falling sick, Joash, king of Israel, came to visit him, and said, 'O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof.' Elisha desired the king to bring him a bow and arrows. Joash having brought them, Elisha requested him to put his hands on the bow, and at the same time the prophet put his own hand upon the king's, and said, 'Open the window which looks east, and let fly an arrow.' The king having done this, Elisha said, 'This is the arrow of the Lord's deliverance; thou shalt be successful against Syria at Aphek.' Elisha desired him again to shoot, which he did three times, and then stopped. The man of God with some passion said, 'If thou hadst smitten five or six times, then thou hadst consumed Syria; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria only thrice.'

When Elisha died, a band of Moabites invaded the land; and it happened, that as some Israelites were going to bury a man in a field, they saw these robbers, and hastily threw the body into Elisha's grave. As soon as the body touched the bones of Elisha, the man revived, and stood up.

The manner in which Elisha healed the waters of the fountain was by casting salt into it. Now, it may be safely observed, that any quantity of salt thrown into the reservoir, or apparent issue of the waters, could not correct the offensive qualities of so much water as was then contained in it. The salt could never reach the actual source of this fountain, which we may well believe was at a distance under the earth. Even if it had been a lake exposed to the air, that by channels under ground supplied this spring, still the quantity of salt which was used by Elisha, and which is said to have been contained in a dish, could never year after year have neutralized those portions of the strata, through which the water ran. The miracle, therefore, is the more evident.

The history of the miraculous supply of water, adds another to the gracious interpositions of Divine Power. But to understand this history properly, we must notice the direction of the prophet, dig ditches in this valley. It was then a valley, where a current of water might pass, where it might be collected, or where, on digging, it might be expected to be found. The next morning after the ditches were dug, water was seen to come from the way of Edom; and these ditches, trenches, &c. being ready, received and detained the salubrious streams. The fact, therefore, proves to be, that rain had fallen at a distance, during the night, and had been providentially directed to take that course among the mountains, and after quitting them, which led to the trenches cut in the valley where Israel was encamped. That Edom was a mountainous country, we learn from Numb. xx. 23. Mal. i. 3. The inference from what has been said is, that the prophetic impulse on the mind of Elisha rather constitutes this miracle, than the actual fall of rain. On other occasions we may observe, that predictions of natural phenomena are in their nature supernatural; and that time, place, and circumstances, contribute greatly to characterize events as miraculous.

All miracles in general surpass the powers of nature; but some are greater, and of a more elevated rank than others. There is, perhaps, among them an infinity of degrees, the knowledge of which is reserved to glorified saints, and to angels. The miracle of the widow's oil multiplied by Elisha is, perhaps, one of the greatest mentioned in Scripture, and is almost the same as that performed by the prophet Elijah at Zarephath or Sarepta. (1 Kings xvii. 14.) It is, indeed, an astonishing miracle, performed immediately by an Infinite Power: whether we suppose that a drop of liquor was multiplied into twenty others of the same size, and of the same nature; or whether the air which surrounded it, or that contained in the empty vessels, was changed into oil, without suffering those processes which are necessary in the ordinary production of oil, through the pores, the glands, or the ducts of trees, appointed and formed to that purpose. In a word, this miracle surpasses the understanding of every philosopher; as indeed does the series of changes, which takes place in concocting plain rain-water into the nourishment of plants, endued with all the properties of their dissimilar juices, sweet, sour, rough, smooth, &c. This reasoning applies no less to the immediate production, or multiplication of food, in the New Testament. The oil and the meal of Elijah seem to be accretions, or prolongations, not unlike those in nature. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 112. 114. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.

EMBALMING. The ancient Egyptians, and the Hebrews in imitation of them, embalmed the bodies of the dead. Joseph ordered the body of his father Jacob to be embalmed. (Gen. l. 1, 2.) The embalming of dead bodies among the Egyptians was as follows: When a man died, his body was carried to the artificers who made coffins, and who prepared a coffin proportioned to its stature, to the dead person's quality, and to the price. The upper part of the coffin represented the person who was to be enclosed in it. A man of condition was distinguished by the figure upon the cover of the coffin; and generally suitable paintings and embellishments were added. The embalmers' prices were different: the highest was a talent; twenty minæ was moderate; and the lowest price was small. The Egyptian talent is supposed to have been worth about 300*l.* A dissector, with a very sharp Ethiopian stone, made the incision on the left side. The embalmers drew the brains of the dead person through his nostrils, with a hooked piece of iron, and filled the skull with astringent drugs. They drew all the bowels, except the heart and kidneys, through the hole in the left side. They then washed the intestines in palm wine, and in other strong and binding drugs. They anointed the body with oil of cedar, with myrrh, cinnamon, &c. about thirty days: by this means, it was preserved entire without losing its hair; and sweet, without any signs of putrefaction. After this, the body was put in salt about forty days. Therefore, when Moses says, that forty days were employed in embalming Jacob, we understand him of the days during which he continued in the salt of nitre, without including the thirty days spent in the previous ceremonies; so that in the whole, they mourned seventy days in Egypt, as Moses observes. Lastly, the body was taken out of this salt, washed, wrapt up with swaddling bands, dipt in myrrh, and rubbed with a gum which the Egyptians used instead of glue. It was then restored to the relations, who put it in a coffin, and kept it in their houses, or in tombs.

They who could not afford such expenses, contented themselves with infusing by a syringe, through the fundament, a liquor extracted from the cedar, and, leaving it there, wrapt up the body in salt of nitre. This oil preyed on the intestines so, that when it was taken out, the intestines came along with it dried, but not putrefied. The body being enclosed in nitre, grew dry. The poor only cleansed the inside, by injecting into it a certain liquor, which washed it; then put the body into nitre for seventy days to dry it.

The Scripture also mentions the embalming of Joseph, (Gen. l. 26.) which was doubtless performed after the manner of the Egyptians, since he died in that country.

In later times, where the deceased parties were persons of rank or fortune, after washing the corpse, the Jews 'embalmed it, by laying all around it a large quantity of costly spices and aromatic drugs, in order to imbibe and absorb the humours, and by their inherent virtues to preserve it as long as possible from putrefaction and decay. Thus we read that Nicodemus brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds' weight, to perform the customary office to the dear deceased. This embalming was usually repeated for several days together, that the drugs and spices thus applied might have all their efficacy in the exsiccation of the moisture and the future conservation of the body. They then swathed the corpse in linen rollers or bandages, closely enfolding and wrapping it in that bed of aromatic drugs with which they had surrounded it. Thus we find that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus 'took the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury.' (John xix. 40.) This custom we behold also in the Egyptian mummies, round which Thevenot informs us, the Egyptians have sometimes used above a thousand ells of filleting, beside what was wrapped about the head. Thus, when our Lord had cried with a loud voice, 'Lazarus come forth!' it is said, 'the dead came forth, bound hand and foot in graveclothes.' (John xi. 44.) We learn from Scripture, also, that about the head and face of the corpse was folded a napkin, which was a separate thing, and did not communicate with the other bandages in which the body was swathed. Thus we read, that the face of Lazarus was bound about with a napkin, (John xi. 44.); and when our Lord was risen, Peter, who went into the sepulchre, saw the linen clothes lie, and the napkin that had been folded round his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but wreathed together in a place by itself, lying at some distance from the rollers in which his body had been swathed, and folded up, exactly in the state it was when first wrapped round his head. (John xx. 7.) Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 519, 520.

EMBLEMS. The figurative style of writing and speaking frequently indulges in the use of hyperbolical expressions, whose prototypes do not exist in nature. In like manner, the figurative style of representation to the eye, that is of emblems and allegory, has ever claimed a prescriptive right to combine forms and figures, of whose originals nature knows nothing, but which art and genius have rendered expressive. Yet, the emblems used by the sacred writers have sometimes originals in nature more nearly similar than we are aware.

A remarkable emblem, which appears to us as an unusual and monstrous production, is that of the wheat in Pharaoh's dream, (Gen. xli. 5.) which had seven ears, full and good, on one stalk. This has always been considered as a liberty taken with nature, for the purpose of furnishing a symbol: but the fact is, that a species of wheat which grows in Egypt actually bears when perfect, this number of ears on one stalk, as its natural conformation. This wheat differs from our own, by having a solid stem, or at least a stem full of pith, in order to yield sufficient nourishment and support to so great a weight as the ears which it bears, and which demand a proportionate supply of nutritive juices. But the stem of our own wheat is a mere hollow straw. Was this the kind of corn which Isaac sowed, and reaped in one year an hundred fold? (Gen. xxvi. 12.) If it was the dorra, which sometimes yielded three hundred for one, why is it recorded as extraordinary?

Among the most remarkable conformations of symbolical animals, are those of the prophet Daniel, (vii. 7.) who, by describing creatures with horns to the number of ten, seems to us to have imagined so many monsters. However, this is not altogether the fact; and it is well to know, that in the east are races of goats, sheep, &c. which differ in the number of their horns from those common in our own country. The Persian sheep are of the many horned kinds, and are probably very mischievous and pugnacious. The prophet Daniel, therefore, in describing a goat, &c. with numerous horns, added little to his allegorical animal beyond what was in daily observation around him in the natural animals of the country where he wrote.—This applies, in part, to other al-

EMMAN'UEL, or IMMAN'UEL, a Hebrew word which signifies 'God with us.' Isaiah (vii. 14.) in that celebrated prophecy, in which he foretells to Ahaz the birth of the Messiah, from a virgin, says, 'This child shall be called, and really be, Emmanuel, God with us.' He repeats this while speaking of the enemy's army, which, like a torrent, was to overflow Judea; 'The stretching of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Emmanuel.' St. Matthew (i. 23.) informs us, that this prophecy was accomplished in the birth of Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, in whom the two natures, divine and human, were united; so that he was really Emmanuel, or 'God with us.'

ENCRATITES, or CONTINENTS, a name given to a sect in the second century, because they condemned marriage, forbade the eating of flesh, or drinking of wine, and rejected with a sort of horror all the comforts and conveniences of life. Tatian, an Assyrian, and a disciple of Justin Martyr, was the leader of this sect. He was greatly distinguished for his genius and learning, and the excessive austerity of his life and manners. He regarded matter as the fountain of all evil, and therefore recommended in a peculiar manner the mortification of the body. He distinguished the creator of the world from the Supreme Being, denied the reality of Christ's body, and blended the Christian religion with several other tenets of the oriental philosophy. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 180.

ENERGICI, a denomination in the sixteenth century, who were so called because they held that the eucharist was the energy and virtue of Jesus Christ, not his body, nor a representation of it. History of Religion, vol. iv.

EN'-GEDI, עֵינֵי גֵדִי, signifies fountain, or eye of the goat, or of happiness, and was the name of a city, which was also called Hazazon-tamar, the palm-tree city, (2 Chron. xx. 2.) there being a great number of palm trees around it. It abounded with Cyprus vines, and trees that bore balm. Solomon (Cant. i. 14.) speaks of the vineyards of Engedi. This city stood near the lake of Sodom, 300 furlongs from Jerusalem, not far from Jericho, and the mouth of the river Jordan. In some cave of the wilderness of En-gedi, David had an opportunity of killing Saul, then in pursuit of him. (1 Sam. xxiv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 18.

E'NOC'H, חֲנוֹךְ, signifies dedicated, or disciplined and well regulated. ENOCH, the son of Cain, (Gen. iv. 17.) in honour of whom the first city mentioned in Scripture was called Enoch, and was east of Eden. Huëtius was of opinion, that the city

Anuchtha, mentioned by Ptolemy in the description of Susiana, was the same as Enoch; but this opinion is controverted, or at least rendered doubtful, by Dr. Wells. Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. i. p. 23.

ENOCH, the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah, was born in the year of the world 622. He begat Methuselah at the age of sixty-five. He walked with God; and after he had lived three hundred and sixty-five years, 'he was not, for God took him.' Some construe these words, as importing, that Enoch died a natural, but untimely death; because in reality he lived not near so long as the other patriarchs of those times. But the generality of the fathers and commentators assert, that God transported him out of the sight of men, as he long after took up Elijah in a fiery chariot. St. Paul (Heb. xi. 5.) shows very clearly, that Enoch was translated, and did not see death.

Jude (14, 15.) seems to cite a passage from the book of Enoch, which has very much exercised interpreters. The question is, whether the apostle took this passage out of any book, which might be then extant; whether he received it by tradition; or, by revelation. Dr. Doddridge observes on the passage of Jude as follows: 'A precious fragment of antediluvian history is here presented to us, as it seems by the special providence of God, who taught the apostle Jude to distinguish between what was genuine and spurious in the tradition. It can by no means be proved, that this is a quotation from that foolish book, called Enoch's Prophecy, as Bishop Sherlock has very rightly urged; nor would it prove the inspiration of the book from whence it was taken, but only the truth of this particular passage.'

It appears that Mr. Bruce procured in Abyssinia three manuscript copies of the book of Enoch, one of which he presented to the Library at Paris, another to the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and the third he reserved for himself. In 1821, Dr. Laurence, now Archbishop of Cashel, published from the Bodleian manuscript a translation of this book, to which he prefixed an elaborate preliminary dissertation on the history, &c. of this apocryphal work. Dr. Laurence observes, that, as this book was written before the doctrines of Christianity were promulgated to the world, the references in the book of Enoch to the nature and character of the Messiah afford credible proofs of what were the Jewish opinions on those points before the birth of Christ, and consequently before the possible predominance of the Christian creed. He then shows, by extracts from this apocryphal book, that, contrary to the assertions of the Unitarians, who contend that the existence of Christ commenced at his birth, and who affirm that no Jew of any age ever held the opinion of his pre-existence, much less ever regarded him as an object of divine worship, that the pre-existence of the Son of Man, or the Messiah, from the beginning, is stated in language which cannot admit the least doubt, and that divine worship is said to be given to him, and prayer offered to him for mercy. He also shows, that as the description in this book of the Son of Man may be considered as the Jewish comment at that time on the vision of Daniel, a precise and distinct Trinity of persons, under the supreme appellation of Lords, is represented in a comment of the same nature on that account of Moses, which describes the commencement of the creation. *Laurence's Prelim. ENOS, אֵנוֹשׁ, signifies mortal man, sick, despaired of, forgetful. Enos, son of Seth, and father of Cainan, was born in the year of the world 235, and died in the year of the world 1140, aged 905 years. Moses (Gen. iv. 26.) says, 'then began men to call upon the name of the Lord,' or, as some translate the passage, 'Enos began to call upon the name of the Lord;' that is, they observe, he was the inventor of religious rites and ceremonies in worship. This worship was preserved in the family of Enos, while Cain's family was plunged into irregularities and impieties. Several Jews translate thus: 'Then men began to profane the name of the Lord,' that is, by calling it on the creature and idols. This passage may also be translated, 'Then men began to call themselves by the name of the Lord.' Good men, to distinguish themselves from the wicked, began to take the name of sons, or servants, of God; and hence Moses (Gen. vi. 1, 2.) says, that the sons of God, that is, the descendants of Enos, seeing the daughters of men that they were fair, took them wives of all which they chose. Some, however, who render the word ALEIM by dignitaries, supreme, sovereign, above the law, explain this passage as follows: 'The sons of dignity, of power above the law, in fact, the emperors and ruling powers, or the sons of the dignitaries, saw the daughters of the inferior classes of men; and they formed their seraglios, by collecting them into their harems, from among all whom they chose.' Hence proceeded wars, commotions, and violences of every kind. This view of the passage is not new: Onkelos and the Targums read, 'the sons of the great;' the Samaritan, 'the sons of the sultans;' the Arabic, 'sons of the nobles;' but it destroys the idea of angelic commerce with women, as some have interpreted the words; or of the descendants of Seth, as sons of God, that is, good men, mingling with the beauties of the house of

ENTHUSIASM, in its best sense, signifies a divine afflation or inspiration, and also denotes that noble ardour of mind which leads us to imagine any thing sublime, grand, or surprising. In its worst sense, it signifies any impression on the fancy, or agitation of the passions, of which a man can give no rational account. It is observed by a learned divine, that all religion is either natural or instituted. The rule of natural religion is the common reason of mankind. The rule of instituted religion is divine revelation, or the word of God. Nothing, therefore, can pretend to religion, but what can be proved by Scripture, or by reason, or by both. How confident soever we may be of opinions destitute of this proof, every person who understands the grounds of religion, will immediately reject them; because there is no reason to regard a man's confidence, if the arguments and reasons which he produces bear no proportion to it. We find from experience, that confidence is generally ill-grounded, and is a kind of passion in the understanding, which is commonly used to supply the weakness and want of argument. If a man's reasons and arguments be not good, his confidence adds no strength to them, and tends only to refute itself. None are so much to be suspected of error, or a design to deceive, as those who pretend most confidently to inspiration; as we may perceive in all enthusiasts, who pretend to inspiration, but who afford no proofs in support of their pretensions. Every pretence to inspiration, unless accompanied by miracles, is liable to be considered as enthusiastical. There is no doubt but that the Spirit of God formerly inspired men in an extraordinary manner, and may do so again when the Almighty pleases; but since the great and standing revelation of the Gospel, we should be careful not to be rash in giving heed to such pretences. If those who pretend to inspiration declare only what is revealed in the Gospel already, their inspiration is needless; if they declare any thing contrary to the Gospel, we are sufficiently cautioned against them; if any thing in addition to the revelation of the Gospel, but not contrary to it, we must consider the evidence they bring for their inspiration. God does not inspire men for their own sakes, but for the sake of others; and another man's inspiration is nothing to me, unless he can satisfy me that he is inspired.

Devotion, when not subjected to the control of reason, is very apt to degenerate into enthusiasm. When the mind is greatly heated by devotions, men are inclined to think that these devotions proceed from something divine. If this thought be indulged to excess, and the growing passion be cherished, they fall into imaginary raptures and ecstasies; and when once men fancy themselves under the influence of a divine impulse, it is no wonder if they slight human ordinances, and refuse to comply with any established form of religion, since they suppose themselves directed by a much superior guide. There is not a more melancholy object, than a man whose head is turned with religious enthusiasm. An insane person, whose mind has been injured by pride or malice, is a very mortifying sight to human nature; but when the distemper arises from any indiscreet fervours of devotion, or from too intense an application of the mind to its mistaken duties, it deserves our compassion in a more particular manner. From it, however, we may learn this lesson, that since devotion itself, which we might be disposed to think could not be too warm, may disorder the mind, unless its heats are tempered by caution and prudence, we ought to be particularly careful to keep our reason as cool as possible, and on all occasions to guard ourselves against the influence of passion and imagination.

The sober Christian is as fully convinced as the enthusiast, that only He who made the heart can new make it. He is as fully persuaded that his natural dispositions cannot be changed, nor his affections purified, but by the agency of the Divine Spirit, as the fanatic. If he cannot recapitulate feelings, he can and does produce such evidences of his improvement, as virtuous habits, a devout temper, a humble and charitable spirit, 'repentance towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ;' and this gives an evidence less equivocal, as existing more in the heart than on the lips, and more in the life, than in the discourse. Tillotson's Sermons, Sermon iv. ix.; Spectator, No. 201.; Cælebs, vol. ii. p. 224.

ENVY, a sensation of uneasiness and disquiet, arising from the superior advantages which others are supposed to possess, and accompanied with malignity towards those who possess them. It is one of the most hateful and unsightly abortions of a malevolent disposition. It is always desirous, and often striving, to effect the degradation of others; to load them with ignominy or contempt; to disparage their virtues and their excellences; not so much because it aspires to elevation itself, 'as because it delights to depress others; not so much because it thinks or seeks to obtain distinction itself, by obscuring those who are more deserving of it, as because it possesses such an unmixed infusion of malignity as makes it behold, with the bitterest aversion, the worth, the excellence, the prosperity, and the happiness of others, and most of those whom it most knows, and with whom it has the most frequent intercourse.

Envy is a vice, of all others, the most odious and detestable, because it has no temptations of pleasure or advantage to plead; but it springs solely from a vitiated and malignant heart, unable to endure the happiness of others, and unwilling to acquiesce in its own allotments. It is a miserable passion, which, like a distempered eye, is incapable of bearing the brightness of any light. Whatever way the person who is under its influence directs his sight, he is sure to meet with objects that give him pain. He observes one man invested with authority, and, therefore, contemplated with awe; another universally beloved and esteemed for his good qualities; a third rich, and, therefore, surrounded with crowds of obsequious admirers; and a fourth wise and learned, which occasions his judgment to be followed, his opinion embraced, and his person respected. Should either of those characters occur to the view of the envious man, or pass over the horizon of his mind, how wretchedly, how excessively disquieted is he? Such a man will expose to the public view, with a malignant joy, those blemishes and failings of others, which the principles of humanity should lead him to conceal. He will take advantage of men's little faults and failings, to sully their best and most laudable actions, and even, by misrepresentation, convert their virtues into vices.

It is a natural consequence of envy to render the life of him who is under its dominion, one continued scene of uneasiness and discontent. So long, indeed, as he envies, he cannot be otherwise than miserable; and where once this vice is rooted in the heart, there is little chance of its being extirpated but with life. What the prophet has declared concerning the wicked in general, 'that they are like a troubled sea which cannot rest,' is strictly applicable to the envious man in particular: he is agitated to and fro by the force of his unruly passion; he is his own busy tormentor, his own restless persecutor; his envy like a worm corrodes him, and like a canker frets him. Envy is also such a diabolical passion, that it disqualifies men for the performance of those duties which religion indispensably requires, and leads to those practices which it solemnly forbids. It tends to give us wrong notions of the greatest and best of Beings; it prompts us to detract from His attributes, and to blaspheme Him in our hearts, by representing His ways as unequal, and His dealing as unrighteous. It inclines men to increase the weight of their neighbour's afflictions, to repine at their prosperity, to depreciate their characters, to sow strife amongst brethren, and to separate bosom friends. St. James represents this sin as attended with every evil work.

Let him, therefore, who envies his neighbour, seriously consider, and deliberately weigh in his mind, the great absurdity as well as the sin of envy, which, impartially viewed, is one of the most inexcusable in the list of human errors. So far from profiting, so far from affecting the mind with any transient joys, the very nature of envy is to disquiet a man's life, and to prove at once his sin and his punishment. Let him also consider the nature of those things for which he envieth his neighbour. Does he envy his superior wealth and affluence? Our Saviour has observed, and daily experience confirms, that 'the happiness and comfort of man's life consist not in the abundance of those things which he possesseth.' Let him consider not only the uncertainty of riches, but the various changes and conditions of human life; how some have heaped up wealth for a time, and flourished amidst prosperity and abundance, but have afterwards been reduced to a mean estate, and become as much the objects of pity, as they once were of envy and admiration! In a word, to settle this point, there is certainly nothing this world affords worth our envy; because it contains nothing which is not attended with uneasiness and disquietude. Let us rightly appreciate internal spiritual gifts, as compared with eternal and spiritual enjoyments. It is evident that beauty, wealth, and honour, frequently captivate the affections, and betray men into luxury and pride, into violence and deceit, into sloth and wantonness. On the contrary, virtue and grace, those fair endowments of the mind, possess an innate beauty, which can neither be tainted by sordid motives, nor prostituted to vile and disingenuous purposes. It will also be expedient to impress deeply on our minds just sentiments and apprehensions of Divine Providence; to consider that he who created all things still keeps a watchful eye over his creatures, still rejoices to do them good; and to reflect at the same time, that he who appears least befriended, has obtained more than he could possibly have claimed. These and similar reflections on Providence, if allowed to influence the heart of man, will disarm his envy, silence his murmurs, and make him ashamed to repine; they will induce him humbly to acquiesce in, and patiently to submit to, the will and pleasure of that God, who has ordered every thing for the best.

Lastly, it will be useful to consider, that, notwithstanding all the visible inequalities of conditions here below, the time is not far distant, when they will all be reconciled; and they who envy, and they who are envied, shall all be on a level. When the stage of life is once closed, we shall all be alike, though the parts we acted upon it may have been widely different. We must all return to the same common earth out of which we were first formed; and till the awful sound of the last trumpet shall awake us, we must lie in that dark mansion of death, the grave, without difference, and without distinction. 'There the wicked shall cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest; there the prisoners shall sleep together; they shall not hear the voice of the oppressor: the small and great are there promiscuously mixed together; and the servant is free from his master.' From that state, the same God that made us all shall call all his creatures. The consideration of final and impartial justice ought to prevent us from envying those who, in this short and transitory scene, figure above us, and dispose us in 'whatever state we are, therewith to be content.' Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 361, 362.

EONIANS, the followers of Eon, a wild fanatic, of the province of Bretagne, in the twelfth century. This man, whose brain was undoubtedly disordered, was condemned in the council which was assembled at Rheims, in the year 1148, and at which pope Eugenius III. presided, for pretending to be the Son of God. Having heard, in the form that was used for exorcising malignant spirits, these words pronounced, per EUM, qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos, he concluded from the resemblance between the word EUM and his name, that he was the person who was to come to judge both the quick and the dead. He was followed as a great prophet. Sometimes, he walked with a great number of people; sometimes, he lived in solitude, and afterwards appeared in greater splendour than before. This infatuated person, says Mosheim, should rather have been delivered over to the physicians, than placed in the list of heretics. He ended his days in a miserable prison, and left a considerable number of followers, whom persecution and deaths in the most dreadful forms, could not persuade to abandon his cause, or renounce an absurdity, which one would think could never have gained credit, except in such a place as Bedlam. This remarkable example is sufficient to show not only the astonishing credulity of the multitude, but also how far even the rulers of the church were destitute of judgment, and strangers to the knowledge of true and genuine religion. Mosheim, vol. ii. pp. 457, 458. Broughton's Hist. Library, vol. i. p. 361.

EOQUINIANS, a denomination in the sixteenth century. They derived their name from their master, Eoquinus, who taught that Christ did not die for the wicked, but for the faithful only. Adam's View of Religions, p. 132.

EP'APHRAS, Ἐπαφῤῃᾱς, signifies covered with foam. It is believed that Epaphras was the first bishop of Colosse. He was converted by St. Paul, and contributed much to convert his fellow-citizens of Colosse. He came to Rome while St. Paul was there in bonds, and is thought to have been imprisoned with St. Paul. (Philem. 23.) However, Dr. Benson observes, and perhaps truly, that the appellation of fellow-prisoner, as applied by St. Paul to Epaphras, did not imply that they were imprisoned together at the time; any more than your calling a person your fellow-traveller, imports that you are then upon your travels. If he had, upon any former occasion, travelled with you, you might afterwards speak of him under that title. It is just so with the term fellow-prisoner.

Epaphras, having understood that false apostles, taking advantage of his absence from Colosse, had sown tares among the wheat in his church, engaged St. Paul, whose name and authority were revered throughout Phrygia, to write to the Colossians to correct them. Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, p. 372.

EPAPHRODIT'US, Ἐπαφρόδιτος, signifies agreeable, handsome. Epaphroditus was bishop, or rather the apostle, or messenger of the Philippians, being sent by that church to carry money to Paul, who was then in bonds, and in their name to render him service. He executed this commission with zeal, and exposed himself to great risks, by which he brought on himself a dangerous illness, that obliged him to stay long at Rome. The year following, A.D. 62, he returned with haste to Philippi, having heard that the Philippians, on receiving information of his sickness, were much afflicted. By him St. Paul sent a letter to the Philippians. (Philip. iv. 18.)

On the subject of the sickness of Epaphroditus it has been observed, that no intimation is given that the recovery of Epaphroditus was miraculous, but that it is plainly spoken of as a natural event. This instance, together with that which occurs in the Second Epistle to Timothy, affords a proof that the power of performing cures, and consequently of working other miracles, was a power which the apostles only occasionally possessed, and did not depend on their own will. Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, p. 261.

E'PHAH, a hollow measure used among the Hebrews, and contained three pecks and three pints. It was also called a bath. It was a measure of things dry, as of barley, (Ruth ii.) and meal, (Judg. vi. Numb. v.) and was of the same capacity with the bath in liquids. It contained three sata or seahs. The Chaldaic paraphrase renders the ephah three seahs, the ancient version three modii. (Ruth ii.) Josephus, (lib. 9.

cap. 2.) makes the seah equal to one and a half Italic modius, the sesquimodius containing twenty-four sextarii, which multiplied by three makes seventy-two, the measure of the ephah assigned by him.

Mr. Cumberland thinks that the ephah was about 1747 solid inches of English measure, not much distant from the English foot solid, which is 1728; and is near the inches solid of 1000 ounces of water. Or in wine measure it was seven gallons, two quarts, and about half a pint. In corn measure, six gallons, three pints, and three solid inches. Arbutnot's Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, &c. p. 101; Cumberland's Essay towards the Recovery of the Jewish Measures and Weights, p. 63.

EPHESUS, Ἐφεσος, signifies desire, and was the name of a celebrated city of Ionia, in Asia Minor. This city was principally famous for its temple of Diana, which occasioned a great resort of strangers. This temple was one of the seven wonders of the world, being in length 425 feet, and in breadth 220. It contained one hundred and twenty-seven pillars made by so many kings. All the provinces of Asia contributed to the building, and two hundred years were employed on it. This place, with its embellishments, no longer appears. The extreme sanctity of the temple of Diana inspired universal awe and reverence. During many ages, it was a repository of treasures foreign and domestic. This property was deemed secure; the temple having been spared by Xerxes, who spared scarcely any other. But Nero removed many costly offerings and images, and an immense quantity of silver and gold. It was again plundered in the time of Gallienus, A.D. 262, by Goths from the other side of the Danube, who carried off a prodigious booty. The temple was probably destroyed at the same time as other heathen temples, by an edict of Constantine. 'We now,' says Dr. Chandler, 'seek in vain for the temple; the city is prostrate; and the goddess is gone.'

In Roman times, the city of Ephesus was the metropolis of Asia. Of the city then extant Lysimachus was the founder. He contrived the ruin of the old city, after preparing a new one for the inhabitants. Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, who repaired and embellished the city. In the time of Strabo, the posterity of Androcles were styled kings, though a new form of government had been long established. They also assumed the dress and distinctions of royalty. In the war between Mithridates and the Romans, the Ephesians took part with the former, and massacred the Romans who dwelt in their city. Sylla severely punished this cruelty; but, afterwards, Ephesus was treated with lenity, and enjoyed its own laws, with other privileges. Ephesus was only a ruinous place, when the emperor Justinian, A.D.

528—566, transported its statues to Constantinople. About the end of the eleventh century, it was seized by a Turkish pirate, named Tangripermes, who was afterwards routed by John Ducas, the Greek admiral, in a bloody battle. In 1308, it surrendered to sultan Saisan, who removed the inhabitants to Tyræium, where they were massacred. It was exposed to the ravages of the Mahometans, who took it more than once. Tamerlane, after the battle of Angora, A.D. 1401, commanded the lesser princes of Anatolia to join him at Ephesus, and employed a whole month in plundering the city and its adjacencies. Soon after, it was set on fire, and mostly burnt, in a combat between the Turkish governor and the Tartars. Mahomet I. took Ephesus, and since that time it has continued in the possession of the Turks.

Dr. Chandler says, 'the inhabitants are a few Greek peasants, living in extreme wretchedness, dependence, and insensibility; the representatives of an illustrious people, and inhabiting the wreck of their greatness; some, the substructions of the glorious edifices which they raised; some, beneath the vaults of the stadium, once the crowded scene of their diversions; and some by the abrupt precipice, in the sepulchres which received their ashes. Its streets are obscured and overgrown. A herd of goats were driven to it for shelter from the sun at noon; and a noisy flight of crows from the quarries seemed to insult its silence. We heard the partridge call in the area of the theatre and the stadium. The glorious pomp of its heathen worship is no longer remembered; and Christianity, which was here nursed by apostles, and fostered by general councils, until it increased to fulness of stature, barely lingers on in an existence hardly visible.' In March 1826, when visited by the Rev. Messrs. Hartley and Arundell, green corn was growing, in all directions, amidst the forsaken ruins; and one solitary individual only was found who bore the name of Christ, instead of its once flourishing church.

The first time St. Paul came to Ephesus was in A.D. 54, or according to Lardner, in 53, (Acts xviii. 19. 21.) he abode there only a few days, and went to Jerusalem. He promised the Ephesians to return; and after some months, he came back to Ephesus, where he continued three years, till A.D. 56, or as some think 57, when he was obliged to leave the city in consequence of a sedition raised by Demetrius the silversmith. Thence the apostle wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians. The Ephesians were addicted to curious arts, to magic, sorcery, and judicial astrology. Ephesian letters, Ephesia grammata, became a proverbial expression for magic characters. Certain Jews, who took upon them to exorcise persons possessed with the devil, were ill-treated by the possessed. This terrifying several who were addicted to curious arts, they publicly burnt their books relating to such subjects, the value of which was very considerable. (Acts xix. 14, &c.)

The apostle in his last journey to Rome, took Ephesus in his way, A.D. 64 or 65. St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Ephesians whilst a prisoner the first time at Rome; and as he does not express in it any hope of a speedy release, which he does in his other Epistles sent from Rome, it is conjectured that it was written during the early part of his confinement, and probably in the year 61. Some learned men have thought that this Epistle was not addressed to the Ephesians, but to the Laodiceans, conceiving it to be the Epistle mentioned in the fourth chapter of the Colossians, 'and that ye likewise read the Epistle from Laodicea.' However, all the ancient fathers, who quote this Epistle, treat it as written to the Ephesians, and almost all the ancient manuscripts and versions attest the same thing, by supporting the reading of our Bibles, 'Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus.' These authorities fully justify us in considering this Epistle as written to the Ephesians. This Epistle was sent to Ephesus by Tychicus. It is written with great animation, and has always been much admired, as well on account of the importance of its matter, as the elegance of its composition. 'It consists of six chapters, the first three of which are usually considered as doctrinal, and the other three as practical. St. Paul, after saluting the saints at Ephesus, expresses his gratitude to God for the blessings of the Gospel dispensation, and assures the Ephesians, that since he heard of their faith in Christ Jesus, and of their love to all Christians, he had not ceased to return thanks for them, and to pray that their minds might be still farther enlightened; he points out the excellence of the Gospel dispensation, and shows that redemption through Christ is solely to be ascribed to the grace of God; he declares the mystery, or hidden purpose of God to be, that the Gentiles as well as the Jews should be partakers of the blessings of the Gospel, and that through the goodness of God he was appointed to be the Apostle of the Gentiles; he desires the Ephesians not to be dejected on account of his sufferings, and closes this part of this Epistle with an affectionate prayer and a sublime doxology. In the last three chapters, St. Paul gives the Ephesians many practical exhortations; and in particular, he recommends union, purity of manners, veracity, and meekness; he enjoins charity, and forbids every species of licentiousness; he enforces the duties of wives, of husbands, of children, of fathers, of servants, of masters; he recommends watchfulness and firmness in the Christian warfare, and concludes the Epistle with a general benediction.'

St. John passed the latter part of his life in Asia Minor, and principally at Ephesus, where he died; and Timothy, St. Paul's disciple, was made first bishop of Ephesus by the apostle, who laid his hands on him. Dr. Chandler's Travels, p. 131, Oxford 1775; Sacred Geography; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 405, 406; Lardner's Hist. of the Apostles and Evangelists; Marsh's Michaelis, vol. vi. p. 134, edit. 1802; Hartley's Journal, in Missionary Register, 1827, pp. 200—202; Arundell's Visit to the Seven Churches, pp. 27—56.

E'PHOD, an ornament of dress worn by the Hebrew priests, and deriving its name from aphad, to tie, to fasten, to gird. Ephod seems also to have been the name of an upper garment, which was worn by persons of distinction of various characters. King David, (2 Sam. vi. 14.) and the eighty-five priests who were murdered by Saul, (1 Sam. xxii. 18.) and even Samuel when a child, (1 Sam. ii. 18.) were girded with a linen ephod. It is, therefore, probable, that the peculiarity of the high-priest's ephod did not consist in its being of a different shape from that worn by other persons; but in the richness of the materials of which it was made, and the fine embroidery and jewels with which it was adorned, inasmuch that it might be properly called the ephod.

The description of this garment in the book of Exodus, relates only to its materials, and not to its shape or form. It was made 'of gold, of blue, and of purple, of scarlet, and fine twined linen with cunning work.' (Exod. xxviii. 6.) We are not very certain with respect to the nature of these colours. As to the shape of the ephod, the Septuagint call it epomis, which signifies that it was worn upon the shoulders. Josephus says, that it was a cubit in length. St. Jerome compares it to the Roman caracalla, which was a sort of short cloak, but had a head or hood, which the ephod had not. Maimonides says, that it reached down to the feet; which some suppose to be true respecting the hinder, but not the fore part. They think that it consisted of two parts, the one an oblong rectangular piece, which hung down behind from the shoulders to the feet, and which the rabbins say was the breadth of his back who wore it from shoulder to shoulder; the other, a short rectangular piece, which hung down before, the length of a cubit.

The high-priest's ephod had a very rich button upon each shoulder, made of a large onyx stone set in gold. This stone was so large, that the names of the twelve tribes of Israel were engraven, six on each stone. (Exod. xxviii. 9—12.) The word shoham, which we render onyx, is translated by the Septuagint smaragdus, an emerald; but as we have no certain knowledge either of this, or of any of the twelve stones of the breast-plate, we may as well be satisfied with our translation as with any other. To the ephod belonged a curious girdle, of the same rich fabric as the ephod itself. This girdle is said to be upon the ephod, (Exod. xxviii. 8.) that is, woven with the ephod, as Maimonides understands; and coming out from the ephod on each side, it was brought under the arms like a sash, and tied upon the breast. See GIDEON. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, b. i. ch. v.

E'PHRAIM, אֶפְרַיִם, signifies that brings fruit, or that grows, and was the name of Joseph's second son, by Asenath, Potiphar's daughter. He was born in Egypt, about the year of the world 2294. Ephraim, with his brother Manasseh, was presented by his father Joseph to Jacob on his death-bed. (Gen. xlviii. 8, &c.) Jacob laid his right hand on Ephraim the younger, and his left on Manasseh the elder. Joseph was desirous to change his hands, but Jacob answered, I know it my son; Manasseh shall be multiplied, but Ephraim shall be greater.

The sons of Ephraim having made an inroad into Palestine, the inhabitants of Gath killed them. Ephraim their father mourned many days for them, and his brethren came to comfort him. (1 Chron. vii. 20, 21.) Afterwards he had a son named Beriah, and a daughter Sherah. He had also other sons, Rephah, Resheph, Tela, &c. His posterity multiplied in Egypt to the number of 40,500 men capable of bearing arms. In the land of promise, Joshua, who was of this tribe, gave them their portion between the Mediterranean west, and the river Jordan east. The ark and tabernacle remained long in this tribe at Shiloh; and after the separation of the ten tribes, the seat of the kingdom was in Ephraim, and hence Ephraim is frequently used to denote the whole kingdom. The district belonging to this tribe is called Ephratah. (Ps. cxxxii. 6.) Ephraim was led captive beyond the Euphrates, with all Israel, by Shalmanezzer, king of Assyria, in the year of the world 3283.

EPI'CUR'EANS, the disciples of Epicurus, who lived about the year of the world 3700. They maintained that the supreme good of man consists in pleasure; and, consequently, the supreme evil in pain. Nature itself, says Epicurus, teaches us this truth, and prompts us from our birth to procure whatever gives us pleasure, and to avoid that which gives us pain. For this purpose he proposed a remedy against the sharpness of pain. This consisted in diverting the mind from it, by turning our whole attention on the pleasures which we have formerly enjoyed. He held, that the wise man must be happy so long as he is wise; and that pain, not depriving him of his wisdom, cannot deprive him of his happiness. Nothing is more plausible in appearance, than the moral doctrine of Epicurus. Gassendus pretends, that the pleasure in which this philosopher has placed the sovereign good, was the highest tranquillity of mind, in conjunction with the perfect health of the body ; but Tully, Horace, Plutarch, and others, give us a very different account. Indeed, the nature of the pleasure in which the chief happiness is supposed to consist, is a problem in the morals of Epicurus. He asserted the fortuitous origin of the world ; the inability and indifference of the gods respecting human affairs ; and the mortality of the soul. This sect, therefore, offered to its votaries a licence for the most illicit pursuits ; and from it arose the Sadducees of the Jews, the Zendichees of the Arabs, and the Deists of the present age. Gregory's Hist. vol. i. p. 19 ; Prideaux's Connect. vol. ii. p. 783.

EPISCOPACY, that form of church government, in which are acknowledged three distinct orders, bishops, presbyters or priests, and deacons. The Presbyterians contend, that the primitive church acknowledged only two orders, and therefore maintain the identity of bishops and presbyters. On the other hand, the Episcopalians say, it is very clear from ecclesiastical antiquity, that the hierarchy of the ancient church consisted of bishops, priests, and deacons, and consequently, that bishops are to be distinguished from presbyters. In evidence of this they produce the testimonies of many of the fathers, as Clemens Alexandrinus, Origen, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, &c. St. Jerome, who will be allowed to speak the sense of the ancients, called presbyters priests of the inferior degree, and deacons the third degree. The testimony of St. Ignatius, in particular, is full and satisfactory. In his epistle to the Magnesians he exhorts them "to do all things in unity, under the bishop, presiding in the place of God, the presbyters in the place of the apostolical senate, and the deacons to whom are committed the ministry and service of Jesus Christ." In his Epistle to the Smyrneans, he calls upon them all 'to obey their bishop, even as Christ obeys the Father ; to venerate the presbyters as the apostles ; and the deacons as the commandments of God.' His repeated exhortations in all his Epistles sufficiently prove, that in his days, that is, during the life of the apostle John, three distinct orders existed in the Church. He constantly and accurately distinguishes these orders from each other ; and he uses such language respecting the episcopal authority, as it is highly improbable that he, or any other rational person, would have adopted, had it not been well known, and universally acknowledged, that the order of bishops was of apostolical institution.

That this order in the sense contended for by Episcopalians, actually existed, and was generally established, as early as 160 years after Christ, is a fact that cannot be denied by any candid adversary of primitive episcopacy. It is acknowledged, that episcopacy prevailed in the church in St. Cyprian's time ; and what account can be given of this fact, but continuance, and not usurpation ? How can it be accounted for, except by supposing that it had existed from the beginning ? The mere continuance of an old establishment may easily fail of being directly noticed in the records of the times ; but the commencement of a new one could not be overlooked. 'When I shall see,' says Chillingworth, 'all the democracies and aristocracies in the world lie down and sleep, and awake into monarchies, then will I begin to believe that presbyterian government, having continued in the church during the apostles' times, should presently after, against the apostles' doctrine and will of Christ, be whirled about like a stone in a masque, and be transformed into episcopacy.'

The question between the Episcopalians and presbyterians is not, what degree of power and splendour the primitive bishops enjoyed, or what might be the precise extent of their dioceses ? But it is simply and solely, whether they were the same as the presbyters, or a distinct order ? The Episcopalians contend for this last opinion, and say that the episcopal form of church government was not only primitive and apostolical, but also universal. They challenge their antagonists to produce, from all the records of antiquity, a single instance of a presbyterial community, previously to that established by Calvin at Geneva. They think that there is complete Scriptural evidence of the apostolical institution of episcopacy, in the presidency of St. James over the presbyters of Jerusalem ; in the presidency of Timothy and Titus over the presbyters of Ephesus and Crete ; and in the authority which the seven angels unquestionably possessed over all the presbyters of Asia Minor. They allege, that during our Saviour's stay on earth, he had under him two distinct orders of ministers ; the twelve and the seventy : that after his ascension, immediately before which he had enlarged the powers of the eleven, we read of apostles, presbyters, and deacons, in the church : and, that the apostolic, or highest order, was intended to be permanent in the bishops, is evident from the apostles themselves instituting bishops to succeed them in great cities, as Timothy at Ephesus, Titus at Crete, &c. That Timothy and Titus were superior to modern presbyters, appears from the offices assigned them. Timothy was empowered by St. Paul to preside over the presbyters at Ephesus, to receive accusations against them, to exhort, to charge, and even to rebuke them. By the same apostle, Titus was left at Crete for the express purpose of setting things in order, and ordaining presbyters in every city. It is said in 1 Tim. v. 19, 'Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses.' Therefore, say the Episcopalians, Timothy was a judge, presbyters were brought before him, and he was superior to them.

Thus, should it not be admitted, that there is a positive institution in Scripture of the episcopal form of church government, yet it is by Episcopalians argued, that they have a primitive and even apostolical practice for their precedent, which they think equivalent to an institution. 'It cannot be proved,' says Dr. Paley, 'that any form of church government was laid down in the Christian, as it had been in the Jewish Scriptures, with a view of fixing a constitution for succeeding ages; and which constitution, consequently, the disciples of Christianity would everywhere, and at all times, by the very law of their religion, be obliged adopt. Certainly no command of this to kind was delivered by Christ himself: and if it be shown that the apostles ordained bishops and presbyters amongst their first converts, it must be remembered that deacons also and deaconesses were appointed by them, with functions very dissimilar to any which obtain in the church at present. The truth seems to have been, that such offices were at first erected in the Christian church, as the good order, the instruction, and the exigencies of the society at that time required, without any intention, at least without any declared design, of regulating the appointment, authority, or the distinction of Christian ministers under future circumstances.' It is observed by Bishop Tomline, that 'as it hath not pleased our Almighty Father to prescribe any particular form of civil government for the security of temporal comforts to his rational creatures; so neither has he prescribed any particular form of ecclesiastical polity as absolutely necessary to the attainment of eternal happiness.' Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. pp. 275. 288. Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosoph. vol. ii. pp. 302, 303. edit. 1810. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Theolog. vol. ii. p. 398.

EPISTLE, a letter written from one party to another. The term epistles is eminently applied to those letters in the New Testament, which were written by the apostles, on various occasions, to direct the conduct of Christian churches.

Of the fourteen epistles ascribed to St. Paul in our canon, the first thirteen have in all ages of the church been universally acknowledged to be written by that apostle. Some doubts have been entertained, as we shall see hereafter, respecting the Epistle to the Hebrews. As the testimonies in favour of the genuineness of these thirteen epistles are nearly the same, it may be as well to state them all at once, especially as the style of these different epistles is so exactly the same, and of so peculiar a kind, that whatever proves any one of them to be genuine, may be considered as a proof of the genuineness of the rest. Clement of Rome expressly ascribes the first Epistle to the Corinthians to St. Paul, and it is quoted by Polycarp; both Ignatius and Polycarp quote the Epistle to the Ephesians; and Polycarp also quotes the Epistle to the Philippians. All the thirteen Epistles, except the short one to Philemon, are also plainly referred to by one or more of the apostolical fathers, who, however, do not say that they were written by St. Paul. Justin Martyr does not quote by name any one of St. Paul's Epistles; but in his remaining works occur passages, which may be considered as allusions to seven of them, namely, to the Epistle to the Romans, to the first to the Corinthians, to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and the second to the Thessalonians. The first Epistle to the Corinthians is quoted by Athenagoras. Theophilus of Antioch refers to the Romans, to the first and second to the Corinthians, to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, first of Timothy, and Titus. All the thirteen Epistles, except that to Philemon, are quoted by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Cyprian; and all, without any exception, are quoted by Tertullian, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Eusebius, Athanasius, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustine, and Chrysostom. These writers reach from the days of the apostles the end of the fourth century, and are amply sufficient to establish the genuineness of these Epistles. It is unnecessary to enumerate writers of a later date. The brevity of the Epistle to Philemon, and the private nature of its subject, account for its not being quoted so early or so frequently as the other Epistles of St. Paul. It appears, that Tertullian is the earliest author who mentions this Epistle; but it was received by Marcion who lived in the beginning of the second century, and bears strong internal marks of being the genuine production of St. Paul. The Epistles are not placed in our Bibles in the order in which they were written; but those to whole churches are placed before those addressed to private persons.

The Epistle of St. James, the two Epistles of St. Peter, the three Epistles of St. John, and the Epistle of St. Jude, are called Catholic or General Epistles. Origen, Eusebius, and several other ancient authors, mention them under that name, which it is probable they obtained, because most of them were written not to particular persons, nor to the churches of single cities or countries, as St. Paul's Epistles were, but to several churches, or to believers in general. The genuineness of five of these seven Epistles was for some time doubted; but they have all been admitted into the sacred canon since the fourth century. Many writers enumerate these seven Epistles, but not always in the same order.

It is not to be supposed, that every note, or memorandum, written by the apostles, or by their direction, was divinely inspired, or deserving of preservation to distant ages. The over-ruling hand of Providence has preserved those Epistles only, from which useful directions had been drawn, and might be drawn hereafter by believers, as from a perpetual directory of faith and practice; always supposing that similar circumstances require similar directions. In reading an Epistle, we ought to consider the occasion of it, the circumstances of those to whom it is addressed, the time when written, its general scope and design, as well as the intention of particular arguments and passages. We ought also to observe the style and manner of the writer, his mode of expression, the peculiar effect he intended to produce on those to whom he wrote, to whose temper, manners, general principles, and actual situation, he might address his arguments, &c.

The Epistles afford many and most powerful evidences for the truth of Christianity. They appeal to a great number of extraordinary facts. They allude to principles and opinions as admitted, or as prevailing, or as opposed, among those to whom they are addressed. They mention a considerable number of persons, describe their situations in life, hint at their connections with the churches, and by sometimes addressing them, sometimes recommending them by name, connect their testimony with that of the writer of the Epistle; and they frequently, without doubt, gave a proportionate share of influence to those individuals. It is also probable, that individuals mentioned in the Epistles, would carefully procure copies of these writings, give them all the authority, and all the notoriety in their power, communicate them to other churches, and, in short, become vouchers for their authenticity, &c. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 381, &c. 463, &c. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict. Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, p. 407, &c.

EPOCH, a term in chronology signifying a fixed point of time from which the succeeding years are numbered. The first epoch is the creation of the world, which, according to the Vulgate Bible, Archbishop Usher fixes in the year 710 of the Julian period, and 4004 years before Jesus Christ. The second is the Deluge, which, according to the Hebrew text, happened in the year of the world 1656. Six other epochs are commonly reckoned in sacred history: the building of the tower of Babel; the calling of Abraham; the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt; the dedication of the temple; the end of the Babylonish captivity; and the birth of Jesus Christ.

In profane history are reckoned five epochs; the era of Nabonassar, or death of Sardanapalus; the reign of Cyrus at Babylon; the reign of Alexander the Great over the Persians; and the beginning of the reign of Augustus, in which our Saviour was born.

E'SARHAD'DON, אסרחדן, signifies that binds joy, or that closes the point; or, according to the Syriac, who forbids novelty, or unity. Esar-haddon was the son of Sennacherib, and his successor in the kingdom of Assyria, and is also called Sargon, or Saragon. (Isai. xx. 1.) He reigned twenty-nine years, made war with the Philistines, and took Ashdod, by Tartan his general. He attacked Egypt, Ethiopia, and Edom, (Isai. xx. xxxiv.) probably with the design of revenging the affront which Sennacherib his father had received from Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, and the king of Egypt, Hezekiah's confederates. This Esar-haddon sent priests to the Cuthæans, whom Salmaneser, king of Assyria, had planted in Samaria, in place of the Israelites. He took Jerusalem, and carried king Manasseh to Babylon, of which he had become master, perhaps because there was no heir to Belesis, king of Babylon. He is said to have reigned twenty-nine or thirty years at Nineveh, and thirteen at Babylon, in all forty-two years. He died in the year of the world 3336, and was succeeded by Saosduchinus. Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion, that Esar-haddon is the Sardanapalus, who, as Cleotarchus says, died of old age after the revolt of Syria; the name Sardanapalus being derived from Asserhadon Pul.

E'SAU, עשו, signifies he that does, or acts, or finishes. Esau was the son of Isaac and Rebekah, and was born in the year of the world 2168, and before Jesus Christ, 1836. When the time of Rebekah's delivery came, she had twins, (Gen. xxv. 24, 25, 26.) the first of which was hairy, and therefore called Esau, that is, a man full grown, or of perfect age. Some derive Esau from the Arabic gescha, or gescheva, which signifies a hair-cloth. Esau delighted in hunting, and his father Isaac had a particular affection for him. One day Esau returned out of the fields greatly fatigued, and desired Jacob to give him some of his red pottage; to this Jacob agreed, provided he would sell him his birth-right. Esau, thinking himself weakened almost to death, sold it, and by oath resigned it to him. After this, he ate his mess, and went away, little concerned at what he had done.

At the age of forty, Esau married two

Canaanitish women; Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Bashemath the daughter of Elon. These marriages were very displeasing to Isaac and Rebekah. Isaac being old, and his sight decayed, directed Esau to procure him by hunting some venison, that at his return he might give him his last blessing. (Gen. xxvii. 1, 2, 3.) Esau went to hunt; but during his absence, Jacob, assisted and disguised by his mother Rebekah, procured from Isaac his blessing. When Esau returned to Isaac, and understood what had passed, he wept, and asked whether his father had not reserved one blessing for him? This he with some difficulty obtained. The conduct of Jacob caused him to be hated by Esau, who determined to murder him; but Rebekah sent Jacob to his uncle Laban, in Mesopotamia, without Esau's knowledge. Esau married several wives, as well Canaanites, as the daughter of Ishmael, sister of Nebajoth, by whom he had children. He settled in the mountains east of Jordan, and became very powerful.

When Jacob returned from Mesopotamia, he feared the resentment of Esau, and sent messengers to him with presents. The messengers were kindly received by Esau, who came himself with four hundred men to meet his brother. Jacob feared that he came with anger; but the intentions of Esau were peaceable, and the two brothers tenderly embraced each other. Esau received the presents of Jacob, and offered to accompany him, and to guard him over Jordan. Jacob, however, thanked him; and Esau returned to Seir. Esau had three wives; Adah, Aholibamah, and Bashemath.

It has been observed, that Esau, every thing considered, was not that very wicked person that some think him to have been. His generous and open temper appears in his affectionate deportment towards his brother, and in the speedy and entire forgetfulness of the injuries which he had received from Jacob. Though St. Paul calls him a profane person, and says that he was hated by God, yet by the word hated, he means no more than a bare postponing. The apostle's intention is to show, that God had all along bestowed the favours that led to the Messiah on whom he pleased: on Abraham, not on Lot; on Jacob, not on Esau; on the Gentiles, not on the Jews. St. Paul calls Esau profane, not because he was more wicked than other men of his age, but because he seems not to have been so mindful of the promise made to his family as Jacob was; and, consequently, he was not so proper a person to be the heir of the mercies peculiar to that family. *Univ. ES'DRAS, the names of two apocryphal books which were never admitted into the Jewish canon, and which are too absurd to be received as canonical by the Romanists. They are commonly supposed to have been written originally in Greek, by some Hellenistic Jew, though others imagine, that they were first written in Chaldee, and afterwards translated into Greek. It is uncertain at what time they were composed, though it is generally agreed that the author wrote before Josephus, the Jewish historian.

The first book of Esdras is chiefly historical, and gives an account of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, the building of the temple, and the re-establishment of divine worship. The truth it contains is borrowed from the canonical book of Ezra, or Esdras as the Greeks and Latins call him; and hence the books of which we are treating, are termed by them the third and fourth books of Esdras. What is not taken from the book of Ezra, is extremely fabulous and trifling, though the whole of this book is allowed by the Greeks to be canonical. The second book of Esdras is written in the prophetic manner, and pretends to visions and revelations, but is very ridiculous and absurd. The author believed that the day of judgment was at hand, and that all the souls both of good and bad men would be delivered out of hell, after the day of judgment. He speaks of two monstrous animals created by God at the beginning of the world, for the purpose of making a feast with them for all the elect, after the resurrection. He says that the ten tribes are gone into a certain country which he calls Arsareth; that Ezra restored the whole of the Scriptures which were entirely lost; and he speaks of Jesus Christ and his apostles in so clear a manner, that the Gospel itself is not more express.

ESPOUSE, ESPOUSALS, a ceremony of betrothing, or coming under obligation for the purpose of marriage. It was a mutual agreement between the two parties, which usually preceded the marriage some considerable time. The distinction between espousals and marriage ought to be carefully attended to, as espousals in the East are sometimes contracted for years before the parties cohabit, and sometimes in very early youth. This custom is alluded to figuratively, as between God, and his people, (Jer. ii. 2.) to whom he was a husband. (Jer. xxxi. 32) The apostle says, that he acted as a kind of assistant (pronuba) on this occasion, (2 Cor. xi. 2.): 'I have espoused you to Christ,' that is, have drawn up the writings, settled the agreements, given pledges, &c. of that union. See Isaiah liv. 5. Matt. xxv. 6. Rev. xix. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

ESSENES, or ESSIENANS, an ancient sect among the Jews. We are not acquainted with the origin of the Essenes, nor with the etymology of the name. Michaelis says, that Essenes is an Egyptian word, signifying the same as Θεραπευται in Greek. They exceeded the Pharisees in their most rigorous observances. Originally of the same sect, they improved upon them in the same manner as among the Romanists, the Carthusians and Cisterrians have improved upon the Benedictines. They held absolute predestination, and allowed to man neither free-will nor liberty of choice. They admitted a future state, but denied a resurrection from the dead. Though our Saviour frequently censured all the other sects of the Jews, yet he never spoke of the Essenes; and they are never mentioned by name in any part of the New Testament. This silence of the evangelical history concerning the Essenes, is by some imputed to their eremitic life, which secluded them from places of public resort. Others think that the Essenes, who were honest and sincere without guile or hypocrisy, did not deserve the reproofs and censures which the conduct of the other Jews required. But though the Essenes are not expressly mentioned in any of the sacred books, yet it is supposed, and not without reason, that they are referred to by St. Paul in the second chapter of his Epistle to the Colossians: 'Let no man,' saith he, 'beguile you of your reward, in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind:—which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility, and neglecting of the body.' What is here observed concerning a voluntary humility, and neglecting the body, is in a peculiar manner applicable to the Essenes, who are said by Josephus to have had something peculiar among them relating to the angels; for he tells us, 'that when they received any into their number, they made them solemnly swear, that they would keep and observe the books of the sect, and the names of the angels with care.' What is said of 'intruding into things not seen,' is also agreeable to the character of the Therapeutic Essenes, who, placing the excellence of their contemplative life in raising their minds to invisible objects, pretended to such a degree of abstraction and elevation, as to be able to understand the nature of angels, to assign them proper names, or rightly interpret those given them, and to search into futurity and foretell things to come. On this account, it is highly probable, 'they were vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind.' Besides, the dogmata to which St. Paul refers in the following words, 'Touch not, taste not, handle not,' are similar to those held by the Essenes, who would not taste any pleasant food, but lived on coarse bread, and drank water only. Some of them would not taste food till after sunset; and if they were touched by any not of their own sect, they washed themselves as after a great pollution.

The manner in which the Essenes lived was peculiar and remarkable. They did not marry, but adopted the children of others, whom they brought up in the institutions of their own sect. They despised riches, and had all things in common. They abstained from the use of oils and perfumes, as luxurious and effeminate. They received all travellers of their own sect with great kindness and hospitality. They never changed their clothes till entirely worn out, and unfit for use. They were very religious. They did not speak before the sun-rise, excepting that they put up a prayer to God, that he would cause the sun to rise upon them. They applied themselves to labour till eleven in the morning, when they assembled together, and bathed themselves in cold water. Being thus purified, they went into the refectory, where they began and ended their meal with praise and thanksgiving to God. No noise or tumult ever disturbed the houses in which they dwelt. They guarded their passions; and their word was equally binding to them as an oath. They studied the writings of the ancients, and inquired into the cure of diseases, and the nature of medicinal herbs and roots. None were received into their sect till they had given sufficient proofs of their continence and temperance. When admitted, they were strictly bound not to communicate the mysteries of the sect to any other. The Essenes expelled those whom they found guilty of any enormous crime. In the administration of justice they were most strictly exact, and never gave sentence except when at least a hundred persons were present. Next to God, they paid the highest respect to their legislators, and punished with death those who spoke evil of them. When any ten of them sat together, no one spoke but with the consent of the other nine; and they carefully avoided spitting in the middle before them, or on the right hand. The Essenes distinguished themselves from all other Jews, by a strict observance of the sabbath; and they durst not on that day so much as move a vessel out of its place, or even to ease nature. They were divided into four classes, according to the time they had been in the sect. Many of them lived to the age of a hundred years. They were men of great constancy and resolution; and in the wars with the Romans, they suffered all kinds of tortures without a groan, rather than speak evil of their legislator. Such is the account of the Essenes as given by Josephus.

Philo speaks of them, and distinguishes them into the Essenes of Judea and Syria, and those of Egypt and other parts. He calls the former practical Essenes, and the other Therapeutic or contemplative Essenes. He derives their name from the Greek word ἅγιος, holy.

Pliny also mentions this sect, and speaks of them as follows: 'On the western side of the lake Asphaltites dwell the Essenes, who are a solitary kind of men, living without women, and without money, and feeding on the fruit of the palm-tree. They are daily recruited by proselytes, whom ill-fortune drives among them to take shelter in their institution and manner of life. Thus, for several thousand years (incredible as it may appear,) this people are kept up in number, without having any born among them.'

It has been queried, whether John the Baptist was not educated in the community of the Essenes? We may observe, 1. That his father and mother being of great age at the time of his birth, it is probable they did not live to see their son arrived at maturity. 2. The community of the Essenes was a likely place for John to retire to; and his first appearance as a preacher being the desert, seems to hint at his beginning to preach repentance, &c. near to those parts where he was best known. 3. It does not appear that John went up regularly to Jerusalem (and the Essenes did not go thither,) and might therefore have no 'personal knowledge' of Jesus; which he has commonly been understood to declare. 4. His manners, as neither eating nor drinking, that is freely, but being of a reserved conduct, are perfectly agreeable to those of the Essenes. 5. His constant abode in the country, and not entering the principal cities, agrees with their customs. 6. The Essenes baptized. 7. They lived near the Jordan. 8. They fed on dates and certain kinds of fruit; and in many other respects they seem to have agreed with the character of John, as it is described or implied in the Gospels.

Deists and Infidels pretend to discover an agreement between the Christian religion and the doctrines of the Essenes, and would thence infer that Christ and his followers were a sect sprung from the Essenes. But, as Dr. Prideaux observes, there are no traces in the accounts given by Philo and Josephus of the most essential doctrines of Christianity, such as the redemption of mankind by the Messiah, and the use of the two Christian sacraments.

The austere and retired life of the Essenes is supposed to have given rise to monkish superstition. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. 12. Prideaux's Connection of the Old and the New Testament, part ii.

ESTABLISHMENTS, Religious. A religious establishment forms no part of Christianity; it is only the means of inculcating it. The authority, therefore, of a church establishment is founded on its utility. When, on this principle, we deliberate concerning the form, propriety, or comparative excellence of different establishments, the single view under which we ought to consider any of them is, that of a scheme of instruction; the single end we ought to propose by them is, the preservation and communication of religious knowledge. The notion of a religious establishment comprehends three things:—a clergy, or an order of men secluded from other professions to attend on the offices of religion; a legal provision for the maintenance of the clergy; and the confining of that provision to the teachers of a particular sect of Christianity.

1. The first and most important question is, whether the knowledge and profession of Christianity can be maintained in a country without a class of men set apart by public authority to the study and teaching of religion, and to the conducting of public worship. It must be remembered, that Christianity is an historical religion, founded on facts which are related to have passed, on discourses which were holden, and letters written, in a remote age, and distant country of the world, as well as under a state of life and manners, and during the prevalence of opinions, customs, and institutions, very unlike any found among mankind at present. Besides, this religion having been first published in the country of Judea, and built on the more ancient religion of the Jews, is necessarily and intimately connected with the Sacred Writings, and with the history and polity of that remarkable people. To this must be added, that the records of both revelations are preserved in languages which have long ceased to be spoken in any part of the world. Books which come down to us from times so remote, and under so many causes of unavoidable obscurity, cannot, it is evident, be understood without study and preparation. The languages must be learned. The various writings which these volumes contain must be carefully compared with one another, and with themselves. The modes of expression, the habits of reasoning and argumentation which were in use at that time, and to which the discourses even of inspired teachers were necessarily adapted, must be sufficiently known, and can be known only by a due acquaintance with ancient literature. Lastly, to establish the genuineness and integrity of the canonical Scriptures themselves, a series of testimony, recognising the notoriety and reception of these books, must be deduced from times near to those of their first publication, through the succession of ages which have existed since that period. The qualifications necessary for such researches demand a degree of leisure, and a mode of education, inconsistent with the exercise of any other profession. Without an order of clergy educated for the purpose, and led to the prosecution of these studies by the habits, the leisure, and the object of their vocation, it may well be questioned whether the learning itself would not have been lost, by which the records of our faith are interpreted and defended. It is therefore contended, that an order of clergy is necessary to perpetuate the evidences of Revelation, and to interpret the obscurity of those ancient writings, in which the religion is contained. But in addition to this, which without doubt forms one design of their institution, the more ordinary offices of public teaching, and of conducting public worship, require qualifications not commonly to be found amidst the employments of civil life.

2. If an order of clergy be necessary, and if it be also necessary to seclude them from the employments and profits of other professions, it is evident that they ought to be enabled to derive a maintenance from their own. This maintenance must either depend on the voluntary contributions of their hearers, or arise from revenues assigned by the authority of law. To the scheme of voluntary contribution this insurmountable objection exists, that few would ultimately contribute any part of their property. Though the zeal of a sect, or the novelty of a change, might support such an experiment for a time, yet no reliance could be placed on it as a general and permanent provision. It is a bad constitution, which presents temptations of interest in opposition to the duties of religion; or which renders the offices of religion expensive to those who attend them; or which allows pretences of conscience as an excuse for not sharing in a public burthen. If men, by refusing to frequent religious assemblies, could save their money, whilst at the same time they indulged their indolence, and their disinclination to exercises of seriousness and reflection; or if, by dissenting from the national religion, they could be excused from contributing to support the ministers of religion; it is to be feared that many would take advantage of the choice thus imprudently left open to them, and that this liberty might finally operate to the decay of virtue, and an irrecoverable forgetfulness of all religion. Is it not to be feared, that, if it were referred to the discretion of each neighbourhood, whether they would maintain among them a teacher or not, many districts would remain unprovided with a minister? It is probable, that associations for the support of Christian worship and instruction would neither be numerous nor long continued. Besides, preaching would in time become a mode of begging. With what sincerity, or with what dignity, can the truths of Christianity be dispensed by a preacher, whose thoughts are constantly solicited to the means of increasing his subscription? For a preacher to be thus at the mercy of his audience; to be obliged to adapt his doctrines to the pleasure of a capricious multitude; to be continually affecting a style and manner neither natural to him, nor agreeable to his judgment; to live in constant bondage to tyrannical and insolent directors; are circumstances extremely mortifying, and are seldom submitted to without a sacrifice of principle, and a deprivation of character.

3. If it be admitted, that a legal provision for the clergy, compulsory on those who contribute to it, is expedient, ought this provision to be confined to one sect of Christianity, or extended indifferently to all? If religious opinions exist, not only so various, but so contradictory, as to render it impossible to reconcile them to each other, or to any one confession of faith, rule of discipline, or form of worship; and if, consequently, separate congregations and different sects must unavoidably continue in a country; it is a question of great importance, whether the laws ought to establish one sect in preference to the rest. This question is very nearly related to, and indeed dependent on another; namely, in what manner, and by whom, ought the ministers of religion to be appointed? If the form of patronage be retained to which we are accustomed in this country, and which allows private individuals to nominate teachers of religion for districts and congregations to which they are entire strangers, without some test proposed to the persons nominated, the greatest discordance of religious opinions might arise between the teachers and their congregations. Wherever, therefore, this constitution of patronage is adopted, a national religion, or the legal preference of one particular religion to all others, must almost necessarily accompany it. If the appointment of the minister should in every parish be left to the choice of the parishioners, without their being limited to the teachers of any particular sect, a Papist, a Presbyterian, a Methodist, a Moravian, or an Anabaptist, might successively obtain possession of the pulpit, according as a majority of the party prevailed at each election. This would create the greatest animosities among the people; and the teacher and his religion would be received by the defeated party with the most unconquerable aversion. If the state appoint the ministers of religion, this constitution will differ little from the establishment of a national religion.

It appears, therefore, that the argument by which ecclesiastical establishments are defended, proceeds as follows: the knowledge and profession of Christianity cannot be upheld without a clergy; a clergy cannot be supported without a legal provision; a legal provision for the clergy cannot be constituted without the preference of one sect of Christians to the rest. Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, Book vi. ch. x.

ESTHER, אֶסְתֵּר, signifies secret, or that demolishes, or proof of physic. Parkhurst observes that the note of the Chaldee Targum on Esth. ii. 7. seems remarkable: 'They called her הַדַּסָּה Hadassah, because she was just, and the just are those that are compared לַמֵּיטֵל to myrtle.' The myrtle tree is famous for the sweetness or fragrance of its flowers and leaves; and hence the name Hadassah.

Esther, or Hadassah, was of the tribe of Benjamin, and daughter of Abihail. Her parents being dead, Mordecai, her uncle by the father's side, took care of her education. After Ahasuerus had divorced Vashti, search was made throughout the Persian empire for the most beautiful women. Esther was one that was chosen, and was carried to court, and committed to the care of an eunuch. Seven young women waited on her; and she continued thus a whole year. When the time was come that she was to be conducted to the king's apartment, she found favour in the sight of king Ahasuerus, who declared her queen in the room of Vashti, and married her with great magnificence. He also bestowed on his people largesses and pardons. Esther had not declared who she was, nor that Mordecai was her uncle, because he had forbidden her.

Mordecai refusing to honour Haman, drew upon himself the indignation of the latter, who, in revenge, obtained from the king an order to put all Jews to death. Mordecai gave notice of this to Esther, and informed her of the necessity that she should wait on the king, and desire the revocation of this edict which Haman had procured from Ahasuerus by surprise. Esther excused herself; but Mordecai, not satisfied, represented to her, that no danger ought to deter her, and that God had in all probability for this purpose raised her to the royal dignity. Esther, therefore, disposed herself by prayer, fasting, and humiliation, to appear before the king.

for shouldst thou ask half of my kingdom I would give it thee. Esther humbly entreated the king, that he would come to a banquet, and, if he pleased, bring Haman with him. At that banquet she requested that he and Haman would dine with her again the next day. The king came, and Haman with him; and Ahasuerus, warmed with wine, repeated his former promises to her. Esther replied, if I have found favour in thy sight, O king, give me my own life, and the lives of my people for whom I implore thy clemency. The king demanded, who had conspired against her life, and the lives of her people? Esther answered, Haman. This enraged the king; and Haman was seized and executed. Immediately, the king revoked his orders to destroy the Jews, whom he permitted to defend themselves.

The book of Esther is a canonical book of the Old Testament. Though Calmet asserts that it has always been esteemed canonical by both Jews and Christians, yet it is still matter of dispute whether it was included in the canon of the Jews. The last six chapters, from the fourth verse of the tenth chapter, are not in the Hebrew. These were probably collected by the Hellenistic Jews, and are expunged from the canon of the sacred books by the Protestants; but the Latin and Greek churches consider them as canonical. There is great diversity of opinion concerning the author of this book. It has been ascribed to Ezra, to Mordecai, to Joachim, and to the joint labours of the great synagogue; and it is impossible to decide which of these opinions is the most probable. As it appears that Dr. Prideaux has satisfactorily shown, that by Ahasuerus we are to understand Artaxerxes Longimanus, the commencement of this history must be placed about the year of the world 3544. It continues through a space not exceeding twenty years. Parkhurst's Heb. Lexicon, p. 153. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theolog. vol. i. p. 92.

ETERNITY, an attribute of God, by which is meant infinite duration or existence, without beginning and without end. The self-existent Being must of necessity be eternal. The ideas of eternity and self-existence are so closely connected, that because something must necessarily be eternal, independently and without any outward cause of its being, it must therefore be necessarily self-existent; and because it is impossible but something must be self-existent, it is therefore necessary that it be also eternal. To be self-existent, is to exist by an absolute necessity in the nature of the thing itself. As this necessity is absolute, and not dependent on any thing external, it must be always unalterably the same; for nothing is changeable, unless it be capable of being affected by something external. That being, therefore, which has no other cause of self-existence, except the absolute necessity of its own nature, must of necessity have existed from everlasting, without beginning, and also, of necessity, exist to everlasting, without end.

With respect to the manner of this eternal existence, it is manifest, that in this it infinitely transcends the manner of the existence of all created beings, even of such as shall exist for ever. It is impossible for their finite minds to comprehend all that is past, or to understand perfectly all things that are present, much less to know all that is future. They cannot have entirely in their power any thing that is to come. Their thoughts, and knowledge, and power, must necessarily have degrees and periods, and be successive and transient, as the things themselves. On the contrary, the eternal Supreme Cause must of necessity have such a perfect, independent, unchangeable comprehension of all things, that there can be no one point or instant of His eternal duration, in which all things that are past, present, and to come, will not be as entirely known and represented to Him in one single thought or view, and that all things present and future be equally entirely in His power and direction, as if there were in reality no succession, but all things were actually present at once.

The schoolmen suppose, that the difference between the manner of the eternal existence of the Supreme Cause, and of the existence of created beings is, that the latter is a continual transient succession of duration, whilst the former is one point or or instant, which comprehends eternity, and in which all things are really co-existent. But on this it has been observed, that we may as well conceive the immensity of God to be a point, as his eternity an instant. As, according to our manner of thinking, we must necessarily suppose the immensity of God to be an infinite expansion of His essence pervading all imaginable space; so must we consider the eternity of God to be a perpetual continuance, co-existent with all imaginable succession of ages. How that can be together, which must necessarily be imagined co-existent with successions, is not easily to be conceived.

In several passages of Scripture, God is styled eternal: 'The eternal God is thy refuge.' (Deut. xxxiii. 27.) 'Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever.' (1 Tim. i. 17.) In the Revelation of St. John, the eternity of God is thus described: 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.' (Rev.

i. 8.) Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christ. Theolog. vol. ii. p. 65. Clarke on the Being and Attributes of God; Tillotson's Sermon. vol. vii. p. 168, edit. 1772.

EVANGELIST, a Greek word which literally signifies one who publishes glad tidings, or is the messenger of good news; but which is generally applied to one who writes or preaches the Gospel of Jesus Christ. In Isaiah (xli. 27.) the Lord says, that He will give Jerusalem one that bringeth good tidings, an evangelist. In Acts (xxi. 8.) Philip, one of the seven deacons of Cæsarea, is called an evangelist. St. Paul speaks of the evangelists (Ephes. iv. 11.) and ranks them after apostles and prophets. He exhorts Timothy to perform the duty of an evangelist. At the commencement of Christianity, there were evangelists and preachers, who without being fixed to any church, preached wherever they were led by the Holy Spirit. (Grot. Acts xxi. 8.) Evangelists, says a learned author, were presbyters of principal sufficiency, whom the apostles sent abroad, and employed as agents in ecclesiastical affairs, wherever they deemed it expedient. Those who are called in Scripture evangelists, as Ananias, Apollos, Timothy, and others, were thus employed. With respect to evangelists afterwards, in the time of Trajan, history mentions, that many of the apostles, disciples, and scholars who were alive at that time, with singular love of wisdom affected the heavenly word of God, and showed their willingness to execute that which Christ first of all requireth at the hands of men: they sold their possessions, which they gave to the poor, and betaking themselves to travel, they undertook the labour of evangelists, and preached the Gospel to those who had not yet heard of the doctrine of faith. The term evangelist is now generally confined to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, the writers of the four Gospels, which bring glad tidings to all men. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, b. v. sect. 78.

EVE, חַוָּה chavah, signifies in the original, life, and is so translated by the Septuagint. Our translators, therefore, ought not to have called the first woman Eve, but Life, because she was to be the mother of all the living. After God had created Adam, He said, it is not good for man to be alone; I will make him an help-meet (help-mate) for him. He therefore made a woman, and brought her to Adam, who said, this is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called ishah (maness, female man; womman, woman,) because taken out of man. It is believed that she was created on the sixth day of the creation, after Adam had reviewed the animals.

Adam and Eve were placed in Paradise, and God forbade them to touch one particular fruit. But the evil one insidiously seduced Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit; and Eve afterwards seduced Adam. By thus transgressing the law of God, they both became degraded, and were punished by expulsion from Paradise, and by subjection to evil, natural and moral. God said to Eve, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee: but thy posterity shall overcome the evil one. After being expelled from Paradise, Eve conceived and brought forth Cain, saying, I have gotten a man from the Lord, or through the divine blessing. She afterwards had Abel and some daughters, Seth, and doubtless many others. Some are of opinion, from the words of the original, that Cain and Abel were twin brothers, of whom Cain was the first-born. The year of Eve's death is unknown. It is presumed that she died about the same time as Adam, in the year of the world 930.

The eastern people have paid some honours to Adam and Eve, as to saints. The Greeks commemorate them on the 19th of November. Epiphanius says, that the Gnostics composed a gospel of Eve, which contained a thousand ridiculous and immodest things. Other heretics said, that Eve had Cain and Abel, not by her husband, but by a monstrous intercourse with the devil. The Indian Brachmans believe, that the sin of the first man consisted in the carnal knowledge of Eve, who was presented to him by the devil. The Mahometans still reverence Eve's grotto in mount Gerizim, three miles from Mecca. They believe that the tomb of this first of woman-kind is at Gidda, on the Red Sea.

EVILMERO'DACH, אֵיל־מֶרֶדַּח 'Eṣṭa-merodach, signifies the fool of Merodach, or despising, the bitterness of the fool; otherwise, the fool grinds bitterly. Evilmerodach, the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, was a profligate and vicious prince, and was therefore called Evilmerodach, that is, foolish Merodach, for his proper name was only Merodach. The accession of this prince is fixed by Dr. Hales to the year before Christ 561. He first governed the kingdom during the indisposition of his father, who after seven years recovered his understanding, re-ascended the throne, and, as some think, imprisoned Evilmerodach. In this confinement, Evilmerodach contracted an acquaintance and friendship with Jehoiachim, king of Judah, who, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, was delivered out of prison by Evilmerodach, and placed above all the other kings that were captives at Babylon. (2 Kings xxv. 27. Jerem. lii. 31.) Evilmerodach reigned only one year, according to the chronology of Usher; but Dr. Prideaux thinks that he reigned two years, and was succeeded by Neriglissar, his sister's husband, who had been at the head of the conspiracy formed against him. Others are of opinion that he reigned three years, and was succeeded by his son Belshazzar. Prideaux's Connect. p. l. b. l; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol ii. pp. 489. 502.

EVIL-SPEAKING, signifies speaking with a malevolent intention, with a design of injuring another's reputation, or in some way to injure him, whether what we say to his disadvantage be true or false. When, therefore, we condemn all manner of evil-speaking, we limit our reprobation to that of which, whether true or false, malice is the cause; of which pain, inconvenience, or injury to another is the object; or which ill-will effuses only in order to occasion misery. It will often happen in the varied intercourse and multiform transactions of life, that we must necessarily say what may redound to the disadvantage of another, in order to serve the cause of truth, justice, and humanity. But let us never forget, that no evil-speaking can be lawful, consistent with the prohibitions of the Gospel, except that which has truth for its basis, benevolence for its origin, and good for its end. A witness in a court of justice is bound to declare the truth respecting any criminal. A judge or magistrate may reprove a delinquent with that gravity which is suitable to his station, and with that warmth which the love of virtue or the abhorrence of vice will inspire; but, in order to avoid the offence of evil-speaking, it is his duty to regulate his rebukes by discretion, and temper them with charity. If a tradesman were to ask whether he might safely, or without any probable chance of loss, give credit to an individual with whose character and circumstances we were well acquainted, we should be guilty of sinning against truth, justice, and humanity, if we represented him in affluence whom we knew to be involved in pecuniary difficulties, or if we described him as punctual in his engagements, and honest in his dealings, in whom we had discovered a laxness of morals, or a want of fidelity or justice.

We ought never to speak of any one in harsh and opprobrious language without sufficient cause, or more than the circumstances of the case will justify. We are not to speak ill of others because they do not think as we do; because their political or religious opinions are different from ours; because they disagree with us in manners, taste, and other things of an indifferent nature; because they have refused us what perhaps we had no right to ask, or not conferred upon us what we had no reason to expect. Men are often prompted to speak evil of others from resentment; and when they are prevented by impotence, or restrained by fear, from doing any other injury, they think that they may safely give vent to the rancour of their hearts, in foul aspersions, mischievous slanders, and envenomed lies. They are too prone to speak slightly and contemptuously of others. But it is our duty not to harbour any contempt in our hearts against any one, however inferior he may be to us in acquired endowments, personal accomplishments, or outward circumstances. The prosperity of others, their elevation or affluence, their success in life, the lustre of their virtues, or the celebrity of their reputation, frequently excite the calumnies of those who measure their own honour by others' depression, their own wealth by others' poverty, their own happiness by others' misfortunes. Men sometimes speak evil of others, in order to gratify some sinister views, or to promote some selfish ends. But surely all such conduct is totally repugnant both to the spirit and the letter of the Gospel of Christ, which enjoins the utmost benevolence, simplicity, and disinterestedness in our conduct.

Men will sometimes throw out the most injurious aspersions, or vent the most indecent and unfounded reports respecting the reputation of others. But from whatever cause, except that of obedience to some moral obligation, evil-speaking may proceed, or whatever form it may assume, it is diametrically opposite to that religion which we profess, and of which the crowning excellence is an unbounded charity, and cannot therefore be too strongly prohibited, or too scrupulously avoided. The perfection of practical religion consists in doing as we would be done by. But how opposite is every species of evil-speaking to this sovereign rule of life? Who would willingly have evil spoken of him? and can he, therefore, without doing violence to his own sense of right, speak evil of others? Who amongst us loves to be reviled? On the contrary, does not every malicious word, every foul reproach, or scurrilous taunt which is uttered against us, excite our aversion towards the person that utters it? What a powerful dissuasion from evil-speaking have we in the prohibitions and denunciations of the Scriptures! Our Lord says, 'Whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council;' that is, whoever shall speak reproachfully of his fellow-creature, though only in a slight degree, shall receive a proportionate punishment. But 'whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire;' that is, whoever shall give vent to the malice of his heart, in virulence of invective, and fury of abuse, will, in a greater degree, provoke the wrath, and incur the vengeance of God. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 298—317; Sermons by George Carr, vol. ii. pp. 289, &c.

EUNUCH, Εὐνοῦχος, signifies a keeper of the bed, or bed-chamber; otherwise, deprived of cohabitation. Eunuchs are persons so called, because generally in the courts of eastern kings, the care of the beds and apartments belonging to the princes and princesses, is committed to them; but chiefly of the princesses, who live secluded. The Hebrew saris is generally supposed to denote a real eunuch, whether naturally born such, or rendered such. But in Scripture this word frequently denotes an officer belonging to a prince, attending his court, and employed in the interior of the palace; and hence it is a name only of office and dignity, and does not necessarily imply that he who is so employed had suffered personal mutilation. In the Persian and Turkish courts, the principal employments are at this day possessed by real eunuchs. Potiphar, the eunuch of Pharaoh, and master of Joseph, had a wife and children. (Gen. xxxix. 1. 7.; xli. 45.)

God forbid his people to make eunuchs; and such persons were not to enter into the congregation of the Lord. (Deut. xxiii. 1.) Some think, that God by this forbids eunuchs to marry with Israelites; some, that he prohibits them to enter his temple; some, that he excludes them from the magistracy; and others, that he debars them simply the possession of some outward privileges belonging to the Israelites, as people of the Lord. They were considered in the commonwealth as dry and useless wood, and might say of themselves, 'Behold I am a dry tree.' (Isai. lvi. 3.) In the courts of the kings of Judah and Israel were officers called Sarisim, eunuchs, who probably were real eunuchs, if they were slaves taken or bought from foreigners, but if Hebrews, the name eunuch expresses simply their office and dignity. Our Saviour (Matt. xix. 12.) speaks of a sort of eunuchs, 'who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake;' the word eunuch is here used in a figurative sense, to denote a person who, on a religious account, mortifies his natural inclinations, and refrains from marriage. Parkhurst's Greek and Eng. Lexicon, p. 270, octav. edit. 1812. Heb. and Eng. Lexicon, p. 504. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. xciv. p. 153.

EUPHRA'TES, פַּרַת Phrath, signifies fruitful, or fructifying, or increasing. The Euphrates rises in Armenia, and runs in a southern direction to the Persian Gulf. Between this river and the Tigris, which is east of it, are Mesopotamia and the land of Shinar; and east of the Tigris is Assyria.

Some have thought that the Euphrates is the Hirmund in India, which is supposed by them to have been one of the rivers of Paradise, and which in the language of the country implies ablation.

The Mesopotamian Euphrates, is a river of consequence in Scripture geography, being the boundary which separated Padan Aram from Syria, and the utmost limits, on the east, of the kingdom of the Israelites. Its general course is south-east; but in some places it runs westerly, and by this means approaches the Mediterranean, near Cilicia. It is accompanied in most parts of its course by the Tigris; and the country included between them is called Mesopotamia, or 'Between the rivers.' Upon its banks are many towns, and much fruitful land, in different places. It does not appear to be of a very great breadth. Abulfeda says, that it rises north-east of Erzeroum; that it receives the waters of many streams in its course, as the Murad, the Rouha, the Khabour or Chaboras, and others; that at length it joins the Tigris, and the united waters of those rivers form a kind of sea, in which are many islands; and that all their branches being combined at Korna, they flow together to Basra, whence they fall into the Persian Gulf.

Tournefort tells us, that the sources of the Euphrates are two; one about a day's journey, the other nearly double the distance, from Erzeroum. They rise in mountains not so high indeed as the Alps, but covered with snow nearly the whole year. These two branches are called the Frat, the name of the river which they form. After their junction, which is three days' journey from Erzeroum, the Frat begins to be capable of carrying little Saicks, but its channel is full of rocks. The mountains in which are the sources of the Euphrates, are one of the divisions of Mount Taurus, according to Strabo; but Dionysius, the geographer, calls it the Armenian Mountains.

Moses (Gen. ii. 14.) says, that the Euphrates is the fourth river whose source was in Paradise.

Ranwolf says, that the Euphrates, when he crossed at Beer, about the year 1575, was a mile broad; Maundrell, that it was as broad, in his time, as the Thames at London; Otter, who crossed it in 1734, that its breadth, according to conjecture, exceeded not two hundred common paces, though lower down, upon the plain, it spread to the width of five or six hundred paces, at the time of its increase; and Mr. Buckingham, who crossed it in 1816, that the river is hereabout, (near Beer,) the general breadth of the Nile, below the first cataract to the sea, and that it is considerably larger than the Orontes or the Jordan, and is at least equal to the Thames at Blackfriars-bridge. Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. i. p. 49; Sacred Geography.

EUSTATHIANS, a denomination in the fourth century, who derived their name from Eustathius, a monk. This man was the occasion of great disorders and divisions in Armenia, Pontus, and the neighbouring countries; and, in consequence, he was condemned and excommunicated by the council of Gangra, which was held soon after that of Nice. Whether this was the same Eustathius, who was bishop of Sebastia in Armenia, and the chief of the Semi-arians; or whether the ancient historians have confounded two different persons of the same name, is a matter difficult to determine. However, the leader of the Eustathian sect prohibited marriage, the use of wine and flesh, feasts of charity, and other things of that nature. To those who were joined in wedlock he prescribed immediate divorce; and he obliged his followers to quit all they had, as incompatible with the hopes of heaven. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 313.

EXAMPLE, a copy or pattern. It has often been said, that example is more instructive than precept. In example we see precept not only in its theoretical beauty, but in its practical effects. General exhortations to duty are frequently vapid and unsatisfactory, and take little hold on the mind and affections; but when we see the different consequences of virtue and vice, illustrated in the lives of our fellow-creatures, our attention is more powerfully excited, and we are impelled to good or deterred from evil, less by the cogency of the precept than of the example. When we view the good actions of others, the temptations which they resisted, or the virtues which they displayed in difficult circumstances, we are naturally led to admire them. This admiration will kindle in us a desire to do the same, while it causes us to think the work more easy, or invigorate our exertions by the success of their's. What has been once done, we know may be done again; and as far as acts of moral goodness are concerned, nothing is impossible to those who, through divine grace, labour to do the will of God. The contemplation of the good actions of others, naturally tends to produce a love of those actions, and with a desire to imitate them it will infuse a secret regret for our past neglect. The bitterness of heart, the painful dissatisfaction with ourselves, occasioned by the consciousness of having lived viciously or unprofitably, is often the germ of improvement, and the first advance towards virtue. To admire good actions is to detest bad ones; for we cannot, at the same time, admire both good and bad actions, any more than we can admire beauty and deformity. When we contemplate the virtues of any of our fellow-creatures, our affections vibrate towards them; we learn to sympathize with their feelings, and to put ourselves in their situations. Hence, good examples are a powerful incentive to virtue.

But in the examples even of the best men, considered as patterns for our imitation, we shall always find something to blame as well as to commend, something to shun as well as to pursue. Though we may imitate the general conduct of good men, yet we must always do it with certain reserves and limitations. But in imitating the life of Jesus Christ, we need not be afraid of being seduced into sin, or led into error. The rule of life which the evangelic history shows us, embodied in the example of Christ, is as perfect as that which is inculcated in His precepts. Hence the apostles, when they wish to impress on their followers the practice of any of the Christian virtues, and particularly of those which are most difficult, because most adverse to the human appetites and inclinations, labour to animate their endeavours by appealing to the example of Christ. Thus St. Peter, exhorting Christians to exhibit an habitual purity in their manners and conversation, says, 'as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation.' (1 Pet. i. 15.) The same apostle, recommending patience, invites the attention of those whom he addressed, to the example of Christ, who, he says, 'left us an example that ye should follow his steps; who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.' (1 Pet. ii. 21—23.) St. Paul urging on the Ephesians the necessity of mutual charity, says, 'Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us.' (Ephes. v. 2.) The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xii. 1, 2, 3.) exhorts also to patience with pious earnestness: 'Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.' The apostles uniformly suppose, that we cannot be Christians without imitating the example of Christ; and it is certain that the more assiduously we copy after His example, and endeavour to approach the likeness of His most holy life, the better Christians we become. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. pp. 429, 430, 436; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, p. 81.

EXCOMMUNICATION, an ecclesiastical penalty, by which they who incur the guilt of any heinous sin are separated from the communion of the church, and deprived of spiritual advantages.

Excommunication among the Jews is said by Selden to have been of two kinds; the greater and the less. The form of the less excommunication was short, and consisted only in saying, 'Let such an one be excommunicated.' That of the greater was long, and filled with terrible maledictions. The judges of the synagogue, or even private persons, had a right to excommunicate; but, regularly, the house of judgment, or the court of justice, solemnly pronounced the sentence of excommunication. One particular person might excommunicate another; and this excommunication, if well founded, was of force; otherwise he, who excommunicated another without reason, was himself excommunicated. With respect to the effects of the Jewish excommunications, the less excluded the excommunicated person from the society of men, and he was not to approach even his wife, children, and domestics, within four cubits. The greater excommunication entirely secluded the person from the conversation of others; and sometimes he was shut up in a small chamber or prison, where he lived alone. Baronius and Beza say, that the greater excommunication excluded men from the use of sacred things, that they were not suffered to enter into the temple or synagogue to sacrifice. But this is controverted by Selden and Buxtorf, who think that they were allowed to be present at the public worship in the temple; but the latter adds that they were obliged to go in and out by the same way. The Jews were expressly commanded 'to cut off from the congregation' (Exod. xii. 19. Lev. vii. 20.; xvii. 14.) those who had been guilty of certain offences; and it is, therefore, scarcely credible, that excommunicated persons were allowed to enter the temple, and be present at public worship. It appears also from the New Testament, that the practice of casting or putting out of the synagogue prevailed among them in the time of our Saviour. (John ix. 22. 34; xii. 42.; xvi. 2.)

Every Christian church has power to excommunicate in cases of gross immorality or obstinate disobedience. A wilful contempt of order and authority includes in it the source of every irregularity; it destroys the respect by which all the other ends of religious society are to be attained, and tends directly to the dissolution of the whole body. Hence we find that exclusion from sacred rites, when occasion required it, was practised under the heathen forms of worship, and was always esteemed a severe punishment. Under the Gospel dispensation, St. Paul directs the Corinthians to excommunicate a man who had been guilty of an incestuous marriage, (1 Cor. v. 13.); and afterwards, on his giving proofs of repentance, he ordered them to receive him again into the church. (2 Cor. ii. 6.) The same apostle said to Titus, to whom he had entrusted the care of the Cretan churches, 'A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject.' (Tit. iii. 10.) Our Saviour observed to his disciples, 'If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear thee tell it unto the church; and if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.' (Matt. xviii. 15, &c.) If Christ gave this direction concerning the private trespass of one Christian against another, the same authority ought surely to be allowed in case of public offences. Yet, as repentance, in regaining the favour of God, is unequivocally required in Scripture, it becomes us to pay all possible regard to it in the present world. If therefore we have reason to believe that an excommunicated person sincerely repents of his crimes, we ought to receive him, and treat him again as a fellow Christian. For this we have the example of St. Paul, in the case of the incestuous person at Corinth. However, as excommunication is a public sentence pronounced by a lawful magistrate, so restoration of an excommunicated person to communion with the church ought to be a public act, and with such forms, and after performing such penance, as the church has thought proper to prescribe.

In the early age of the Christian church, excommunication was practised for certain offences, and excommunicated persons were upon repentance again restored to communion. There were two sorts of excommunication, the less and the greater. By the former, men were excluded from partaking of the sacrament, but were allowed to attend the other parts of divine service; by the latter they were expelled entirely from the church, and were not permitted to be present at the performance of any public office of religion: the former was temporary; but the latter perpetual, unless the delinquent gave full proof of his repentance. These punishments, whilst a just sense of religion prevailed, and separation from the public worship was considered as a great evil, produced a very salutary effect; but the power of excommunication, which was at first kept within due bounds, was gradually enlarged, and was at last carried to an exorbitant height, and perverted to the worst of purposes. The popes of Rome inflicted it upon the most trifling and improper occasions, and in a manner authorized neither by reason nor Scripture, and utterly unknown in more ancient times. Among the early Christians, excommunication did not deprive a person of any of his natural or civil rights. But the popes, by their excommunications, pretended not only to take away the common rights of nature and of social life, as the obedience due from children to their parents, and protection from the magistrate, but also to depose princes from their thrones, and absolve subjects from their allegiance. They even interdicted whole churches and nations, and forbade them the use of the sacraments. For the most frivolous and unjust causes, they endeavoured to dissolve every tie which keeps mankind united, and to deprive whole countries of every social and religious comfort. In consequence of this extravagant and mischievous usurpation, papal excommunication fell, in process of time, into total disregard. Most of the reformed churches asserted the power of excommunication; it forms a part of our church discipline, but has of late years been very seldom exercised. *Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. EX'ODUS, "Ἐξόδος, signifies the going out or departure; and by the Codex Alexandrinus, this book is called "Ἐξόδος Αἰγύπτου, the departure from Egypt, because the departure from Egypt is the most remarkable fact mentioned in the whole book. It is the second of the sacred books of the Old Testament. It contains the birth of Moses, his education, and flight; the persecutions of the Hebrews by the kings of Egypt; the return of Moses; the plagues of Egypt; the departure of the Hebrews; the passage of the Red Sea; the giving of the law; the erection of the tabernacle; and the celebration of the second passover. It contains the history of about 145 years, from the death of Joseph, in the year of the world 2369, to the year of the world 2514.

Though, according to the general computation, the Hebrews dwelt in Egypt only 215 years, yet we read in Exodus (xii. 40.) that 'the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years.' To obviate this difficulty, it has been proposed to adopt the reading of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which is as follows: 'Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, and of their fathers, which they sojourned in the land of Canaan and in the land of Egypt, was 430 years.' This same sum is given by St. Paul (Gal. iii. 17.) who reckons from the promise made to Abraham, when God commanded him to go to Canaan, to the giving of the law, which soon followed the departure from Egypt. This chronology of the apostle agrees with the Samaritan Pentateuch, which, by preserving the two passages, they and their fathers, and, in the land of Canaan, which are lost out of the present copies of the Hebrew text, has rescued this passage from all obscurity and contradiction. It may be necessary to observe, that the Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint has the same reading as that in the Samaritan. Kennicott's Dissertation on the Hebrew Text; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exodus.

EXPIATION. The Hebrews had several sorts of expiatory sacrifices: for sins of ignorance; for purification from certain legal pollutions, as of a woman after lying-in, of a leper when cleansed of his leprosy, &c. who were to offer sacrifices in order to be purified.

EXPIATION, the great day of, the tenth of Tizri, which answers to our September. The Hebrews call it chippur, pardon or expiation, because the faults of the year were then expiated. The principal ceremonies were the following. After the high-priest had washed not only his hands and his feet, as usual at common sacrifices, but his whole body, he dressed himself in plain linen, like the other priests. At the same time, he wore neither his purple robe, nor the ephod, nor the pectoral, because he was to expiate his own sins, as well as those of the people. He first offered a bullock and a ram for his own sins and those of the priests; and putting his hands on the heads of these victims, he confessed his own sins, and the sins of his house. He then received from the princes of the people two goats for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, to be offered in the name of the whole nation. The lot determined which of the two goats should be sacrificed, and which set at liberty. After this, the high-priest put some of the sacred fire of the altar of burnt-offerings into a censer, threw incense upon it, and entered with it thus smoking into the sanctuary. After he had perfumed the sanctuary with this incense, he came out, took some of the blood of the young bullock he had sacrificed, carried that also into the sanctuary, and dipping his fingers in it, sprinkled it seven times between the ark and the vail, which separated the holy from the sanctuary, or most holy. He then came out a second time, and beside the altar of burnt-offerings killed the goat, which the lot had determined to be sacrificed. He carried the blood of this goat into the most holy sanctuary, and sprinkled it seven times between the altar and the vail, which separated the holy from the sanctuary. He thence returned into the court of the tabernacle, and sprinkled both sides of it with the blood of the goat. During all this, none of the priests or people was admitted into the tabernacle, or into the court. After this, the high-priest came to the altar of burnt-offerings, wetted the four horns of it with the blood of the goat and young bullock, and sprinkled it seven times with the same blood. The sanctuary, the court, and the altar being thus purified, the high-priest directed the goat which had been set at liberty by the lot, to be brought to him. He put his hand on the goat's head, confessed his own sins, and the sins of the people, and then delivered the goat to a person appointed, who was to carry it into some desert place, and let it loose, or, as others say, throw it down some precipice. See AZAZEL and SCAPE GOAT.

The great day of expiation was a principal solemnity of the Hebrews. It was a day of rest and strict fasting; and the Hebrews confessed themselves ten times on this day. They also put an end to all differences, and were reconciled to each other. Many Jews spent the night preceding the great day of expiation in prayer and penitential exercises. It was the custom for the high-priest to separate from his wife seven days before this festival, lest he should contract some pollution. He was also obliged to swear, that he would not change the ancient rites in any particular. When the ceremony was finished, the high-priest read the law, gave the blessing to the people, changed his dress, and made a great entertainment for joy that he had come unhurt out of the sanctuary. The people fasted punctually during the whole of this holy day, to which they attributed great effects; for, according to the Jews, repentance, though accompanied with the resolution of living well, only suspends sins, but the feast of expiation abolishes them entirely, and they who die before this day expiate them by their death.

The modern Jews prepare themselves for this feast by prayer and ablution. They carry wax candles to the synagogue; and the most devout have two, one for the body, the other for the soul. The women also light up candles in their houses, from the brightness of which, and the consistency of the tallow or wax, they form presages. The whole day is spent in strict fasting, without exception of age or sex. Since the destruction of their temple, they sacrifice on this occasion a cock instead of the legal victims. At the conclusion of the solemnity, the Rabbi gives his blessing to the people, who afterwards return home, put on clean white clothes, and break their fast.

Some Jews believe that Adam repented, and began his penance on the day of solemn expiation; that on this day Abraham was circumcised; that Isaac was bound in order to be sacrificed; and, lastly, that on this day Moses descended from Mount Sinai with the new tables of the law. Maimon. de Poenitent. cap. 10, p. 99; *Buxtorf. EXTREME UNCTION, the fifth of the Popish sacraments, is practised by the priests of the church of Rome upon the sick, who are supposed to be past recovery, and is believed to give final pardon for sin, with all necessary assistances in the last agony. The oil, which has been previously blessed by a bishop, is applied to the five senses, with these words, Per hanc sacram unctionem, et suam piissimam misericordiam, indulgeat tibi Deus quicquid peccasti per visum, auditum, olfactum, gustum et tactum: and as each of the words denoting the five senses is pronounced, the organ of that sense is anointed. The church of Rome quotes the two following passages in the New Testament, to prove that extreme unction ought to be considered as a sacrament: St. Mark (vi. 13.) relates, that the apostles, to whom Christ gave a temporary commission to preach in Judea, 'anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.' And St. James gives this direction in his General Epistle, (v. 14.) 'Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up.' Among other miraculous gifts communicated by Christ to his apostles during his ministry, and afterwards by the Holy Ghost to the early preachers of the Gospel, was that of curing diseases; and it is evident that both the above passages refer to the exercise of that supernatural power, and of course the efficacy of anointing with oil would cease, when that power was withdrawn from the church. Besides, the unction spoken of by these two apostles was intended to restore the sick to health, and not for the good of their souls when life was despaired of. Indeed, it was nothing more than one of those symbolical actions with which miracles were wrought under both the old and new dispensation. Oil was constantly used in the eastern countries, and therefore the apostles and elders applied it to the sick, whom they were empowered to heal. The gift of healing diseases probably ceased in the third century. No general practice of anointing is noticed or alluded to in any of the numerous writers, or in the canons of the various councils, of the first six centuries. In the seventh century, the Christians began to anoint their sick, but it was intended only to promote their recovery. This anointing frequently failed, as the means of restoring health; and in the tenth century, the clergy pretended, that though it did not benefit the bodies, it was of great service to the souls, of the sick. This doctrine was generally believed about the middle of the twelfth century. Pope Eugenius, in the council of Florence, decreed extreme unction to be a sacrament; this was confirmed by the council of Trent; and it is still practised as such by Papists. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theolog. vol. ii. p. 428.

EYE, the organ of sight. The Hebrews call fountains eyes, and give the same name to colours (Num. xi. 7.) The Psalmist (Ps. cxxiii. 2.) says, 'As the eyes of servants look unto the hands of their masters,' that is, to observe their least motions, and obey their least signal; for in the east, many of the most important orders which a master can give, or a servant receive, are given and received in profound silence: the least wink of the eye, or motion of the fingers, in a manner imperceptible to strangers, is a sufficient order to the servant. It is said (Gen. iii. 7.) that 'their eyes were opened,' that is, they began to comprehend in a new manner.

The eye and its actions are occasionally transferred to God. 'The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good, (Prov. xv. 3.);' 'the eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the whole earth.' (Zech. iv. 10. 2 Chron. xvi. 9. Psalm xi. 4.)

The eye appears to be used symbolically in Zech. iii. 9. 'Therefore, behold the stone, precious stone, ring-stone, signet, which I will give to the face of Joshua—it shall be 'one stone having seven eyes' engraved upon it—'behold, I will engrave the engraving thereof'—that is, as a symbol of penetration, and activity—of close inspection, and accuracy, in the management of business: this shall be the device upon his seal of office,—such shall be the character, &c.

We read, (Matt. vi. 22.) 'the light or lamp, of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, simple, clear (ἀπλοῦς), thy whole body shall be full of light: but if thine eye be evil, distempered, diseased, thy whole body shall be full of darkness.' The direct allusion may hold to a lantern, or lamp (λύχνος): if the glass of it be clear, the light within will shine through it with a sprightly lustre; but if the glass be soiled, dirty, foul, very little light will pass through it. In the east they had lanterns made of thin linen, &c. which were very liable to receive spots, stains, and foulnesses that impeded the passage of the rays of light from the luminary within. In the natural eye, if the cornea be single, and the humors clear, the sight will be correct; but if there be a film over the cornea, or a cataract, or a skin between any of the humors, the rays of light will make no impression on the retina, the internal seat of light. If the mental eye, the judgment, be honest, virtuous, sincere, and pious, it will enlighten and direct the whole of a person's actions; but if it be perverse, malign, biassed by undue prejudices, it will darken the understanding, pervert the conduct of the party, and suffer him to be misled by his unruly passions.

We read in Matthew (vii. 3.) 'Why beholdest thou the mote, the little black speck, which is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam, the almost cataract-like film, which is in thine own eye?' The word κάρφος is interpreted by some a little splinter of wood, by others a little seed; perhaps it may refer to a small film, the size of a seed. The word δοκός signifies a beam, or rafter, and may be used parabolically; but it has been queried, whether it might not import a real disorder of the eye, 'so called from its closure, fitting in to the eye, as beams or rafters are fitted into each other in building: as if our Saviour had said, 'Why beholdest thou, with affected superiority and keenness of observation, the little seed-like film which floats in thy brother's eye, but art insensible of the closed up state of thine own eye?' Perhaps this would be well expressed by our English phrase a wall-eye, that is, one blind, nearly or altogether dark, but not extracted, or absolutely disfigured. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.; Fragments annexed to Calmet, No. xxix. p. 52.

EYE-LIDS. It is not customary among us for women to paint their eye-lids particularly; and we therefore do not usually perceive the full import of the expressions in Scripture referring to this custom, which is of very great antiquity, and is still observed in the East. It is said (2 Kings ix. 30.) 'Jezebel painted her face,' put her eyes in paint, or rather she painted the internal part of her eye-lids, by drawing between them a silver wire previously wetted and dipped in the powder of phue (rich lead ore), which adhering to the eye-lids, formed a streak of black upon them, thereby, apparently, enlarging the eyes, rendering their effect more powerful, and invigorating their vivacity. This action is strongly referred to in our translation of Jer. iv. 30. 'though thou rendest thine eye with painting,' or though thou cause thine eye-lids to seem to be starting out of thine head, through the strength of the black paint applied to them, yet shall that decoration be in vain. It is alluded to in Prov. vi. 25. 'Lust not after her beauty (of the strange woman) in thine heart: neither let her captivate thee with her eye-lids,' which she has rendered so large and brilliant by the assistance of art, as to enchant beholders. It is also referred to in Ezek. xxiii. 40. 'for whom hast thou washed thyself, and hast coloured, painted, thine eyes, (rather eye-lids), and hast decked thyself with ornaments?' Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.; Parkhurst's Hebrew Lexicon, p. 575. octav. edit. 1811.

EZE'KIEL, יְחִיָּהּ, signifies the strength of God, or supported of God, or God is my strength. Ezekiel, the son of Buzi, a prophet of the sacerdotal race, was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3405. It does not appear that he had prophesied before he came into Mesopotamia. He began his ministry in the thirtieth year of his age, according to the general accounts, or rather in the thirtieth year after the covenant was renewed with God in the reign of Josiah, (Ezek. i. 1.) which answers to the fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity, in the year of the world 3409. He prophesied twenty years, to the year of the world 3430, which was the fourteenth after the taking of Jerusalem.

When Ezekiel was among the captives on the river Chebar, the Lord appeared to him in a vision, on a throne, or kind of chariot, borne by four cherubim, supported upon four wheels. There appeared to be presented to him a roll of a book, which he seemed to eat. The Lord directed His word to him, appointed him the watchman of His people, commanded him to shut himself up in his house, and foretold that he should be seized, and bound with chains as a madman, which happened accordingly. Whilst he was thus confined, God commanded him to delineate on a brick, or piece of soft earth, the city of Jerusalem, besieged, and surrounded with ramparts; to put a wall of iron between him and the city; and to continue 390 days lying on his left side, to denote the iniquity of the kingdom of Israel, and 40 days on his right side, to denote the iniquities of Judah. The vision of the 'wheels' is thought by some to be intended to describe the formidableness of the Babylonian army, and the dreadful effects that would follow to both the people that remained in the land, and to the city and temple. This opinion is founded on what was one principal design of the prophet's peculiar business to that people, which was to remonstrate with them on their great national wickedness, and to assure them that if they did not repent and obey the law of God, he would most certainly punish them; as represented by him, and also by Jeremiah his contemporary. The 390 and 40, or 430 days, denoted the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, its duration, and the length of the captivity of the ten tribes, which was to last 390 years, and that of Judah forty years. This last period commenced at the sackage of Jerusalem, in the reign of Zedekiah, or rather, in the fourth year after this siege, when Nebuzaradan carried away the remains of the Jews to Babylon, in the year of the world 3420, and ended at the death of Belshazzar, about 3466, according to Usher.

Afterwards, God commanded Ezekiel to take wheat, barley, beans, lentiles, millet, and fitches, and with these to make as many loaves as he was to continue days lying on his side, and to bake them with human excrement. Ezekiel expressing his reluctance to this, God permitted him to substitute cow-dung, signifying by this, that in Jerusalem the Israelites should be reduced, during the siege, to the necessity of eating unclean bread, in small quantity, and in continual terrors. After this, he was to cut off his hair; to divide it into three parts; to burn one, cut another in pieces with a sword, and scatter the rest in the wind; typifying the fate of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The year following, Ezekiel was transported in spirit to Jerusalem, and shown by God the abominations and idolatries committed by the Jews there. God commanded an angel to mark, as a pledge of security, the penitents in Jerusalem, and other angels to slay those not marked. Five years before the last siege of Jerusalem, the Lord directed Ezekiel to prepare for escape, as it were from enemies, by stealth, in like manner as Zedekiah should do.

During these predictions in Mesopotamia, Zedekiah, king of Judah, combined with Egypt, Edom, and the neighbouring princes, to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who marched against Jerusalem, and besieged it. On the same day, Ezekiel, who was in Mesopotamia, two hundred leagues from Jerusalem, declared this event to the Jews who were his companions in captivity, and represented to them the future ruin of Jerusalem. At the same time, the prophet's wife dying, God forbade him to mourn for her. When the people asked the prophet what he meant by these figurative actions, he answered that God was about to deprive them of their temple, city, country, and friends, and that they should not have even the sad consolation of mourning for them.

From the beginning of the twenty-fifth to the end of the thirty-second chapter, the prophet foretells the conquest and ruin of many nations and cities, which had insulted the Jews in their affliction; of the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, and Philistines; of Tyre, of Sidon, and Egypt. All these were to be punished by the same mighty instrument of God's wrath against the wickedness of man. In these prophecies, he not only predicts events which were soon to take place, but also describes the condition of the several countries in the remote periods of the world. From the thirty-second to the fortieth chapter, Ezekiel inveighs against the accumulated sins of the Jews collectively, and the murmuring spirit of his captive brethren; exhorts them earnestly to repent of their hypocrisy and wickedness, on the assurance that God will accept sincere repentance; and comforts them with promises of approaching deliverance under Cyrus: he subjoins clear intimations of some far more glorious, but distant, redemption under the Messiah, though the manner in which it is to be effected is deeply involved in mystery. The last nine chapters contain a remarkable vision of the structure of a new temple, and a new polity, applicable in the first instance to the return from the Babylonian captivity, but in its ultimate sense referring to the glory and prosperity of the universal church of Christ.

It has been observed by Jerome, that the visions of Ezekiel are among the things in Scripture difficult to be understood. This obscurity arises, in part at least, from the nature and design of the prophecies themselves, which were delivered amidst the gloom of captivity, and which, though calculated to cheer the drooping spirits of the Jews, and to keep alive a watchful and submissive confidence in the mercy of God, yet were intended to communicate only such a degree of encouragement, as was consistent with a state of punishment, and to excite an indistinct expectation of future blessings, on condition of repentance and amendment. The last twelve chapters of this book bear a very striking resemblance to the concluding chapters of the Revelation. The writings of this prophet have been always acknowledged canonical; and it was never disputed that he was their author. Yet the Jews say, that the sanhedrim deliberated a long time whether his book should form a part of the canon. They objected to the great obscurity of his prophecy in the beginning and end; and to what he says (xviii. 2—20.) that the son should not bear the iniquity of his father, which is contrary to Moses; who says, that the Lord visiteth the sins of the fathers on the children to the third and fourth generation. But it is observable, that Moses himself (Deut. xxiv. 16.) says the very same thing as Ezekiel; and in the passage respecting the visiting of the iniquities of the father upon the children, God may be understood as saying, 'The judges may not detect this crime, but I will; or if I forbear from punishing the immediate culprit, I will punish his posterity, if they continue in the same course: therefore, as you value your children, be sure to avoid idolatry.'

"The style of Ezekiel is characterized by Bishop Lowth, as bold, vehement, and tragical; as often worked up to a kind of tremendous dignity. This book is highly parabolical, and abounds with figures and metaphorical expressions. Ezekiel may be compared to the Grecian Æschylus; he displays a rough but majestic dignity; an unpolished, though noble simplicity; inferior perhaps in originality and elegance to others of the prophets, but unequalled in that force and grandeur for which he is particularly celebrated. He sometimes emphatically and indignantly repeats his sentiments, fully dilates his pictures, and describes the adulterous manners of his countrymen under the strongest and most exaggerated representations, that the license of the eastern style would permit. The middle part of the book is in some measure poetical, and contains even some perfect elegies, though his thoughts are in general too irregular and uncontrolled to be chained down to rule, or fettered by language.' Gray's Key to the Old Testament; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. vol. i. p. 114; Additions to Calmet's Dict.; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. 2 R. 340.

EZ'RA, עֶזְרָא, signifies aid, help; otherwise court. Ezra was of the sacerdotal family, and is said by some to have been the son of Seraiah the high-priest, whom Nebuchadnezzar had put to death at Riblatha, after the taking of Jerusalem. Others, however, think it more probable, that he was his grandson, or great grandson. Calmet is of opinion, that the first return of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem was with Zerubbabel, in the commencement of Cyrus's reign, about the year of the world 3468; but Dr. Prideaux concludes from the beginning of the seventh chapter, that he did not return to Jerusalem till the reign of Artaxerxes. Ezra wrote the account of the return of the Jews, &c.; and as he was very skilful in the law, and zealous for the service of God, he had doubtless a great share in all the transactions of his time.

The enemies of the Jews procured from the court of Persia an order forbidding them to continue the building of the temple, which they had resumed after the death of Cyrus and Cambyeses; but this order being revoked in the beginning of Darius's reign, the son of Hystaspes, in 3485, they proceeded and dedicated the temple in 3489. In the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and in the year of the world 3537, Ezra was chosen by that prince to be chief of those who returned from the captivity; and a full commission was given him to settle the church and state of the Jews, according to the institutions of Moses. Ezra convened a great company of Israelites, and set forward for Jerusalem. (Ezra viii.) At the banks of the river Ahava, he sent to invite some priests and ministers of the temple, who were at Casiphia (probably in the Caspian mountains), to return with him; and two hundred and fifty-eight persons came to him. He appointed a solemnity to pray to God for a prosperous journey, and he gave an account of the gold and silver vessels which the king had restored. They proceeded on their journey, in number one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five men, and all arrived happily in Judea, in the year of the world 3537.

Ezra was informed, that both priests and Levites, magistrates and common people, had married wives who were strangers and idolaters. He, therefore, rent his clothes, and having taken his seat in the temple, continued in great grief and silence till the evening sacrifice, when he put up prayers to God for the sins of the people. A great multitude being convened, he engaged by oath the principal of the people to renew the covenant with the Lord, and to dismiss their strange wives with their children, and directed all the people to meet at the temple within three days for the same purpose, and with the same effect. Till the arrival of Nehemiah, Ezra had the principal authority in Jerusalem. In the second year of Nehemiah's government, the people being assembled at the temple, at the feast of tabernacles, Ezra was desired to read the law. He read it from morning to noon, and was accompanied by Levites, who stood beside him, and kept silence. The next day they desired to know of Ezra how they were to celebrate the feast of tabernacles. This he explained, and continued eight days reading the law in the temple. All this was followed by a solemn renewal of the covenant with the Lord.

Josephus says, that Ezra was buried at Jerusalem; but the Jews believe that he died in Persia, in a second journey to Artaxerxes. His tomb is shown there in the city of Zamuza. He is said to have lived nearly 120 years.

Ezra was the restorer and publisher of the Holy Scriptures, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. 1. He corrected the errors which had crept into the existing copies of the sacred writings, by the negligence or mistakes of transcribers. 2. He collected all the books of which the Holy Scriptures then consisted, disposed them in their proper order, and settled the canon of Scripture for his time. 3. He added throughout the books of his edition what appeared necessary for illustrating, connecting, or completing them; and of this we have an instance in the account of the death and burial of Moses, in the last chapter of Deuteronomy. In this work he was assisted by the same Spirit, by which they were at first written. 4. He changed the ancient names of several places become obsolete, and substituted for them new names, by which they were at that time called. 5. He wrote out the whole in the Chaldee character; that language having grown into use after the Babylonish captivity. 6. Whether he added the vowel points is more difficult to determine; but it would seem that the vowel points, as well as the Massora, were much later than Christianity, and consequently, than Ezra.

The book of Ezra and that of Nehemiah were formerly reckoned by the Hebrews only as one. No doubt exists that Ezra was the author of the first of them. Some, however, ascribe the first six chapters to a more ancient author, because from chapter v. 4. it would seem that the writer of them was at Jerusalem in the time of Darius Hystaspes, and Ezra did not go thither till the reign of Artaxerxes, as appears from the beginning of the seventh chapter.

But this difficulty is thought to be removed, by supposing that the writer, when he says, (Ezra v. 4.) 'Then said we unto them in this manner,' does not speak in his own person, but in the name of the Jews. The book of Ezra begins with the repetition of the last two verses of the second book of Chronicles, and carries the Jewish history through a period of 79 years, commencing from the edict of Cyrus. The first six chapters contain an account of the return of the Jews under Zerubbabel, after the captivity of 70 years; of their establishment in Judea; and of the building and dedication of the temple at Jerusalem. The last four chapters relate Ezra's appointment to the government of Judea, by Artaxerxes Longimanus; the disobedience of the Jews, and the reform which Ezra immediately effected among them. Between the dedication of the temple and the departure of Ezra, that is, between the 6th and 7th chapters of this book, was an interval of about 58 years, during which nothing is here related concerning the Jews, except that, contrary to God's command, they intermarried with Gentiles. This book, from the 8th verse of the 4th chapter to the 27th verse of the 7th chapter, is written in Chaldee. It is probable that the sacred historian used the Chaldaic language in this part of his work, because it contains chiefly letters and decrees written in that language, the original words of which he might think it right to record. Indeed, the people who were recently returned from the Babylonian captivity, were at least as familiar with the Chaldee as with the Hebrew tongue. *Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. F.

FAI

F AITH, a dependence on the truth of another, or an assent to the veracity of the speaker. Hence Divine Faith is a firm assent of the mind to what is revealed in the Holy Scriptures on the authority of God. Faith is generally distinguished by divines into four kinds; historical, temporary, the faith of miracles, and justifying or saving faith.

1. Historical faith is a speculative knowledge of, and a bare assent to, the truths revealed in Scripture. Of this kind of faith the apostle James (ii. 17, 24.) speaks: 'Faith, if it have not works, is dead. You see how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only;' that is, not by a mere profession of faith, or a bare assent to the truth, without good works, which proceed from faith. This kind of faith the devils themselves possess (James ii. 19.): 'Thou believest that there is one God: the devils also believe and tremble.' They are fully persuaded that there is a God, and that Christ is the Son of God, and shall be their Judge. (Matt. viii. 29.)

2. Temporary faith, together with an assent to revealed truths, produces an approbation and joy in receiving these truths; but as the joy thus produced arises from some carnal consideration, this faith soon vanishes and is lost. Of this kind of faith our Saviour speaks in the parable of the sower (Matt. xii. 20.): 'He that received the seed into stony places, receives it with joy;' having heard the message of pardon, life, and glory, which the word of the Gospel brings, he immediately receives it with a transport of gladness, and feels his natural passions elevated and enlarged. 'Yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while;' he has no root of deep conviction and real love to holiness, but wants solid affections, firm and fixed resolutions, and habitual dispositions of grace.

3. The faith of miracles is a firm assent of the mind to some particular promise concerning any miraculous work, which, if performed by us, is called an active miraculous faith. (Matt. xvii. 20. 1 Cor. xiii. 2.) But if it be performed on us, it is called a passive miraculous faith: thus the lame man at Lystra had a firm persuasion that Paul and Barnabas were able to cure him. (Acts xiv. 9.) The faith of miracles obtained chiefly in the time of Christ and his apostles.

4. Justifying faith is a saving grace wrought in the soul by the Spirit of God, by which we receive Christ as our prophet, priest, and king, and rely upon Him and His righteousness alone for justification and salvation, and which begets in us a sincere obedience in our lives and conversation. The apostle to the Hebrews (xi. 1.) calls faith, 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' It assures us of the reality and value of eternal and invisible things, and produces a confident hope and satisfaction of soul that God will infallibly perform what He has promised. By the faith, which in the Gospel is said to justify and to save, we are to understand that lively faith which worketh by love, which purifieth the heart, which keepeth the commandments of God. The object of faith is the word of God in general, and especially the doctrines and promises which respect the salvation of man, through Christ. The foundation of faith is the essential Supreme perfections of God, His unerring knowledge, immutable truth, infinite goodness, and almighty power. Faith has a prevailing influence on the will, and is productive of good works. But though by these acts of obedience we demonstrate that we truly and firmly believe the Divine authority of Christ and His doctrines, yet this faith is not so meritorious in its own nature, as to entitle us to the reward of eternal life; it justifies us only by being the condition upon which it has pleased our Almighty Father to offer us salvation. We are not to attribute our justification to the inherent efficacy of faith, but to the mercy of God, and the merits of Christ, from which alone that efficacy is derived. 'By grace we are saved through faith.' This was the doctrine of the early Christians. Clement of Rome, after speaking of the Jews, says, 'And we also, being called by the same will in Christ Jesus, are not justified by ourselves, neither by our own wisdom, or knowledge, or piety, or the works which we have done in the holiness of our hearts, but by that faith by which God Almighty has justified all men from the beginning,' Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. vol. ii. p. 259. Sherlock's Discourses, Discourse xiv.

FALL OF MAN. When God placed Adam in the garden of Eden, He said to him, 'Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.' (Gen. ii. 16, 17.) These words 'Thou shalt surely die,' must mean, that from that time Adam should become subject to death, since it is certain that he did not actually die on the day on which he ate the forbidden fruit. Hence we conclude, that if Adam had not have eaten the forbidden fruit, he would not have died; and therefore Adam became subject to death in consequence of his disobedience. The Scripture farther teaches us, that the sin of Adam not only rendered him liable to death, but that it also changed the upright nature, in which he was originally formed, into one that was prone to wickedness; and that this liability to death, and propensity to sin, were entailed from him upon the whole race of mankind. 'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' (Rom. v. 12.) 'As by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one, the free-gift came upon all men to justification of life.' (Rom. v. 18.) 'In Adam all die.' (1 Cor. xv. 22.) Hence it appears that Adam, who was at first 'made upright, and in the image of God,' fell by his transgression of the command of God, from a state of innocence, purity, and happiness; became subject to death, sin, and misery; and transmitted his nature thus corrupted to all his posterity. On this universal depravity of mankind, and consequent liability to punishment, is founded the necessity of a Redeemer, whose merits and mediation might atone for those sins which are common, in a greater or less degree, to every descendant of Adam. All those expressions of the New Testament, which assert that every one, before he can be entitled to the benefits of the Gospel dispensation, must be 'born again,' must become 'a new creature,' and 'put on the new man,' imply a corruption of his present nature, and plainly prove, that a great change must have taken place since God 'created man in his own image, and saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good.'

The general corruption of human nature, in consequence of Adam's disobedience, was acknowledged by the ancient fathers of the Christian church. The doctrine of Augustine and his followers, with respect to this subject, is thus stated and supported by Bishop Burnet: 'They believe that a covenant was made with all mankind in Adam as their first parent; that he was a person constituted by God to represent them all; and that the covenant was made with him, so that if he had obeyed, all his posterity should have been happy through his obedience; but by his disobedience they were all to be esteemed to have sinned in him, his act being imputed and transferred to them all. This opinion seems to have great foundation in that large discourse of St. Paul's, where, in the fifth of the Romans, he compares the blessings we receive by the death of Christ with the guilt and misery that was brought upon us by the sin of Adam. Now it is confessed, that by Christ we have both an imputation or communication of the merits of His death, and likewise a purity and holiness of nature conveyed to us by His doctrine and Spirit. In opposition then to this, if the comparison is to be closely pursued, there must be an imputation of sin, as well as a corruption of nature, transferred to us from Adam. This is the more considerable as to the point of imputation, because the chief design of St. Paul's discourse seems to be levelled at that, since it is begun upon the head of reconciliation and atonement; upon which it follows, that 'as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and death passed upon all men, for that (or as others render it, in whom) all have sinned.' (Rom. v. 12.) Now they think it is all one to the point, whether it be rendered 'for that,' or 'in whom;' for though the latter words seem to deliver their opinion more precisely, yet it being affirmed that, according to the other rendering, all who die have sinned, and it being certain that many infants die who have never actually sinned, these must have sinned in Adam; they could sin no other way. It is afterwards said by St. Paul, that by the offence of one many were dead; that the judgment was by one to condemnation; that by one man's offence death reigned by one; that by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; and that by one man's disobedience many were made sinners. As these words are positive and of great importance in themselves, so all this is much the stronger by the opposition in which every one of them is put to the effects and benefits of Christ's death, particularly to our justification through him, in which there is an imputation of the merits and effects of His death, that are thereby transferred to us; so that the whole effect of this discourse is taken away, if the imputation of Adam's sin is denied.'

But many, who acknowledge original guilt, do not accede to this opinion of Augustine, concerning the sin derived from Adam. These men think it incompatible with the justice and goodness of God to make the whole race of men liable to punishment for the sin of Adam, in which they had no concern; and the case which appears the most repugnant to the divine attributes, is that of infants and idiots, which being incapable of sinning, ought not to be subject to punishment. They admit that a mortal and corrupt nature is derived from Adam to all his descendants; that this corruption is so strong that no man ever lived to the age of maturity without sin; and consequently that every such person is liable to divine punishment for the sins he has himself actually committed, but not for Adam's sins. They therefore think that infants and idiots die, because of Adam's sin, but that no farther punishment awaits them. They are of opinion, that our being thus adjudged to death, and to all the miseries which accompany mortality, may be well called God's wrath and damnation, as temporary punishments are frequently so denominated in Scripture.

It must be acknowledged that original guilt, considered in this point of view, is a difficult and abstruse subject. As the Scriptures do not inform us what were the full and precise effects of Adam's disobedience upon his posterity, it is perhaps scarcely to be expected that an uniformity of opinion should prevail upon that point. It may, however, be observed, that the difference between those who confine original guilt to a mere liability to death and sin, and those who extend it to a liability to punishment also, is not very material, since both of them admit that Christ died as a propitiation for all the sins of the whole world, whatever were the nature and character of those sins. In either case, the effects of Christ's obedience are commensurate with those of Adam's disobedience; and upon either principle, if we believe the Gospel, and act conformably to its precepts, all our sins, whether original in Adam, or actual in ourselves, will be forgiven, and we shall be eternally happy. They who consider the sin of Adam as imputed to all his descendants, believe that sin will be remitted for the sake, and through the mediation, of Jesus Christ. They contend that it is as consonant to perfect justice to impute the sin of Adam, as to impute the merits of Christ, to all mankind; and that the divine goodness is fully vindicated by the assurance, that God had pre-ordained the redemption of man by Jesus Christ, when he punished the disobedience of Adam upon his posterity. In Scripture occur many passages, which, from the context, appear to refer solely to the redemption of mankind from the guilt and penalty of sin, which Adam entailed upon the human race. In this sense, 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' was 'the Redeemer of the whole world;' He delivered all mankind, without any exception, from the power of sin and death, to which they are by nature subject, and rendered them capable of eternal happiness, yet at the same time at liberty, as responsible beings, to forfeit or secure that title to immortality, which He purchased by His blood. Thus the case of infants and idiots, which are incapable of actual sins of individual guilt, is clearly consistent with the justice and goodness of God, though considered as by nature liable to punishment. Thus 'the Gentiles who are without the law' of Moses, or of Christ, and cannot be saved by faith ('for how shall they believe if they have not heard?') partake of 'the salvation which is by Christ.' Thus the world collectively is 'made free from sin'—free from the punishment of original sin—' being justified freely by grace.' While individually 'all men are sinners,' remain in a corrupted state of nature, subject to diseases and death, and the miseries of this world, and liable to future condemnation; for 'there is no man living that sinneth not,' does not commit actual sins. Bishop Burnet on the Articles; *Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. FAMINE. The Scripture records several famines in Palestine, and the neighbouring countries; in the time of Abraham, (Gen. xii. 10.); and in that of Isaac, (xxvi. 1.) The most remarkable famine is that of seven years in Egypt, whilst Joseph was in that country. It was considerable for continuance, extent, and severity, particularly as Egypt is one of the countries least subject to such a calamity, by reason of its general fruitfulness. It has been observed on the famine in the time of Ahab, that by the threat there should be no dew nor rain, is not meant there should not be a single drop of rain during three years, but only that the dew and rain should not be in their usual and necessary quantities.

Famine is sometimes a natural effect, as when the Nile does not overflow in Egypt, or rains do not fall in Judea, at the customary times, spring and autumn; or when the caterpillars or locusts swarm and destroy the fruits. The prophets notice these last causes of famine; and Joel compares locusts to a numerous and terrible army ravaging the land. (Joel i. 2, 3, 4, &c.)

Famine was also an effect of God's anger. 'The Lord called for a famine, and it came upon the land for seven years.' (2 Kings viii. 1, 2.) Amos (viii. 11.) threatens another sort of famine, that of hearing the word of God. Harmer's Observations, vol. i. p. 87, edit. 1808.

FASTING. Fasting has been practised in all ages, and among all nations, in times of mourning, sorrow, and affliction. We see no example of fasting, properly so called, before Moses. Since the time of Moses, examples of fasting have been very common among the Jews. Joshua and the elders of Israel remained prostrate before the ark from morning till evening, without eating, after Israel was defeated at Ai. (Josh. vii. 6.) The eleven tribes which fought against that of Benjamin, fell down before the ark on their faces, and so continued till evening without eating. (Judg. xx. 26.) David fasted while the first child he had by Bathsheba was sick. (2 Sam. xii. 16.) The Heathens sometimes fasted: the king of Nineveh, terrified by Jonah's preaching, ordered that not only men, but also beasts, should continue without eating or drinking; should be covered with sackcloth, and each after their manner should cry to the Lord. (Jonah iii. 5, 6, 7.) The Jews, in times of public calamity, appointed extraordinary fasts, and made even the children at the breast fast. (Joel ii. 16.)

Moses fasted forty days upon Mount Horeb. (Exod. xxiv. 18.) Elijah passed as many days without eating. (1 Kings xix. 8.) Our Saviour fasted forty days and forty nights in the wilderness. (Matt. iv. 2.) These fasts were miraculous, and out of the common rules of nature.

Besides the solemn fast of expiation instituted by divine authority, the Jews appointed certain days of humiliation, called the fasts of the congregation. The calamities for which these were enjoined, were a siege, pestilence, diseases, famine, &c. They were observed on the second and fifth days of the week; they began at sunset, and continued till midnight of the following day. On these days, they wore sackcloth next the skin, and rent their clothes; they sprinkled ashes upon their heads, and neither washed their hands, nor anointed their bodies with oil. The synagogues were filled with suppliants, whose prayers were long and mournful, and their countenances dejected, with all the marks of sorrow and repentance.

As to the fasts observed by Christians, it does not appear by His own practice or by His commands to His disciples, that our Lord instituted any particular fast. But when the Pharisees reproached Him, that His disciples did not fast so often as theirs, or as John the Baptist's, He replied, 'Can ye make the children of the bride-chamber fast, while the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days.' (Luke v. 34, 35.) Fasting is also recommended by our Saviour, in His sermon on the mount, not as a stated, but an occasional duty of Christians, for the purpose of humbling their minds under the afflicting hand of God; and He requires that this duty be performed in sincerity, and not for the sake of ostentation. (Matt. vi. 16.)

FAT. God forbade the Hebrews to eat the fat of beasts: (Lev. iii. 17.) 'All the fat is the Lord's. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations, throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.' Some interpreters understand these words literally, and suppose fat as well as blood to be forbidden. Josephus says, Moses forbids only the fat of oxen, goats, sheep, and their species. This agrees with Levit. vii. 23; 'Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat.' This is observed by the modern Jews, who think that the fat of other sorts of clean creatures is allowed them, even that of beasts which have died of themselves, conformably to Levit. vii. 24: 'And the fat of the beast that dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use: but ye shall in no wise eat of it.' Others maintain, that the law which forbids the use of fat, should be restrained to fat separated from the flesh, such as that which covers the kidneys and intestines; and this only in the case of its being offered in sacrifice. This is confirmed by Levit. vii. 25: 'Whosoever eateth of the fat of the beast of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, even the soul that eateth it shall be cut off from his people.'

In the Hebrew style, fat signifies not only that of beasts, but also the richer or first part of other things. 'He should have fed them with the finest (in Heb. the fat) of the wheat.' Fat is sometimes used for the source of compassion or mercy. As the bowels are stirred at the recital of misfortune, or at the view of melancholy and afflicted objects, it has been thought that sensibility resided principally in the bowels, which are commonly fat. The Psalmist upbraids the wicked with being inclosed in their fat, having shut up their bowels against him, and feeling no compassion at the sight of his extreme grief: 'Mine enemies compass me about; they are inclosed in their own fat.' (Ps. xvii. 10.) Fat denotes abundance of good things: 'I will satiate the souls of the priests with fatness.' (Jer. xxxi. 14.) 'My soul shall be satisfied with marrow and fatness.' (Ps. lxxiii. 5.) The fat of the earth implies its fruitfulness: 'God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine.' (Gen. xxvii. 28.)

FATHER. This word, besides the common acceptation of it for immediate father, is used in Scripture for grandfather, great grandfather, or the author and first father of a family, how remote soever. Thus, the Jews in our Saviour's time, and their descendants of the present generation, call Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, their fathers. Jesus Christ is called the son of David, though David was distant from Him many generations.—By father is also understood the institutor, the original practiser, or master of a certain profession: Jabal was the father of such as dwell in tents, and such as have cattle; Tubal was the father of all such as handle the harp or organ. (Gen. iv. 20, 21, 22.) Huram is called father of the king of Tyre, (2 Chron. ii. 13.) and even of Solomon, (2 Chron. iv. 16.) because he was the principal workman, and chief director of their undertakings. The principal of the prophets were considered as fathers of the younger, who were their disciples, and who are called sons of the prophets, and styled the eldest fathers.

'My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.' (2 Kings ii. 12.)—Father is a term of respect given by inferiors to superiors, and by servants to their masters: 'My father,' said Naaman's servants to him, 'if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing.'—(2 Kings v. 13.) The king of Israel addresses the prophet Elisha in like manner: 'My father, shall I smite them?' (2 Kings vi. 21.) A man is said to be a father to the poor and orphans, when he supplies their necessities, and is affected with their miseries: 'I was a father to the poor,' says Job. (xxix. 16.) God declares Himself to be a father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widow. (Ps. lxxviii. 5.)—God is frequently called heavenly father, and simply father. He is eminently the father, creator, preserver, and protector, of all, especially of those who invoke Him, and serve Him. 'Is he not thy father that hath bought thee?' (Deut. xxxii. 6.) Through Christ, who has merited adoption and filiation for His people, every believer has a right to call God father. (Rom. viii. 15, 16.) Job entitles God 'the father of rain,' who produces it, and causes it to fall. He observes, 'I have said to corruption, thou art my father;' that is, in the condition to which I am reduced, and that to which I expect to be reduced in the grave, I consider worms and putrefaction as my near kin.—Joseph says, that God had made him a father to Pharaoh, had given him great authority in that prince's kingdom, and that Pharaoh looked upon him as his father, and had bestowed upon him the government of his house and dominions.—The devil is denoted as the father of the wicked: 'Ye are of your father the devil.' (John viii. 44.) Ye would imitate the deeds of your father, says Christ to the Jews; he was a murderer from the beginning, and ye seek my death. He is a liar, and the father of it: he deceived Eve and Adam; he introduced sin and falsehood into the world; he inspires his followers with his spirit and sentiment.—'To be gathered unto their fathers,' to 'sleep with their fathers,' are common expressions signifying death.—God is called 'the Father of spirits.' (Heb. xii. 9.) Our natural fathers are fathers of our bodies only, but God is the Father of our spirits; He not only creates them, but He justifies them also, and glorifies them. Christ (Matt. xxiii. 9.) forbids us to call any man father, because we have one in heaven. Not that we should abandon, or despise, our earthly fathers, for God requires us to honour them; but when the glory of God is at stake, or our salvation, if our fathers and our mothers are obstacles, we should say to them, 'We know you not.'

FATHERS is also a term applied to ancient authors in the Christian Church. St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, &c. are called Greek fathers; and St. Augustine, St. Ambrose, &c. Latin fathers. No author who wrote later than the twelfth century is dignified with the title of father. Learned men are not unanimous concerning the degree of esteem which is due to these ancient fathers. Some represent them as the most excellent guides in the paths of piety and morality; whilst others place them in the very lowest rank of moral writers, consider them as the very worst of all instructors, and treat their precepts and decisions as perfectly insipid, and, in many respects, pernicious. It appears, however, incontestable, that in the writings of the primitive fathers are many sublime sentiments, judicious thoughts, and several things naturally adapted to form a religious temper, and to excite pious and virtuous affections. At the same time, it must be confessed that, on the other hand, they abound still more with precepts of an excessive and unreasonable austerity, with stoical and academical dictates, with vague and indeterminate notions, and, what is still worse, with decisions absolutely false, and in evident opposition to the commands of Christ. Though the judgment of antiquity in some disputable points may certainly be useful, yet we ought never to consider the writings of the fathers as of equal authority with the Scriptures. In many cases they may be deemed competent witnesses, but we must not confide in their verdict as judges. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 155; Buck's Theol. Dict. vol. i. p. 289.

FEAR, is sometimes used for the object of fear, as 'the fear of Isaac,' that is, the God whom Isaac feared. (Gen. xxxi. 42.) God says, that He will send His fear before His people, to terrify and destroy the inhabitants of Canaan. (Job vi. 4.) speaks of the terrors of God, as set in array against him; the Psalmist (xxxviii. 15.) that he had suffered the terrors of the Lord, with a troubled mind.

FEAR OF GOD is such an awe and veneration for the Supreme Being, as renders a man religiously careful not to offend Him, but to endeavour to please Him in all his actions; to cultivate such a temper and disposition of soul as are agreeable to the divine nature. This principle excites a man to perform the duties of a dependent creature, and renders him unwearied in his endeavours to keep a conscience void of offence towards that infinite Being on whom he and all others depend. To fear God is generally the character of good men in Holy Writ, and implies every divine virtue and moral excellence of which a human being is capable in a state of weakness and imperfection. When the inspired penmen say of a man, that he has no fear of God in him, they give, in that single expression, the character of a wicked and abandoned person, of one who regards no restraints beyond temporary rewards and punishments.

The fear of God is founded in a due consideration of His attributes and moral perfections; particularly, His omnipresence, omniscience, justice, power, and eternity. When a man reflects on the idea we have of the Divine Being, it will unavoidably make a deep impression on his mind; and if he suffer this reflection to have its proper influence, he will become afraid to offend God, and desirous of recommending himself to the Divine favour by always endeavouring to improve in those graces which are ornaments to human nature, and which will dispose him for the enjoyment of spiritual and intellectual pleasures in a future and an eternal state. How solicitous will he be, how diligent and careful to avoid those passions which tarnish the native brightness of the mind, and darken the understanding with respect to spiritual things! How industrious in the search of divine wisdom! How desirous of attaining to a higher degree in the spiritual life! If we fear God, and desire to be like Him, may we not humbly hope, that the Almighty will vouchsafe to enlighten our minds, pour down a blessing on all our pious endeavours, and in due time finish the work which He has begun in us?

A profound veneration for the omnipotent and eternal God, annihilates the evils and calamities of this transitory life. Religious fear entitles a man to the care and protection of divine providence. The Governor of the universe is kind to all; but they who fear Him are the objects of His peculiar favour, and enjoy blessings in which the wicked have no share. The Psalmist frequently speaks with rapture of the care which the Almighty takes of His servants. He calls God his shield, his buckler, his fortress; and he expresses himself on this subject in such a variety of terms, as afford a striking idea of the divine protection. He says, that God plants guards of angels about those who fear Him, and secures them under the shadow of His wings; so that they need not be afraid of the 'terror by night, nor the arrow that flieth by day, the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor the destruction that wasteth at noon-day.' The fear of man is a loose principle, and will be effectual only where there is danger of discovery and punishment; but the fear of God is obligatory at all times, and causes a man to act as honestly when no one hears or sees him, as if the eyes of the whole world were fixed on him. A constant and habitual reverence for the presence of God observes no distinction of places, because God is every where present. 'O Abner,' said Joab, 'I fear my God, and I fear none but him.' Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, Essay iii. p. 33, &c. edit. 1760.

FEASTS. God appointed several festivals among the Jews for many reasons.

1. To perpetuate the memory of the great events and wonders which He had wrought in favour of this people: so, the Sabbath commemorated the creation of the world; the Passover, the departure out of Egypt; the Pentecost, the law given at Sinai, &c.
2. To keep them firm to their religion, by the view of ceremonies, and the majesty of divine service.
3. To procure them certain pleasures, and allowable times of rest; for their festivals were accompanied with rejoicings, feasts, and innocent diversions.
4. To give them instruction; for in their religious assemblies, the law of God was read and explained.
5. To renew the acquaintance, correspondence, and friendship of their tribes and families coming from the several towns in the country, and meeting three times a year in the holy city.

The first and most ancient of feasts, the Sabbath, or seventh day, commemorated the creation: 'The Lord (Gen. ii. 3.) blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it,' says Moses, 'because that in it he had rested from all his work.' Some of the ancient fathers and Rabbins were of opinion, that the Sabbath had been observed from the beginning of the world. But the general opinion is, that people did not cease from labour on that day, till after the command of God to the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, when they were encamped at Marah. See SABBATH.

The Sabbatical Year, which returned every seven years, and was set apart for rest; and the Jubilee Year, at the end of seven times seven years, or the forty-ninth year, were sorts of feasts, too, and may be considered as consequences of the Sabbath.

The Passover was instituted in memory of the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, and of the favour which God showed His people in sparing their first-born, when he killed the first-born of the Egyptians. (Exod. xii. 14. et seq.) See PASSOVER.

The feast of Pentecost was celebrated on the fiftieth day after the Passover, in memory of the law being given to Moses on Mount Sinai, fifty days after the departure out of Egypt. They reckoned seven weeks from the Passover to Pentecost, beginning at the day after the Passover. The Hebrews call it the feast of Weeks, and the Christians Pentecost, which signifies the fiftieth day.

The feast of Trumpets was celebrated on the first day of the civil year; on which the trumpets sounded, proclaiming the beginning of the year, which was in the month Tisri, answering to our September, O. S. It was a civil feast, rather than a sacred solemnity. We know no religious cause of its establishment. Moses commands it to be observed as a day of rest, and that particular sacrifices should be offered at that time.

The New Moons, or first days of every month, were in some sort a consequence of the feast of Trumpets. The law did not oblige people to rest upon this day, but ordained only some particular sacrifices. It appears that on these days also, the trumpet was sounded, and entertainments were made. (1 Sam. xx. 5, 18.)

The feast of Expiation or Atonement was celebrated on the tenth day of Tisri, which was the first month of the civil year. It was instituted for a general expiation of sins, irreverences, and pollutions of all the Israelites, from the high-priest to the lowest of the people, committed by them throughout the year. (Levit. xxiii. 27, 28. Num. xxix. 7.) See EXPIATION.

The feast of Tents, or Tabernacles, on which all Israel were obliged to attend the temple, and to dwell eight days under tents of leaves, in memory of their fathers dwelling forty years in tents, as travellers in the wilderness. It was kept on the fifteenth of the month Tisri, the first of the civil year. The first and seventh days of this feast were very solemn. But during the other days of the octave they might work. (Levit. xxiii. 34, 35. Numb. xxix. 12, 13.) At the beginning of the feast, two vessels of silver were carried in a ceremonious manner to the temple, one full of water, the other of wine, which were poured at the foot of the altar of burnt offerings, always on the seventh day of this festival.

Of the three great feasts of the year, the Passover, Pentecost, and that of Tabernacles, the octave, or seventh day after these feasts, was a day of rest as much as the festival itself; and all the males of the nation were obliged to visit the temple at these three feasts. But the law did not require them to continue there during the whole octave, except in the feast of Tabernacles, when they seem obliged to be present for the whole seven days.

Besides these feasts, we find the feast of Lots, or Purim, instituted on occasion of the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's plot, in the reign of Ahasuerus. See PURIM.

The feast of the Dedication of the Temple, or rather of the restoration of the temple, which had been profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes, (1 Macc. iv. 52, &c.) was celebrated in winter, and is supposed to be the feast of dedication mentioned in St. John's Gospel. (x. 22.) Josephus says, that it was called the feast of Lights, probably, because this happiness befel them when least expected, and they considered it as a new light risen on them.

In the Christian Church, no festival appears clearly to have been instituted by Jesus Christ, or his Apostles. Yet as we commemorate the passion of Christ as often as we celebrate his Supper, he seems by this to have instituted a perpetual feast. Christians have always celebrated the memory of his resurrection, and observe this feast on every Sunday, which was commonly called the Lord's day. (Rev. i. 10.)

The birth-day of Christ, commonly called Christmas-day, has been always observed by his disciples with gratitude and joy. His birth was the greatest blessing ever bestowed on mankind. The angels from heaven celebrated it with a joyful hymn; and every man, who has any feeling of his own lost state without a Redeemer, must rejoice and be glad in it. 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.' (Isai. ix. 6.)

The forty days of Lent are appointed as a time of repentance and recollection, in order to prepare the Christian for the proper observance of the great festival of Easter. It appears from the primitive fathers of the church, that the observance of Lent has been most ancient; and this season has been always considered as a time of self-examination and penitence. On the first day of Lent, which we call Ash Wednesday, our Church has appointed a very solemn and awful service.

At the end of the holy season of Lent is the day on which we commemorate the death of our blessed Saviour, and which is commonly called Good Friday. This day ought to be strictly observed. It is a day of the deepest humiliation and sorrow, for those sins which brought the Son of God to the cross.

On Easter Sunday, we celebrate our Saviour's victory over death and hell, when having on the cross made an atonement for the sin of the world, he rose again from the grave, brought life and immortality to light, and opened to all his faithful servants the way to heaven. On this great event rest all our hopes. 'If Christ be not risen,' says St. Paul, 'then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain,—But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept.' (1 Cor. xv. 14. 20.)

Forty days after his resurrection, our Lord ascended into heaven, in the sight of his disciples. This is celebrated by the Church on Ascension-day, or Holy Thursday. Ten days after his ascension, the Lord sent the Holy Spirit to be the Comforter and Guide of his disciples. This blessing is commemorated on Whit Sunday, which is a very great festival, and as such ought to be observed; for the assistance of the Holy Spirit can alone support us through all temptations, and guide us into all truth.

Many other days are appointed by our Church to be observed in memory of the apostles and evangelists.

The success of some in discovering the remains of certain holy men, multiplied in the fourth century of the Christian Church the festivals and commemorations of the martyrs in a most extravagant manner. The increase of the festivals would not have been offensive to the wise and good, if Christians had employed the time thus appropriated in promoting their spiritual interests, and in forming habits of piety and virtue. But these days, instead of being set apart for pious exercises, were spent in indolence, voluptuousness, and criminal pursuits, and were less consecrated to the service of God, than employed in the indulgence of sinful passions. Many of these festivals were instituted on a pagan model, and perverted to similar purposes. Mosheim, vol. i. pp. 323. 466; Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity, Sermon vii. pp. 74, &c.; Nelson's Companion for the Festivals and Fasts, p. 444, &c. edit. 1757.

FESTUS. Portius Festus succeeded Felix in the government of Judea A. D. 60. Felix, his predecessor, to oblige the Jews, when he resigned his government, left St. Paul in bonds at Cæsarea in Palestine. (Acts xxiv. 27.) Festus, at his first coming to Jerusalem, was intreated by the principal Jews to condemn Paul, or to order him up to Jerusalem, they having conspired to assassinate him in the way. Festus answered, that it was not customary with the Romans to condemn any man without hearing him; but he said, that he would hear their accusations against Paul at Cæsarea. From these accusations Paul appealed to Cæsar, and by this means secured himself from the prosecution of the Jews, and the wicked intentions of Festus, whom they had corrupted.

Festus, finding how much robbery abounded in Judea, very diligently pursued the thieves. He also suppressed a magician, who drew the people after him into the desert. He died in Judea about the beginning of A. D. 62, and was succeeded by Albinus. Josephus, Ant. Jud. lib. xx. cap. 8, seg. 9, 10; De Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 14. seg. 1.

FIG, FIG-TREE. Our first parents covered their nakedness with fig-leaves, either from common fig-trees, or from some of another kind, the leaves of which were much larger. (Gen. iii. 7.)

There are many kinds of fig-trees. 'The true sycamore fig-tree,' says M. Forskall,

'abounds the most of any in Egypt. It is planted upon the banks, and along the ways near the villages; and it branches out to such a distance, that a full-grown tree furnishes a shade for a circle of forty paces in diameter. Its leaves are widely ovated, bowed, or angulated; rather obtuse, smooth, cordated at the base. The fruit does not grow from the branches; but shoots bearing fruit, and close together, sprout from the trunk itself, or from the wood of the largest branches. The inhabitants say, that the fruit arrives at maturity several times in the year, as often as seven times. Hasselquist affirms, that that can only be in the month of June; but this is to be understood of those figs which are eatable, and have the true seeds. The sycamore figs are called by the Egyptians precocious sycamores, because the others are not ripe before the overflowing of the Nile, and these are ripe about the end of the month of April. They are mellow, turning yellow, juicy, sweet, not fecundated or pierced with worms: the buds, however, are large and fleshy. The male flowers are closed to the centre point, which has a small aperture in the middle; and round the outside of that is marked a white shining ring. This ring is not the work of the cynips (insect), but an impression of art; for when the fruit is arrived to the size of an inch diameter, the inhabitants pare off a part at the centre point, which place then turns black. They say, that without this paring it would not come to maturity. They have knives which are formed expressly for this work, and which are made round at the point, and sharp only on one side. If any figs are passed by and not cut, they become full of the cynips (insect) about the time of the overflowing of the Nile.'

This extract furnishes much information connected with Scripture: as, 1. That the mulberry-leaved fig-tree is planted along the sides of the roads. Of this we have an instance in the barren fig-tree cursed by our Lord, which stood by the road side. (Matt. xxi. 19. Mark xi. 13.) 2. That the fruit arrives at maturity several times in a year—so often as seven times. We may observe, that this can scarcely be restricted to one month is clear, because seven times is too often for that space of time; but as M. Forskall refers this to those which are eatable and have seeds, both opinions may be reconciled by saying, figs not prolific are produced in other seasons of the year. 3. That precocious, or early, figs are produced in the month of April. These, therefore, are different from those referred to the month of June only, as we have supposed; or this testimony invalidates the former. The barren fig-tree of the Evangelists having leaves, was expected to produce, at least, figs of this inferior kind. 4. This apparent contradiction in M. Forskall is exactly similar to that of Mark, who says that March or April 'was not a time for figs;' yet Jesus came seeking figs. In like manner, M. Forskall says 'figs are ripe about the end of April,' but 'they come to maturity only in the month of June.' This shows, that a contradiction so glaring is no contradiction: proper restriction regulates it to certainty. 5. The forming by art of a white shining ring on the fruit, which is done to cause it to ripen, explains the character attributed to the prophet Amos by himself, (vii. 14.) 'I was a scraper, or cutter, or parer, of sycamore fruit,' to forward its maturity. This custom is clear, and sufficiently explains the passage. 6. Those thus cut for ripening have no seeds, and may be supposed to have little hold on the parent tree. So Nahum speaks of 'fig-trees with the first ripe figs, which, if they be shaken, shall fall' easily. This disposition of the fig-tree to part with her precocious untimely figs, is noticed in Rev. vi. 13. Isaiah xxxiv. 4. Hosea ix. 10. The time of the fig-tree putting forth her figs is a sign of spring. (Cant. ii. 13.)

A great diversity of opinion has prevailed on the subject of the barren fig-tree cursed by our Lord. (Matt. xxi. 19. Mark xi. 12.) The words of the Evangelists may be thus paraphrased by a slight transposition: 'Jesus coming early in the morning from Bethany—was hungry—seeing a fig-tree from afar—at such a distance that he could only discern its spread of leaves, he went to it, if perhaps he might find some figs on it (for it was not yet the usual season for figs to be fit for gathering on fig-trees in general); but he found leaves only: and he said, none shall ever find any fruit on thee hereafter.' It is inquired, if this was not the season for figs, with what propriety did our Lord curse this barren fig-tree? Some have rendered the words, 'It was not a year for figs;' but the Greek will not admit of this translation. Some have wished to read, 'It was the season for figs;' but this is violating the text, as the time was March 31, certainly long enough before the general fig season. Dr. Doddridge, and most writers with him, think this was of the early and most delicate sort of figs, which are ripe in April, but certainly not so early as at this time. Besides, in that case, what need of the Evangelist's words 'if, perhaps,' since there could be no such uncertainty as these words imply, in the expectation of finding fruit upon it, because the fruit being barely ripe could not be supposed to have been gathered from this tree? Matthew says nothing about its not being the fig season, and also omits the words 'if, perhaps,' The sycamore fig-tree, as we have seen, is planted along the ways near the villages in Egypt, and might be also on the road-side between Bethany and Jerusalem. Norden, in his Travels in Egypt, says that this 'tree is always green,' (doubtless with leaves,) 'and bears fruit several times in the year;' so that a person viewing it at almost any time of the year, from a distance, cannot determine whether it has fruit upon it, or not. This very well accounts for the 'if, perhaps' of Mark, and for the advancing of Jesus towards it; as supposing that this kind of tree might bear fruit, though it was not now the general season for gathering figs from the kinds usually cultivated. Though we commonly say our Lord cursed the barren fig-tree, yet the expression, strictly speaking, is incorrect. Our Lord only commanded it to continue in its then present state. The shrivelling of the leaves was the only alteration which took place in the apparent state of this tree; and those leaves were wholly useless, as figs grow upon the trunk of the tree. Though the tree might be said to be cursed by reason of this privation, yet this injury or curse was only apparent, and not real. It was no diminution of any man's property. It is plainly saying in action, as well as in words, 'This tree yields no fruit; let it not therefore produce leaves to disappoint the appetite of any subsequent seeker of food from it.' The general opinion of interpreters is, that this action of our Saviour referred to the state of the Jewish nation at that time. Scripture Illustrated, Arrangement of Nat. Hist. p. 28; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. Nos. lxxvii. p. 120, cclx. p. 160.

FIND is sometimes used in Scripture for to attack, to surprise one's enemies, to discover them suddenly. It is said (Judg. i. 5.) 'They found Adonibezek in Bezek,' that is, they attacked him there. According to the Hebrew (1 Sam. xxxi. 3.) the archers of the Philistines found Saul, that is, they attacked him. In this sense some explain that passage in Genesis (xxxvi. 24.) 'This was that Anah that found the mules in the wilderness;' in the Hebrew, that found the Emim. Some, however, interpret the word translated mules by fountains of salutary streams. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 30.

FINGER. The finger of God signifies His power, His operation. Pharaoh's magicians discovered the finger of God in some of the miracles of Moses. (Exod. viii. 19.) That Legislator gave the law written with the finger of God to the Hebrews. (Exod. xxxi. 18.) Christ says, he cast out devils with the finger of God. (Luke xi. 20.) To put forth one's finger, is a bantering gesture. 'If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger,' (Isai. lviii. 9.) that is, if thou take away from the midst of thee the chain or yoke with which thou overwhelmest thy creditors, and forbear pointing at them, and using jeering and insulting gestures.

FINISH. The Evangelist John (xix. 30.) relates, that immediately before our Saviour bowed his head and gave up the ghost, he said, 'It is finished.' When Christ pronounced these words, the prophecies which referred to the Messiah were completed. Then were fulfilled the predictions which foretold his miraculous birth, his bringing salvation to mankind, the miracles which he wrought, the manner of his death, and his being made an offering and atonement for sin. At that time also the types and ceremonies, and, in particular, the sacrifices of the Jewish law, were consummated. It is natural to suppose, that the devout Jew, who had often felt himself at a loss to account for the design of these sacred and mysterious rites, would wish to obtain a more clear and perfect insight into their hidden meaning; though he was too pious to question their propriety, as he was convinced that they had been appointed and commanded by God Himself. All this darkness and uncertainty, however, were dispelled, when Christ upon the cross pronounced that all was finished. The meaning and propriety of the various sacrifices of the law, of the passover, of the paschal lamb, of the high-priest entering the holy of holies, and of all the other mystical representations and parts of the Jewish ritual, were then seen, confessed, and understood.

The sufferings of the Messiah were now finished; and envy and malice and the powers of darkness had poured forth all their resentment, and spent their fury against Him. He closed in torment and cruel anguish a life which had been spent chiefly in poverty and in labour. The Messiah finished those great works in evidence of the truth of the grand scheme in which he had been engaged, and for which he came into the world. With respect to the important services which he finished, and in which men were more immediately concerned, we may mention his opening the Gospel to all mankind. We are induced to believe, that all who, previously to the advent and sufferings of our Saviour, lived according to the dictates of their own conscience, and to the revelation of the divine will which had been afforded them, were saved through His merits and atonement, though that atonement had not yet been made. The great sacrifice of the Messiah had a retrospective as well as a future efficacy; it reached back to the first transgression of man, and forward to the end of time.

The Saviour of the world finished another important service, in giving us a complete rule of life, the means of observing that rule through the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, and in affording Himself a perfect example of piety and virtue. Indeed, we always find him as attentive to the example as to the precept. He instructed his disciples in no virtue, of which he was not a pattern for their imitation; and his precept and example united, form that rule of conduct, which is to direct and govern the Christian life. But the grand work of redemption, which Christ perfected for man, was his atoning for the sins of mankind, for which they themselves could not have atoned, and, consequently, his enabling them to triumph over death and the grave. We know not in what manner the death of Christ produces this effect, and is rendered a propitiation for the sins of mankind; and it becomes us not to inquire into this mystery of divine providence, which has been kept secret for wise purposes, and which the angels themselves are not permitted to understand. The Scriptures, however, assure us, that this wonderful instance of divine love, in what manner soever accepted by the Almighty, interposed between our guilt and the displeasure of God; and without the atonement of Christ, we had been left destitute of the hope of everlasting life. Logan's Sermons.

FIRE. God frequently appeared in fire, or surrounded with fire; as in the burning bush upon Mount Sinai. Fire is a symbol of the Deity: 'The Lord thy God is a consuming fire.' (Deut. iv. 24.) He appeared to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and St. John, in the midst of fire. The Psalmist describes the chariot of God as all in a flame. (Ps. xviii. 9, 10.) It is said, that God will appear in the midst of fire at His second coming. Daniel (vii. 10.) says, that a fiery stream issued from before Him. The wrath of God is compared to fire; and also the effects of his wrath, war, famine, and other scourges. Fire is often used for thunder, lightning, the fire of heaven. (2 Kings i. 10.)

Angels, as ministers of God, are compared to fire. (Ps. civ. 4.) Fire from heaven fell on the victims sacrificed to the Lord, as a mark of approbation. It is thought that God in this manner accepted the sacrifice of Abel. When Abraham made a covenant with the Lord, a fire passed between the divided parts of the sacrifices. Might this be the Shechinah? Fire fell on the sacrifice which Moses offered at the dedication of the tabernacle, (Levit. ix. 24.); on those of Manoah, (Judg. xiii. 19, 20.); on Solomon's at the dedication of the temple, (2 Chron. vii.); on Elijah's at Mount Carmel. (1 Kings xviii. 38.) These are instances of the direction of lightning to a favourable or beneficent effect. It is probable the same meteor was directed to a contrary effect, in the deaths of Nadab and Abihu, (Lev. x. 1.); in the destruction of the companies of fifty men, (2 Kings i. 10, 12.) in the loss of Job's property, (Job i. 16.) and in the destruction of Egypt. (Exod. ix. 23.) May we reckon among the beneficent effects of lightning, under the description of 'fire from heaven,' the instant translation of Elijah? Or was this fire of the nature of the chariots of fire, and horses of fire, mentioned a little after that history. (2 Kings vi. 17.) If the chariots of fire, and horses of fire, of Elijah, were of the same nature as the chariots of fire, and horses of fire, which surrounded Elisha, then lightning was not the meteor employed to translate Elijah, but one of a much milder nature, probably approaching towards that which was manifested in the Shechinah.

We read (Numbers xi. 1, 2, 3.) of 'a fire of the Lord, which consumed in the extremity of the camp.' The question on this passage is, whether this fire was lightning, or the samiel, a fiery wind? The expression, 'it consumed in the extremity of the camp,' is capable of two senses; it consumed the whole of one extreme of the camp; or, it consumed in different places, all of which were at the extremity of the camp. If one part of the camp was the scene of this fire, it was without doubt a burning wind, which passed over that edge of the camp, but did not enter wholly into, or cross over, the centre of it, or where the people were thickest. Otherwise, it might be lightning. Scheuzer prefers the former sense, and observes, that Thevenot mentions the death of 20,000 men, who perished in one night by one of these burning winds. It ought to be observed, that miraculous appearances derive much of their miraculous character from time, place, and circumstances. An earthquake, or lightning, is not miraculous in itself; but if it appear to be in answer to the entreaties of feeble man, it demonstrates that those entreaties receive attention from a power superior to the ordinary course of nature.

A perpetual fire was kept up in the temple, upon the altar of burnt sacrifices, and maintained by burning wood upon it continually. Besides this fire, were several kitchens in the temple, where the provisions of the priests, and the peace-offerings, were dressed.

The apostle says concerning Abel, (Heb. xi. 4.) 'the Lord testified on his gifts.' This, as we have already observed, is understood to mean, that fire from heaven consumed the offerings he had brought. It seems probable, that man, by this means, originally received the use of fire directly from heaven. Indeed, from what other quarter could he receive it? Sanchoniatho says, that the first fires were those kindled by lightning, and these discovered the first melted minerals. Nor let it be forgot, that lightning was considered by the heathens as a token from Heaven. Hence, with the greatest propriety, Elijah offered this as the test of divinity, 'the God who answereth by fire, let him be God;' since this was a principle admitted and received by his opponents equally with himself, and since it was capable of the utmost publicity, decision, and testimony.

The Chaldeans, Persians, and some other people in the east, adored fire. Several have been of opinion, that Abraham was thrown into a fire, because he refused to worship this element.

The torments of hell are described by fire in both the Old and New Testament. Moses says to Israel, 'A fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell.' Isaiah (xxxiii. 14.) is express: 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?' Again (lxvi. 24.) 'Their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched.' Our Saviour uses the same similitude. (Matt. xxv. 41.) He speaks of eternal fire prepared for the devil, his angels, and reprobates. Several maintain, that by 'worm' is to be understood a common living, not an allegorical and figurative, worm; and by fire, an elementary and material fire. Among the abettors of this opinion are Austin, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Jerom, &c. Dr. Whitby observes, that though it is not to be doubted that 'the worm not dying,' is to be understood figuratively for the worm of conscience, yet shall the bodies of the wicked suffer in fire properly so called; this being agreeable not only to the tradition of the Jewish and Christian church, but to the constant phraseology of Scripture. Whitby's Annot. vol. i. p. 284; Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 67, 119.

FIRMAMENT. The Scripture says, God made a firmament in the midst of the waters, to separate the inferior from the superior waters. The word rakiah, translated firmament, signifies an expanse, and expresses two ideas: 1. that of an expanded atmosphere surrounding the globe, which we might call, for the sake of distinction, the blue firmament; 2. that of a remote expanse in which the stars are placed. We frequently speak of the stars in the firmament, and of a firmament of stars, but it ought to be remembered, that by these expressions we speak of what is apparent as if real, for the stars are not locally situated in our firmament, that is, the blue firmament. They only seem to be situated in this firmament, because they appear there; they are separated by an interval of distance—an immeasurable interval of distance!

God spread out this firmament by gradually clarifying the atmosphere; and into this region arose the lighter vapours, which floated among their strata elevated above the surface of the earth, in proportion to their natural buoyancy, while the grosser mixtures, and the heavier fluids, sunk by a kind of precipitation, to their correspondent strata on the earth below. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 5.

FIRST-BORN, is not always to be understood literally; it is sometimes taken for the prime, most excellent, most distinguished of any thing. Thus, Jesus Christ is 'the first-born of every creature,' 'the first-begotten of the dead;' begotten of the Father before any creature was produced, the first who rose from the dead by his own power. 'The first-born of the poor,' (Isaiah xiv. 30.) signifies the most miserable of the poor; and 'the first-born of death,' (Job xviii. 13.) the most terrible of deaths. If in Exod. xi. 5. we take the first-born to import the chief, the most illustrious, the prime of each family, we shall avoid an ambiguity in reference to those families which had no first-born child. This is also coincident with a sense of which the words are capable, (Exod. xii. 12.) 'Upon all the dignitaries of Egypt I will execute judgment,' not 'against the gods,' as our translators read. The chiefs of Egypt certainly felt the judgments of God, when the land was despoiled of its principals. This also appears to be the sense of the passage (Numb. xxxiii. 4.) 'And the Egyptians buried (implying attention, if not pomp) those whom Jehovah had smitten among them; even those dignitaries upon whom Jehovah had executed judgments.' By 'the first-born of cattle' (Exod. xii. 29.) may likewise be understood the prime, the most valuable of cattle.

God ordained that all the Jewish first-born, both of men and beasts, for service, should be consecrated to him. The male children only were subject to this law. If a woman's first child were a girl, the father was not obliged to offer any thing for her, or for the children after her, though they were males. If a man had many wives, he was obliged to offer the first-born of each of them to the Lord. The first-born were offered in the temple, and were redeemed for the sum of five shekels.

The firstling of a clean beast was offered at the temple, not to be redeemed, but to be killed. An unclean beast, a horse, an ass, or a camel, was either redeemed, or exchanged. An ass was redeemed by a lamb, or five shekels; if not redeemed, it was killed. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 40.

FIRST-FRUITS, among the Hebrews, were presents made to God of part of the fruits of the harvest, to express the submission, dependence, and thankfulness of the offerers. They were offered at the temple, before the crop was touched; and when the harvest was over, before any private persons used their corn. The first of these first-fruits, offered in the name of the nation, was a sheaf of barley, gathered on the 15th of Nisan in the evening, and threshed in a court of the temple. After it was well cleaned, about three pints of it were roasted, and pounded in a mortar. Over this was thrown a log of oil, and a handful of incense. Then the priest took this offering, waved it before the Lord towards the four parts of the world, threw a handful of it into the fire upon the altar, and kept the rest. After this, every one was at liberty to get in his harvest.

Besides these first-fruits, every private person was obliged to bring his first-fruits to the temple. The Scripture prescribes neither the time nor the quantity. The Rabbins say, that they were obliged to bring at least the sixtieth part of their fruits and harvest. These first-fruits consisted of wheat, barley, grapes, figs, apricots, olives, and dates. They met in companies of four-and-twenty persons to carry their first-fruits in a ceremonious manner. The company was preceded by an ox appointed for the sacrifice, with a crown of olives on his head, and his horns gilded.

There was also another sort of first-fruits paid to God. (Numb. xv. 19, 20.) When the bread in every family was kneaded, a portion of it was set apart, and given to the priest or Levite of the place. If there was no priest or Levite, it was cast into the oven, and consumed by the fire. This is one of the three precepts peculiar to the women; because they generally made the bread.

The first-fruits and tithes were the most substantial revenue of the priests and Levites.

St. Paul says, Christians have the first-fruits of the Spirit, (Rom. viii. 23.) that is, a greater abundance of God's Spirit, more perfect and more excellent gifts, than the Jews. Christ is called the first-fruits of them that slept; for as the first-fruits were earnest to the Jews of the succeeding harvest, so Christ is the first-fruits of the resurrection, or the earnest of a resurrection.

FISH. We have few Hebrew names, if any, for particular fish. Moses says in general (Levit. xi. 9, 10, 11, 12.) that all sorts of river, lake, and sea-fish, might be eaten, if they had scales and fins; others are unclean. Fins are analogous to the feet of land animals. As, therefore, the sacred legislator had given directions for separating land animals according to the hoofs and claws, so he directs that fishes, which had no clear and distinct members adapted to locomotion, should be unclean; but those which had fins should be clean, provided they had also scales. As two requisites, a cloven hoof and a power of rumination, were necessary to render a quadruped lawful, so two characters were necessary to answer the same purpose in fishes. It is thought that this distinction was made because fishes with scales are more nourishing, those without scales being, in general, very difficult of digestion.

Interpreters in general believe, that the fish which swallowed up Jonah was a whale. The word cetus signifies only a great fish, as does the Hebrew dag of Jonah. There is, says Mr. Parkhurst, the highest probability, that this fish was not of the whale, but of the shark kind; for though whales are sometimes found in the Mediterranean, where Jonah was cast away, yet the whale, notwithstanding his monstrous size, is naturally incapable of swallowing a man. And though it may be alleged, that the same God who preserved the prophet in the fish's belly, and caused him to be vomited up again alive, could have enlarged the swallow of the whale so as to absorb him, yet we ought not, without good reason, and plain authority of Scripture, to appeal to God's miraculous interposition. In the present case we have neither of these warrants. Moreover, it is notorious that sharks are a species of fish common in the Mediterranean; and we are assured, not only that some of this kind are of such a size and form as to be capable, without any miracle, of swallowing a man, but that whole men have been actually found in their bellies. Mr. Parkhurst, therefore, agrees with the learned Bochart in opinion, that the fish which swallowed the prophet Jonah, was of that species of shark, which naturalists, from its rough and sharp teeth, have denominated carcharias, and lamia from its monstrous swallow. Some have thought, that if the word dag signify a float, it may refer to a vessel.

The opinion of Bochart, that the fish which swallowed Jonah was the squalus carcharias, is now generally received; but Bishop Jebb has urged several considerations, showing that it probably was a whale, into the cavity of whose mouth Jonah was taken. The observations adduced by him from the natural history of the whale, are confirmed by the enterprising and experienced whale-fisher, Captain Scoresby, who states that when the mouth of the Balæna mysticetus, or Great Common Whale, is open, it presents a cavity as large as a room, and capable of containing a merchant-ship's jolly-boat full of men, being six or eight feet wide, ten or twelve feet high (in front,) and fifteen or sixteen feet long. The only objection that can be offered to Dr. Jebb's opinion, is, that there is no authentic instance on record of whales being found in the Mediterranean Sea. It is, however, stated by the author of Scripture Illustrated, that whales 60 feet long have been found in the Mediterranean Sea.

The Abbé Pluche shows from Leuwenhoek, that a single cod-fish, though not of the largest size, contained nine millions three hundred and forty-four thousand eggs; and he observes, that though a common carp is far from having such a number of eggs, yet the quantity of them is so amazing, even at the first glance, that it contributes very much to justify the preceding calculation. Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 129; Greek and English Lexicon, p. 361. edit. 1812; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dict. No. cxlv. p. 103; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Levit. xi. 9.; *Scripture Illustrated, Expos. FLAGELLANTS, or WHIPPERS, have been designated by ecclesiastical historians under the name of a sect; but as they differed in no article of faith or ecclesiastical government from the established church, they appear to possess no claim to that denomination.

It has been a prevailing tenet in every false religion, that the misery of his creatures was grateful and acceptable to the Deity; and that the sufferings of another life can be averted only by the voluntary devotion of ourselves to wretchedness in this. Christianity itself has occasionally been contaminated with similar errors, and the duty of repentance has been considered as including not only mental contrition, but bodily suffering. The primitive church imposed ecclesiastical censures and penances, as temporal punishments on offenders; and in times of ignorance, this penance was considered in a more extensive view, and as relating rather to our future than our earthly state. In the year 1260, at Penesini, in Italy, a kind of penitential procession was celebrated, in which the self-convicted criminals marched solemnly through the city, flagellating themselves with the utmost severity, and imploring with the most distressful clamour, the mercy of God. The procession, which was preceded by priests, who carried a crucifix, consisted of men every rank and order; the females inflicted a similar discipline on themselves at home. However, the enthusiasm was soon not confined to one class of devotees: men, women, and children, of every rank, adopted the practice; all business, public and private, was suspended; the public amusements were deserted; and in the most inclement weather, and in the darkest nights, the streets were crowded with wretches, torturing themselves, and imploring the divine forgiveness. In a short time, the contagion was no longer confined to a single place, but spread from city to city, and even extended over all Italy, and a considerable part of Germany. As the passion increased, they formed a regular society, and instituted rules for the admission of associates. The sect continued till the succeeding century, when, among other absurdities, one of the flagellants pretended that he had been presented, by an angel, with a whip, and a letter from heaven, which assured to those who would endure this discipline for thirty-four days successively a complete pardon for all their sins. The extravagances and excesses of the fraternity accelerated its suppression. Several of the princes and prelates of the empire exerted themselves to reduce the populace to reason; and, at length, Clement VI. formally condemned the fanaticism of the flagellants, as an impious and pernicious heresy. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 184.

FLESH, is taken literally for the flesh which composes bodies, whether of men or animals. 'The end of all flesh is come before me,' (Gen. vi. 13.) of every thing that hath life. 'They went in two and two of all flesh,' animals of all species. 'All flesh hath corrupted his way.'

Flesh is understood of a principle opposite to the spirit. 'The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh, and these are contrary the one to the other.' 'Walk in the spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh.' To crucify the flesh with its lusts; not to fulfil the desires of the flesh, the wisdom of the flesh, &c. require no explanation.

'Oh that we had of his flesh!' said Job's enemies, or even his domestics, in his affliction. They would have eaten him up alive; and thus they repaid with ingratitude his services to them. The Psalmist also observes, 'The wicked, even mine enemies, came upon me to eat up my flesh.' (Psal. xxvii. 2.) The author of the book of Wisdom (xii. 5.) reproaches the Canaanites with devouring man's flesh. We have examples of this in sacred history, and in Josephus. Jeremiah threatens the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that they should be constrained to eat the flesh of their friends and children. (Lament. ii. 20.; iv. 10.) We see the same in Ezekiel. (v. 10.)

'We are thy flesh and thy bone.' (Gen. xxix. 14.; xxxvii. 27.) are familiar expressions to denote the relations and ties of flesh and blood.

The flesh of the lascivious is compared to that of horses and asses. (Ezek. xvi. 26.) The wise man says, that the flesh of the intemperate is consumed by infamous diseases. (Prov. v. 11.) The author of Ecclesiasticus, (xxv. 26.) requires a prudent man to separate his flesh from a prostitute. These expressions covertly denote what modesty refrains from naming in man.

FLIES, insects well known, and in the law of Moses declared to be unclean. (Levit. xi. 20.) The Philistines adored the god of flies under the name of Beelzebub. The Lord promised Israel that he would send an army of flies and wasps against the Canaanites, to drive them out of the country, (Exod. xxiii. 28. Deut. vii. 20.) and we know, that many of the Canaanites really abandoned their country, to secure themselves from these troublesome insects. (Josh. xxiv. 12.)

The Hebrew language has at least two words for flies. The first is oreb, (Exod. viii. 21. Psal. lxxviii. 45.; cv. 31.) which those interpreters who, by residing on the spot, have had the best opportunity of identifying the subject, have rendered the dog-fly. In Ethiopia, it is denominated zimb, and though very little larger than a bee, is said to be so terrible an insect, that even the camel is not capable of sustaining the violent punctures which it makes with its pointed proboscis; and when attacked by this fly, the body, head, and legs, of the animal break out into large bosses, which swell and putrefy to the certain destruction of the creature. Mr. Bruce observes, that 'as soon as this plague appears, and their buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about the plain, till they die worn out with fatigue, fright, and hunger. No remedy remains but to leave the black earth, and hasten down to the sands of Atbara; and there they remain, while the rains last, this cruel enemy never daring to pursue them farther.' The inhabitants of all the countries, from the mountains of Abyssinia northward, to the confluence of the Nile and Astaboras, are obliged in the rainy season to change their abode, and seek protection for their cattle on the sands of Beja.—Another Hebrew word for a fly is zebub, (Eccl. x. 1.) which some conjecture to be the 'great blue-bottle fly,' or flesh fly; for this being large, may well be supposed, when dead, to cause the perfumed unguent of the dealer to stink.—The word shemamah, (Malachi i. 3.) is thought by some to signify the common house fly. It is observable, that the word rendered flies in Exod. viii. 21. 31.; Psal. lxxviii. 45.; cv. 31, is not zebub, but oreb, which is certainly the dog-fly, or zimb, literally perhaps the desert-fly. FLOOR FOR THRESHING CORN, OF THRESHING-FLOOR, is frequently mentioned in Scripture. This was a place in the open air, in which corn was threshed, by means of a cart or sledge, or some other instrument, drawn by oxen. The threshing-floors among the Jews were only, as they are to this day in the East, round level plots of ground in the open air, where the corn was trodden out by oxen. Thus Gideon's floor (Judg. vi. 37.) appears to have been in the open air; and also that of Araunah the Jebusite; (2 Sam. xxiv.) otherwise it would not have been a proper place for erecting an altar, and offering sacrifices. In Hosea, (xiii. 3.) we read of the chaff which is driven by the whirlwind from the floor. This circumstance of the threshing-floor being exposed to the agitation of the wind seems to be the principal reason of its Hebrew name. It appears, therefore, that a threshing-floor, which is rendered in our textual translation 'a void place,' might well be near the entrance of the gate of Samaria, and a proper situation in which the kings of Israel and Judah might hear the prophets. (1 Kings xxii. 10. 2 Chron. xviii. 9.)

An instrument sometimes used in Palestine and the East, to force the corn out of the ear, and bruise the straw, was a heavy kind of sledge, made of thick boards, and furnished beneath with teeth of stone or iron. (Isa. xli. 15.) The sheaves being laid in order, the sledge was drawn over the straw by oxen, and at the same time threshed out the corn, and cut or broke the straw into a kind of chaff. An instrument in the East is still used for the same purpose. This sledge is alluded to in 2 Sam. xii. 31.; Isa. xxviii. 27.; xli. 15.; Amos i. 3. Dr. Lowth, in his notes on Isaiah (xxviii. 27, 28.) observes, that four methods of threshing are mentioned in this passage, by different instruments; the flail, the drag, the wain, and the treading of the cattle. The staff, or flail, was used for the inferiora semina, the grain that was too tender to be treated in the other methods. The drag consisted of a sort of frame of strong planks, made rough at the bottom with hard stones or iron: it was drawn by horses or oxen over the corn sheaves on the floor, the driver sitting upon it. The wain was nearly similar to this instrument, but had wheels with iron teeth, or edges like a saw. The last method is well known from the law of Moses, which 'forbids the ox to be muzzled, when he treadeth out the corn.' Niebuhr, in his Travels, gives the following description of a machine which the people of Egypt use at this day for threshing out their corn. 'This machine,' says he, 'is called nauridsj. It has three rollers, which turn on their axles; and each of them is furnished with some irons, round and flat. At the beginning of June, M. Forskall and I several times saw, in the environs of Dsjise, how corn was threshed in Egypt. Every peasant chose for himself in the open field a smooth plat of ground from 80 to 100 paces in circumference. Hither was brought on camels or asses the corn in sheaves, of which was formed a ring of six or eight feet wide, and two high. Two oxen were made to draw over it again and again the sledge (traineau) above mentioned; and this was done with the greatest convenience to the driver; for he was seated in a chair fixed on the sledge.—Two such parcels or layers of corn are threshed out in a day, and they move each of them as many as eight times, with a wooden fork of five prongs, which they call meddre. Afterwards they throw the straw into the middle of the ring, where it forms a heap, which grows bigger and bigger. When the first layer is threshed they replace the straw in the ring, and thresh it as before. Thus the straw becomes every time smaller, till at last it resembles chopped straw. After this, with the fork just described, they cast the whole some yards from thence, and against the wind; which driving back the straw, the corn, and the ears not threshed out, fall apart from it, and make another heap. A man collects the clods of dirt, and other impurities, to which any corn adheres, and throws them into a sieve. They afterwards place in a ring the heaps in which a good many entire ears are still found, and drive over them, for four or five hours together, twelve couple of oxen (une douzaine de couples de boeufs) joined two and two, till by absolute trampling they have separated the grains, which they throw into the air with a shovel (luhh) to cleanse them.' Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, pp. 120. 242. 412; Louth on Isaiah, p. 151.

FOOL, FOLLY, signifies in Scripture not only, according to the literal meaning, an idiot, or one who has lost his senses; the discourses and notions of fools and madmen; but also sin, particularly sins of impurity. 'My wounds stink, and are corrupt through my foolishness,' (Ps. xxxviii. 5.) my sin. 'He that is soon angry dealeth foolishly,' (Prov. xiv. 17.) and 'the thought of foolishness is sin.' (Prov. xxiv. 9.) David says, 'Lord, I have sinned greatly, do away the iniquity of thy servant, for I have done very foolishly.' (1 Chron. xxi. 8.) Tamar said to her violent brother Amnon, 'Do not this folly; thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel.' (2 Sam. xiii. 13.) The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. St. Paul says, (1 Cor. i. 20, 21.) 'Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?' &c. Again, (1 Cor. iii. 18, 19.) 'If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise.' The same apostle advises Timothy and Titus to avoid foolish questions, which only create disputes and wrangling.

The character of fool, and the attribute of folly, seem to be used in the Proverbs in more than one sense; sometimes they appear to mean lack of understanding, and sometimes perverseness of will. In the Gentoo laws is described a species of folly, which may perhaps illustrate some of the applications of this term in Scripture. Among the qualities required for the proper execution of public business, it is mentioned, 'that a man must be able to keep in subjection his lust, his avarice, his folly, and his pride.' This folly is not to be understood in the usual sense of the word in the European idiom, as a negative quality, or the mere want of sense, but as a kind of obstinately stupid lethargy or perverse absence of mind, in which the will is not altogether passive. It seems to be a weakness peculiar to Asia, and operates in some measure like the violent impulse of fear, under which men will utter falsehoods totally incompatible with each other, and utterly contrary to their own opinion, knowledge, conviction, and even inclination and intention. Another conjecture is, that this folly may mean the deception which a man allows to be imposed on his judgment by his passions: as acts of rapacity and avarice are often committed by men who ascribe them to prudence, and a just assertion of their own right; malice and rancour pass for justice, and brutality passes for spirit. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

FOOT. Anciently it was customary to wash the feet of strangers coming off a journey, because generally they travelled barefoot, or wore sandals only, which did not secure them from dust or dirt. Jesus Christ washed the feet of his apostles, and thereby taught them to perform the humblest services for one another.

Feet, in the sacred writers, often mean inclinations, affections, propensities, actions, motions. Guide my feet in thy paths; keep thy feet at a distance from evil; the feet of the debauched woman go down to death; let not the foot of pride come against me.

To be at any one's feet, signifies obeying him, being in his service, following him. Moses says (Deut. xxxiii. 3.) that the 'Lord loved his people, and those that sat down at his feet;' who heard him, belonged to him, were instructed in his doctrine. St. Paul says, that he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. 'Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, and heard his word.' (Luke x. 39.) These expressions have a reference to the attitude observed in the East.

By the word foot, the Hebrews modestly express those parts which decency forbids to name: as 'the water of the feet,' signifies urine; 'to cover one's feet,' dismissing the refuse of nature; 'withhold thy foot from being unshod, and thy throat from thirst,' that is, do not prostitute yourselves, as you have done, to strange people. 'Thou hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by.' (Ezek. xvi. 25.)

It is said (Deut. xi. 10.) that the land of Canaan is not like Egypt, where thou sowest thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot. Palestine is a country which has rains, plentiful dews, springs, rivulets, brooks, &c. that supply the earth with the moisture necessary to its fruitfulness. On the contrary, Egypt has no river except the Nile; there it seldom rains, and the lands which are not within reach of the inundation, continue parched and barren. To supply this want, ditches are dug and water is distributed throughout the several villages and cantons; there are great struggles who shall first obtain it, and in this dispute they frequently come to blows. Notwithstanding these precautions, many places have no water; and in the course of the year, those places which are nearest the Nile, require to be watered again by means of art and labour. This was formerly done by the help of machines, one of which is thus described by Philo: it is a wheel which a man turns by the motion of his feet, by ascending successively the several steps that are within it. But, as while he is thus continually turning, he cannot keep himself up, he holds a stay in his hands which is not moveable, and which supports him; so that in this work the hands perform the office of the feet, and the feet that of the hands; since the hands, which should act, are at rest, and the feet, which should rest, are in action, and give motion to the wheel. This is what Moses means in this place by saying, that in Egypt they water the earth with their feet. In Sir George Staunton's Account of Lord Macartney's Embassy to China, is a figure which closely resembles the description of Philo; and this is the more observable, as we know the similarity which long subsisted between the Egyptians and the Chinese. The description of Philo may serve to illustrate the boast of Sennacherib, (2 Kings xix. 24.) 'I have digged and drunk strange waters; and with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of besieged places,' or of Egypt, as others understand it. The word rendered 'sole'—sole of my feet, signifies any hollow thing, any curve, or bending; as a spoon, caves, caverns, the hollow leather of a sling, &c. The words of Sennacherib may therefore, perhaps, be freely rendered as follows: 'I came from a distant country into these parts: these lands and their manners are foreign from me. Yet, I have sunk deep wells in them, and have drunk their foreign waters: and moreover, I have exhausted by the labour of my people, in working machines by their feet,

I say, I have dried up by foot machines, foot hollows, all the water which had been stored in reservoirs against the time of siege:—consequently the cities were forced to surrender, or their inhabitants to perish by thirst; therefore let not Hezekiah think he can so closely conceal his waters that I cannot discover them; or so deeply sink his reservoirs, that I, by my mechanical powers, and the immense strength of my army, which will enable me to work the machines night and day, cannot exhaust them.'

To 'be under any one's feet,' to be a footstool to him, signifies the subjection of a subject to his sovereign, of a slave to his master.

To 'lick the dust of one's feet,' (Isa. xlix. 23.) signifies to adore the place where the feet of any one rest.

Nakedness of feet was a sign of mourning. God says to Ezekiel, 'Make no mourning for the dead, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet,' &c. It was also a mark of respect; 'Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground.' (Exod. iii. 5.) The Rabbins say, that the Jews and priests were bare-foot in the temple. (Josh. v. 15.)

'A wicked man speaketh with his feet,' says Solomon. (Prov. vi. 13.) He uses much gesture with his hands and feet, which the ancient sages blamed in those who spake. Ezekiel (xxv. 6.) reproaches the Ammonites with clapping their hands and stamping with their feet in token of joy, on seeing the desolation of Jerusalem. He also (vi. 11.) describes the same motions as signs of grief, because of the ruin of his people.

'If thou turn away thy foot from my sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day,' says Isaiah, (lviii. 13.) If thou forbear walking and travelling on the sabbath day, and do not then thine own will. We know that journeys were forbidden on the sabbath-day. (Matt. xxiv. 20. Acts i. 12.)

Job (xxix. 15.) says, that 'he was feet to the lame, and eyes to the blind,' he led one, and supported the other. In another place he observes, that God 'had put his feet in the stocks, and looked narrowly to all his paths;' like a bird or some other animal led along, with the foot fastened to a cord, and unable to proceed, except as he who guides it pleases.

Anciently in those countries the men were generally barefoot in the house; the poor almost always, even on journeys; but others, when they went into the country, commonly wore shoes. Harmer's Observations, vol. iii. p. 410; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccxxvi. p. 115.

FORESKIN, or PREPUCE, the skin which covers the glans, and is cut off in circumcision. See CIRCUMCISION. Children are sometimes born without a foreskin; and this is regarded by the Hebrews as a particular favour of Providence. The Rabbins maintain, that Moses was born in this manner. Such a child is not circumcised; the skin is only cut so as to draw some drops of blood. Several Romish churches pretend that they possess our Saviour's foreskin, which was cut off at His circumcision.

FORGIVENESS, the pardon of any offence committed against us. We are not apt to entertain any permanent or incurable ill-will against the author of injuries to others, and why should we be irreconcilable when injuries have been done to ourselves? To love our enemies, or rather not to hate our enemies, is a duty which no guilt can annul, no injury efface. We are not required to love our enemies as our friends; but, when any injury has been done us, we are to endeavour to regard it with so much resentment as any just and impartial person would feel on hearing it related, and no more. To revenge injuries, is to retaliate evil for the sake of retaliation. It is to diminish the happiness of the sentient world, without any virtuous motive, or adequate compensation. In proportion as we add to or diminish the happiness of individuals, we add to or diminish the happiness of sentient nature. This is a most important consideration, if we regard ourselves as parts of a system, and interested in the aggregate bliss of the whole as well as in the more insulated enjoyment of any particular individuals. This consideration may serve greatly to improve and to refine our feelings of humanity.

Several considerations may serve to abate our feeling of resentment. The injury which has been done us, may not be so great as we imagine. The offence may be more ideal than real; there may be some misunderstanding in the case. What we consider as an intentional injury, may have originated in accident or mistake. This quite annuls the supposition of malice in the injury. No pain or suffering, though it may at the time excite the feeling of aversion, can properly be an object of resentment, which was not premeditated or designed. We can harbour no malice against stocks or stones, which may accidentally be the occasion of pain to us, but which can never intend the harm that they occasion. Harm unintentionally done by any intelligent being, is certainly no more an object of resentment than harm occasioned by any lifeless and insensate thing. As we know that, independent of all acquired or associated 'dislike, there is naturally no such thing as ill-will in one man towards another, we have good reason to believe, that those injuries, which excite our honest indignation, are never so deliberately willed, or so maliciously contrived, as we imagine. This consideration may well serve to mitigate our resentment and moderate our rage.

We are all weak, frail, and sinful creatures. None of us passes through one day, without feeling that he requires forgiveness from his God, and too often also from his fellow-creatures. Mercy is all our hope; forgiveness, our constant prayer. In such a state, should we not pity and assist each other? Does not mutual weakness call for mutual forbearance? Weak, frail, and sinful as we are, we all hope, through the merits of Christ, to attain the happiness of heaven. And can creatures, who, after a few short years, expect to be for ever united in the presence of God, to be liberated from all unruly passions, and to live together for ever in heaven, in peace, and joy, and everlasting love; can such creatures hate each other on earth? Can they add to the sorrows of this state of trial, and spread more thorns in the path of life, by acts of malice and revenge? Can they risk their own eternal happiness, by denying to each other that forgiveness, without which they must not dare to hope that they shall be themselves forgiven? We know from the express declaration of our Saviour, that if we forgive not men their trespasses, neither will our heavenly Father forgive us. Christ estimated virtues by their solid utility, and not by their fashion or popularity; and hence he prefers the duty of forgiveness to every other. He enjoins it more frequently, with more earnestness, and under a greater variety of forms; and he adds this weighty and peculiar circumstance, that the forgiveness of others is the sole condition on which we are to expect, or even ask, from God, forgiveness for ourselves. This preference is justified by the superior importance of the virtue itself. The feuds and animosities which exist in families and among neighbours, which disturb the intercourse of human life, and collectively compose half its misery, have their foundation in the want of a forgiving temper, and can never cease except by the exercise of this virtue.

Let us endeavour to forgive, that we may not be afraid to ask forgiveness. Let us take care so to pray for forgiveness, that our prayers may not justify and increase our condemnation. Let us remember the amazing condescension of the Son of God, in 'taking upon him the form of a servant,' and thence learn humility. Let us represent to our minds the terms of our salvation, in order to excite us to repentance. Let us adore the infinite love of our Redeemer, 'who laid down his life for his enemies;' and let this be the pattern of our charity. By this means, we shall be fit to bear a part in that seraphic hymn, with which the Prince of Peace was at first ushered into the world; 'Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men.' Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 210—213; Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity, p. 176; Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, vol. i. p. 269; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii. p. 356.

FORNICATION, whoredom, or the act of incontinency. It is, however, used in Scripture, not only for the sin of impurity, but for idolatry, and for all kinds of infidelity towards God. Adultery and fornication are frequently confounded. Both the Old and New Testament condemn all impurity and fornication, corporal or spiritual, idolatry, apostacy, heresy, infidelity, &c.

The first and great mischief, and consequently the guilt of promiscuous concubinage, consists in its tendency to diminish marriages, and by that means to defeat their several beneficial purposes. Promiscuous concubinage discourages marriage, by destroying the chief incitement to a married state. Men will not undertake the incumbrance, expense, and restraint of married life, if they can gratify their passions at an easier rate. The magnitude of this evil will appear by attending to the importance and variety of the uses to which marriage is subservient; and by recollecting, that the malignity and moral quality of each crime are not to be estimated by the particular effect of one offence, or of one person's offending, but by the general tendency and consequence of such crimes. The libertine may not be conscious that his irregularities prevent his own marriage, or that they can prevent others from marrying; but what will he say would be the consequence, if the same licentiousness universally prevailed? Or what should hinder this licentiousness from becoming universal, if in him it be innocent or allowable? Fornication supposes prostitution; and prostitution commonly entails upon its victims certain misery. It produces habits of ungovernable lewdness. Of this passion it has been truly said, 'that irregularity has no limits; that one excess draws on another; that the most easy therefore, as well as the most excellent way of being virtuous, is to be so entirely.' The criminal commerce of the sexes corrupts and depraves the mind and moral character more than any single species of vice whatever. That ready perception of guilt, and that prompt and decisive resolution against it, which constitute a virtuous character, are seldom found in persons addicted to these indulgences. Fornication prepares an easy admission for every sin. In low life, it usually leads to the greatest villainies; and in high life, to that lamentable dissoluteness of principle, which manifests itself in a profligacy of public conduct, and a contempt of the obligations of religion and moral probity.

The Christian Scriptures peremptorily condemn fornication. 'Out of the heart,' says our Saviour, 'proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornication, thefts, false witnesses, blasphemies; these are the things which defile a man.' It may be observed, that fornication is mentioned with murders, thefts, false witnesses, blasphemies; and this shows that they are all crimes. So odious were the sins of the flesh to the Apostles, that they charged the first Christians not to keep company with any one that 'was a fornicator, a covetous man, an idolater, a railer, a drunkard, or an extortioner, and with such a man not to eat.' St. Paul warns us 'not to deceive ourselves, for neither fornicators, adulterers, thieves, covetous men, drunkards, revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.' Enumerating the works of the flesh he commences with adultery, fornication, and uncleanness; and he observes, 'that they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.' The same apostle tells the Thessalonians, that as it was 'the will of God, that they should abstain from fornication,' so it was also the great means of preserving themselves, even their sanctification; and that, though the worship of idolaters was commonly defiled with much licentiousness, 'God hath called Christians not to uncleanness, but to holiness.' In the visions of St. John, whoremongers are in two different places reckoned among those who are 'shut out of the New Jerusalem, and who shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.'

The Scripture affords no sanction to those austerities, which have been imposed on men under the idea of religion; but with a just regard to the condition and interest of the human race, it pronounces marriage honourable in all, and thus provides for the propensities of their nature an adequate gratification, to which it restricts them. All those incentives which lead to fornication, are accessories to the crime, and ought to be avoided. Indecent conversation is forbidden by St. Paul, (Ephes. iv. 29.) 'Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth.' Our Saviour condemns not only acts of uncleanness, but also the invitation or voluntary admission of impure thoughts, or the suffering of them to obtain possession of the imagination: 'Whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.' (Matt. v. 28.) By thus enjoining a regulation of the thoughts, Christ strikes at the root of the evil; for when lust is once conceived in the heart, it bringeth forth sin; and of this sin it may more particularly be said, that when it is finished, it bringeth forth death. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii.

FOX, a creature well known, and remarkable chiefly for its cunning. The word rendered foxes in our translation of the Bible rather imports the jackal, which is an animal that goes in troops of hundreds in the east, and is no small terror and nuisance to the country. This creature has a considerable resemblance to a wolf; and it has much of the manners of the hyena. This kind hunts in packs of forty or fifty, or perhaps some hundreds, and eats every thing made of leather. It ransacks the repositories of the dead, and greedily devours the most putrid bodies; and hence the inhabitants of the countries in which it abounds, make their graves very deep in the earth, and secure them with spines, thorns, &c. These animals attend caravans, and follow armies in hopes of prey. Niebuhr says, that 'they are often bold enough to enter houses; and at Bombay, my servant, who resided out of the city, drove them out of his kitchen.' It is very often confounded with the fox. It is, however, observable, that of this creature there are at least two species, the lesser and the larger jackal, the former of which very much resembles a real fox. Volney says, 'The wolf and the real fox are very rare; but there is a prodigious quantity of the middle species named shacal, which in Syria is called wauwee from its howl: they go in droves,' &c. 'Jackals are concealed by hundreds in the gardens, and among ruins, and tombs.'

Hence it appears, that jackals go in droves, in troops; and that Samson might easily procure as many as he wanted. (Judg. xv. 4.) They enter gardens, villages, tents, and houses, during the night; and therefore they would carry the fire with them to all quarters, and might easily burn cornyards, vineyards, and oliveyards. Their noise and howling would convince all who heard them that they were jackals, and thus divert the suspicion from men. The fire would give them pain, and cause them to fight with each other. This would keep them among the corn, &c. longer than usual; and few pairs thus coupled would agree to return to the same den, that they had formerly occupied in the mountains. Hence, nothing could be better adapted to produce a general conflagration, than Samson's expedient.

The sarcasm in Nehem. iv. 3. has been thus paraphrased: 'Their city wall is not fit for an outhouse; it is at best like one of the loose stone hedges, which surround our gardens, without mortar: if a jackal should venture to run along it, instead of leaping over it, he would ruin the whole structure: or, if he should clamber upon it, it would fall.' The lesser jackal, which chiefly frequents gardens, seems to be referred to; and this increases the bitterness of the sarcasm by the comparison. Dr. Shaw says, that the jackals (the lesser kind) 'eat roots and fruits, and frequent the gardens every night.' This then is clearly the animal complained of in Cant. ii. 15: 'Take — catch — us the shuals, the little shuals, which destroy, and waste, and ruin our vines; and that at the time when we expect fruit from them.' Hasselquist likewise says, that 'there is also plenty of them near the convent of St. John, in the desert, about vintage time; inasmuch that the owners are obliged to set guards over the vines, to prevent these creatures from destroying them.' As foxes in England are not destroyers of grapes, this passage in the Canticles has been severely criticised, but with what reason, let the reader now judge.

The following passages seem to refer to the larger jackal.—Ezekiel (xiii. 4,) says, 'As shuals in wastes around deserted towns are thy prophets, O Israel. They continue to destroy, but do not repair; they clamber over defences broken down, and increase the dilapidations in the stone walls, but they restore no part to its strength; they do not go up into the gaps, to repair them; nor bring fresh stones to replace those that are fallen, to make up the wall for the security of the house of Israel, that it may stand even a skirmish, much less an assault, in the day of the Lord.' From the disposition of the jackal to prey on carrion, the Psalmist (lxiii. 10.) naturally associates this creature with his slain enemies: 'Those who seek to destroy my soul shall themselves be destroyed; be slain and be buried, in the lowest parts—or depths—of the earth; but they shall not rest in their graves, the jackals shall tear them from thence as their lawful prey;—they shall be a portion for shuals.' By correcting the word translated fox to jackal, the following passage in Matt. viii. 20. possesses great strength of expression: 'The jackals, beasts of prey and of injury, have holes where they may hide themselves; and the rapacious birds of the heaven have nests, but the meek, the benevolent Son of Man, he who goes about doing good, hath not where to lay his head.'

The metaphorical application of the name, or character, of the shual, or jackal, to persons, is thus used by our Lord: (Luke xiii. 32.) 'Go ye and tell that fox—that crafty, cruel, insidious creature! that jackal of a prince! who has indeed expressed his enmity by his threats, as jackals do their mischievous dispositions by their barkings, and who yelps in concert with others of my enemies, jackal-like, tell him that I am safe from his fury to-day and to-morrow, and on the third day I shall be completed, completely beyond his power.' This might allude to our Saviour's resurrection on a third day ; or, is day put for year ?

It seems to be agreed, that real foxes are very rare in Judea; and they appear to be equally rare in Scripture. In all places in which the word occurs, it refers to the jackal. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccix. p. 33, &c.; Harmer's Observations, vol. ii. p. 221.

FRANCISCANS, a religious order founded by St. Francis in the year 1209. Francis was the son of a merchant of Assisi, in the province of Umbria, and for some time led a most debauched and dissolute life. On his recovery from a severe fit of sickness, he fell into an extravagant kind of devotion, that looked less like religion than alienation of mind. Some time after this, in 1208, he happened to hear that passage repeated, in which Christ addresses his apostles in the following manner: 'Provide neither gold nor silver,' &c. (Matt. x. 9, 10.) This produced a powerful effect upon his mind, induced him to consider a voluntary and absolute poverty as the essence of the Gospel and the soul of religion, and to prescribe this poverty as a sacred rule both to himself and to the few that followed him. This new society, which appeared to Innocent III. extremely adapted to the present state of the church, and proper to restore its declining credit, was solemnly approved and confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223, and had made a considerable progress before the death of its founder in 1226. Francis, through an excessive humility, would not suffer the monks of his order to be called fratres, that is, brethren or friars, but fratrculi, that is, little brethren, or friars minor, by which denomination they have been generally since distinguished.

The Franciscans and Dominicans were zealous and active friends to the papal hierarchy, and in return were distinguished by peculiar privileges and honourable employments. In 1243, a violent dispute arose between the Franciscans and the Dominicans, concerning the preference and dignity of their respective orders. The Franciscans asserted that their order had greater marks of humility and mortification; that the preference ought to be measured by the degrees of self-denial and discipline; that for these considerations, theirs must be esteemed the superior order; and that it would be a mark of improvement in the Dominicans, to incorporate with them. In one point, however, both were agreed: each order had made an astonishing progress in wealth and reputation; their cloisters were decorated like the abodes of princes, and not a trace of their primitive poverty appeared; and their credit was so greatly advanced, that few thought themselves secure of salvation, without the assistance of one of the Dominican or the Franciscan brethren, as a spiritual director.

Such, indeed, was the opulence of the Franciscans, that, as early as the year 1299, they applied to Pope Boniface, and offered him forty thousand ducats of gold, and a prodigious quantity of silver, if he would enable them by his bull to become the purchasers of estates, and to live like the other orders. When the pope inquired whether their money was ready, they answered it was, and lodged in the bankers' hands. Upon this, he ordered them to withdraw, and return in three days for his answer. In the mean time, he sent to the bankers, absolved them from their obligation to restore the money to the monks, and charged them, under pain of excommunication, to reserve it for the use of the Roman see. When the Franciscans returned at the day appointed, in expectation of their diploma, the pope told them that he found, upon consideration, it was not advisable to dispense with St. Francis's mite, and therefore they must of necessity continue under their first engagements, to live without property. Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. ii. p. 164; Mosheim, vol. iii. pp. 56, &c.

FRENCH PROPHETS. They first appeared in Dauphiny and Vivarais. In the year 1688, five or six hundred Protestants of both sexes gave themselves out to be prophets, and inspired by the Holy Ghost. They soon became so numerous, that there were many thousands of them inspired. They had strange fits, which came upon them with tremblings and faintings, as in a swoon, and which made them stretch out their arms and legs, and stagger several times before they dropped down. They struck themselves with their hands, they fell on their backs, shut their eyes, and heaved with their breasts. They remained for some time in trances, and, coming out of them with twitchings, uttered all which came into their mouths. They said they saw the heavens open, the angels, paradise, and hell. Those who were just on the point of receiving the spirit of prophecy dropped down, not only in the assemblies, crying out mercy, but in the fields, and in their own houses. The least of their assemblies consisted of four or five hundred, and some of them amounted to even three or four thousand persons. When the prophets had for a time been under agitations of the body, they began to prophesy. The burden of their prophecies was, 'Amend your lives, repent ye; the end of all things draws nigh!' The hills rebounded with their loud cries for mercy, and with imprecations against the priests, the church, the pope, and the anti-christian dominion, with predictions of the approaching fall of popery. All they said at these times was heard and received with reverence and awe.

In the year 1706, three or four of these prophets came over into England, and brought their prophetic spirit along with them, which discovered itself in the same ways and manners; by ecstasies, and agitations, and inspirations under them, as it had done in France: and they propagated the like spirit to others, so that before the year was out, there were two or three hundred of these prophets in and about London, of both sexes, of all ages, men, women, and children: and they had delivered under inspiration four or five hundred prophetic warnings.

The great thing which they pretended by their spirit was, to give warning of the near approach of the kingdom of God, the happy times of the church, and the millennial state. Their message, which they were to proclaim as heralds to the Jews, and to every other people, was, that the grand jubilee, the acceptable year of the Lord, the accomplishment of those numerous passages of Scripture concerning the new heavens, and the new earth, the kingdom of the Messiah, the marriage of the Lamb, the first resurrection, or the New Jerusalem descending from above, were now even at the door; that this great operation was to be wrought on the part of man by spiritual arms only, proceeding from the mouths of those who, by inspiration, or the mighty gift of the Spirit, should be sent forth in great numbers to labour in the vineyard: that this mission of His servants should be confirmed by signs and wonders from heaven, by a deluge of judgments on the wicked universally throughout the world, as famine, pestilence, earthquakes, &c.; that the exterminating angels shall root out the tares, and there shall remain on earth only good corn; and that the works of men being destroyed, there shall be but one Lord, one faith, one heart, and one voice among mankind. They declared that all the great things of which they spoke, would be manifested over the whole earth within the term of three years.

These prophets pretended also to the gift of languages, of discerning the secrets of the heart, of ministration of the same spirit to others by the imposition of hands, and of healing. To prove they were really inspired by the Holy Ghost, they alleged the complete joy and satisfaction they experienced, the spirit of prayer which they received, and the answer of their prayers by God. Adam's View of Religions, p. 136.

FRIENDSHIP, is an attachment which rises neither from interested designs nor party zeal, but from that similarity of dispositions, that corresponding harmony of minds, which endears some person to our heart, and inclines us to take as much interest in his circumstances, fortunes, and fate, as if they were our own. 'The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and Jonathan loved him as his own soul.' (1 Sam. xviii. 1.) Such friendships certainly are not unreal; and, for the honour of human nature it is to be hoped, that they are not altogether unfrequent among mankind. Happy it is when they take root in our early years, and are engrafted on the ingenuous sensibility of youth. Friendships then contracted retain to the last a tenderness and warmth, seldom possessed by such as are formed in the riper periods of life. The remembrance of ancient and youthful connections melts every human heart; and the dissolution of them is, perhaps, the most painful feeling to which we are exposed here below. But at whatever period of life friendships are formed, as long as they continue sincere and affectionate, they undoubtedly form one of the greatest blessings we can enjoy. By the pleasing communications of all our sentiments which they prompt, they are justly said to double our pleasures, and to divide our sorrows. They give a brighter sunshine to the pleasing incidents of life; and they enlighten the gloom of its darker hours. It is justly and beautifully said, that a 'faithful friend is the medicine of life.' (Ecclus. vi. 16.) A variety of occasions happens, when to pour forth the heart to one whom we love and trust, is the chief comfort, perhaps the only relief we can enjoy. Miserable is he who, confined within the narrow inclosure of selfish interest, has no person to whom he can at all times, with full confidence, expand his soul.

The fundamental qualities of true friendship are constancy and fidelity. An inconstant man is incapable of friendship. He may perhaps have affections which occasionally glow in his heart, which excite fondness for amiable qualities, or connect him with seeming attachment to one whom he esteems, or by whom he has been obliged. But after these feelings have continued for a little, either fancied interest alienates him, or some new object attracts him; and he is no longer the same person to those whom he once loved. Where there is no fixedness of moral principle, occasional feelings are of no value; mind is of no effect; and with such persons it is never desirable to have any connection. Where constancy is wanting, there can be no fidelity, which is the other basis of friendship. For all friendship supposes entire confidence and trust; the seal of secrecy to be inviolable; promises and engagements to be sacred; and no advantage of our own to be pursued, at the expense of our friend's honour. An inconstant man is despicable; a faithless man, base.

But, supposing neither constancy nor fidelity to be altogether wanting, still, however, friendship is in hazard of suffering from the follies and unreasonable humours to which all of us are liable. It is to be regarded as a tender plant in an unfavourable soil, which, in order to its flourishing, requires to be reared and nursed with care. We ought never to expect perfection in any with whom we contract friendship. If in any person we trust to find nothing but perfection, we may be assured that, on longer acquaintance, we shall meet with disappointments. The best and most estimable persons are they, in whom the fewest material defects are found, and whose great and solid qualities counterbalance the common infirmities of men. To these qualities we are to look in forming friendships; to good sense and prudence, which constitute the basis of every respectable character; to virtue, to good temper, to steadiness of affection; and according to the union of these dispositions, we should esteem ourselves happy in the friend whom we choose.—We ought not to be hurt by differences of opinion arising in intercourse with our friends. It is impossible for these not to occur. Perhaps, no two persons were ever so exactly cast in the same mould, as to think always in the same manner on every subject. No man has any right to erect his own opinions into an universal and infallible standard; and the more enlarged any man's mind is, the more readily he will overlook difference in sentiments, as long as he is persuaded that the mind of his friend is upright, and that he follows the dictates of conscience and integrity.—We ought to cultivate an openness of temper and manners. Nothing more certainly dissolves friendship, than the jealousy which arises from darkness and concealment. If our situation oblige us to take a different side from our friend, let us do it openly. Mutual confidence is the soul of friendship. As soon as that is destroyed, or even impaired, it is only a show of friendship that remains.—We ought to cultivate, in all intercourse among friends, gentle and obliging manners. An intimate connection can only be kept up by a constant wish to be pleasing and agreeable. The ordinary tenour of life is composed of small duties and offices, which men have occasion daily to perform; and it is only by rendering daily behaviour agreeable, that we can long preserve the comforts of friendship.—We ought not to listen rashly to evil reports against our friends. When on proper grounds we have formed a connection, let us be slow in believing any thing against the friend whom we have chosen. There is among mankind a spirit of malignity, which too often takes pleasure in disturbing the society of those who appear to enjoy each other. It forms part of the character of a wise and good man, that he is not prone to 'take up a reproach against his neighbour.'—We ought not to desert our friend in danger or distress. When our friend is calumniated, then is the time openly and boldly to espouse his cause. When his situation is changed or his fortunes are fallen, then is the time of affording prompt and zealous aid. When sickness or infirmity occasions him to be neglected by others, that is the opportunity which every real friend will seize, of redoubling all the affectionate attentions which love suggests. These are the important duties, the sacred claims of friendship, which religion and virtue enforce on every worthy mind.

In Scripture, by 'friend' is sometimes meant the favourite of a prince. Hushai was the friend, the favourite of David. (2 Sam. xv. 37.) Abraham was eminently called the friend of God. (2 Chron. xx. 7.) The friend of the bridegroom is the bride-man, who does the honours of the wedding. Blair's Sermons, Sermon lxvii.

FROG, a very common creature. It was one of the sacred animals of the Egyptians, was consecrated to the sun, and considered an emblem of divine inspiration in its inflations. Moses brought on Egypt a plague of frogs. (Exod. viii. 5.)

Frogs were unclean. Moses indeed does not name them; but he includes them by saying, 'ye shall not eat of any thing that moves in the waters, unless it have fins and scales.' (Levit. xi. 9, 10, 11, 12.) In the symbolical imagery of the Revelation of St. John, three unclean or demoniacal spirits, doing signs, or proposing miracles, like frogs, are represented as issuing from the mouths of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. (Rev. xvi. 13.) It is remarkable, says Dr. Hales, that the ancient arms of France were three frogs! Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 187.

FRONTLETS. Leo of Modena thus describes them: The Jews take four pieces of parchment, and write, with an ink made on purpose, and in square letters, these four passages, one on each piece: 1. 'Sanctify unto me all the first-born,' &c. (Exod. xiii. to verse 10.); 2. 'And when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites,' &c. (from verse 11 to 16.); 3. 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord,' &c. (Deut. vi. 4—9.); 4. 'If you shall hearken diligently unto my commandments,' &c. (Deut. xi. 13—21.) This they do in obedience to these words of Moses: 'These commandments shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes.'

These four little pieces of parchment are fastened together, and a square formed of them, on which the letter Schin is written; then a little square of hard calf's skin is put upon the top, out of which come two leathern strings an inch wide, and a cubit and a-half, or thereabouts, in length. This square is put on the middle of the forehead, and the strings being girt about the head, make a knot in the form of the letter γ ; they then are brought before, and fall on the breast. It is called Tephila-Schel-Rosch, or the Tephila of the head. The most devout Jews put it on both at morning and noon-day prayer; but the generality of the Jews wear it only at morning prayer. Only the chanter of the synagogue is obliged to put it on at noon as well as morning.

It is a question, whether the use of frontlets, and other phylacteries, was literally ordained by Moses. They who believe their use to be binding, observe, that the text of Moses speaks as positively of this as of other precepts; he requires the commandments of God to be written on the doors of houses, as a sign on their hands, and as an ornament on their foreheads. (Exod. xiii. 16.) If there be any obligation to write these commandments on their doors, as the text intimates, there is the same for writing them on their hands and foreheads. The use of them was common in the time of our Saviour, not only in Judea, but also among the Indian Jews, the Persians, and Babylonians, according to Jerome. Long before, the doctors, whom the high-priest Eleazar sent to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, spoke of these phylacteries as at all times received among them, and referred the beginning of them to Moses. It is added, that in the time of Moses, the Heathens carried abundance of charms and superstitious preservatives about them, and even some immodest things; that he, to cure his people of these bad customs, or to prevent them, enjoined them to wear on their hands and foreheads the sacred words of his ordinances.

On the contrary, others maintain, that these precepts should be taken figuratively and allegorically, as denoting that the Jews should very carefully preserve the remembrance of God's law, and observe His commands; that they should always have them before them, and never forget them. Prior to the Babylonish captivity, no traces of them appear in the history of the Jews. The prophets never inveigh against the omission or neglect of them; nor was there any question concerning them in the reformation of manners at any time among the Hebrews. The almost general custom in the East, of wearing phylacteries and frontlets, determines nothing for the antiquity or usefulness of this practice. Jesus Christ did not absolutely condemn them; but he condemned the abuse of them in the Pharisees, who wore them with affectation, and larger than other Jews. The Caraites Jews, who adhere to the letter of the law, and despise traditions, call the Rabbinical Jews bridled asses, because they wear these tephilim and frontlets. See PHYLACTERY.

FULFIL is a difficult word to treat within a narrow compass. It refers to something foretold; and as there are many modes of foretelling as well as different degrees of clearness, with which future events may be foretold, we naturally expect as many corresponding modes of fulfilment. Abijah the prophet, foretold to the wife of Jeroboam, that, as soon as she got home, her child should die. This prediction received an instant and direct fulfilment, in the death of the child. (1 Kings xiv. 17.) Joshua foretold, that whoever undertook to rebuild Jericho, should begin it with the loss of his first-born son, and finish it with the death of his youngest. This was not fulfilled for five hundred years; and we are uncertain whether it included the death of the intermediate children. However, Hiel of Bethel experienced its fulfilment, though in a mode, probably, entirely unexpected. (Josh. vi. 26. 1 Kings xvi. 34.)

Sometimes prophecy has a direct and sole reference to a certain fact to happen hereafter at a distant period; and sometimes it refers in a double manner, as well to a fact which is appointed to take place at no very distant period, as to another fact of which the first is only a sign or earnest. When, therefore, the first fact has actually happened, the prediction may be said in one respect to be fulfilled; whilst in another respect it may be said to continue unfulfilled, as its complete and final accomplishment is not yet arrived. Many prophecies appear to be in this state at present: they have been partly fulfilled in past events, and are now fulfilling in some respects; but their final and complete accomplishment is to be expected hereafter. Of this observation the Jewish people are a striking instance.

Sometimes a remarkable phraseology, which directly refers only to one specific event, is said to be fulfilled in another event: that is, the phrase may be well applied to, be remarkably illustrated by, or may, indeed, in a loose and distant meaning, be referred to the latter event, which appears as another and farther fulfilment, though, strictly speaking, the first fulfilment was enough to satisfy, and actually did satisfy, the prophecy. The slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem may be understood as an instance of this nature. The prophet (Jerem. xxxi. 15.) certainly employed the phrase of 'Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted,' in reference to an event much nearer to himself, than that to which the evangelist Matthew applies it; though the latter event was a remarkable coincidence, and the expression might be readily accommodated to it.

Sometimes a phrase, which originally meant to describe a particular man, or class of men, is said to be fulfilled by a class of men distinct and distant from those of whom it was first spoken; because the resemblance is so close, and their characters are so much alike, that what was foretold of one may very aptly and expressively be applied to the other. When the prophets complain of the perverseness of the Jews, in their days, the same kind of perverseness in the time of the Messiah may naturally be described by the same language, the import of which is revived, or rather more powerfully fulfilled, in its latter application, though to a very distant generation.

Proverbial expressions, which do not refer to any specific occurrence or fact, are said to be fulfilled when an event happens; not that the event may be applied or referred to them, but that they may be applied or referred to the event as very similar or descriptive.

All these and many other modes of fulfilling, are expressed in Scripture; and it requires attention to distinguish whether a strict, or a less confined sense is to be put on the word fulfil. It ought also to be observed, that some things are said to be done, that it might be fulfilled; but in general, persons who were actually engaged in fulfilling prophecy, did not suspect that their actions were in any degree foretold, nor did they perceive the relation of them to the prophecy, till after the events which accomplished the predictions. Yet it would seem, that our Lord did purposely, and with design to fulfil former predictions, use certain expressions, and perform certain actions. He rode upon an ass, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet; and Jesus himself knew that he was fulfilling this prophecy, though his disciples did not. They did not recollect, that the Scripture contained any such passage; still less that it described any part of the Messiah's character or conduct. This appears very remarkably in John xix. 28: 'After this, Jesus, knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, I thirst.' Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

FUTURE STATE, a term used in reference to the existence of the soul after death. That there is such a state of existence, we have every reason to believe. If we suppose the events of this life to have no reference to another, the whole state of man becomes not only inexplicable, but contradictory and inconsistent. The powers of the inferior animals are perfectly suited to their station. They know nothing higher than their present condition. In gratifying their appetites, they fulfil their destiny, and pass away. Man, alone, comes forth to act a part, which carries no meaning, and tends to no end. Endowed with capacities which extend far beyond his present sphere, fitted by his rational nature for running the race of immortal, he is stopped short in the very entrance of his course. He squanders his activity on pursuits which he discerns to be vain. He languishes for knowledge which is placed beyond his reach. He thirsts after a happiness which he is doomed never to enjoy. He sees, and laments, the disasters of his state; and yet, upon this supposition, he can find nothing to remedy them. Has the eternal God any pleasure in sporting Himself with such a scene of misery and folly as this life, if it had no connexion with another, must exhibit to his eye? Did He call into existence this magnificent universe, adorn it with so much beauty and splendour, and surround it with those glorious luminaries which we behold in the heavens, only that some generations of mortal men might arise to behold these wonders, and then disappear for ever? How unsuitable, in this case, were the habitation to the wretched inhabitant? how inconsistent the commencement of his being, and the mighty preparation of his powers and faculties, with his despicable end! How contradictory, in fine, were every thing which concerns the state of man, to the wisdom and perfection of his Maker!

Throughout all ages, and among all nations, the persuasion of a future life has prevailed. Even the belief of the being of a God is not more general on the earth, than the belief of immortality. Dark, indeed, and confused, were the notions which men entertained concerning a future state. The Heathens were entirely ignorant of the nature of future happiness. The Jews, to whom God spake at divers times and in sundry manners, were instructed in the important doctrine of a future state. The heavenly inheritance, which they were taught to expect, was prefigured in the sacred books by the 'earthly Canaan.' As the knowledge of one true God was preserved in Abraham's family, so also, undoubtedly, was the promise of future happiness, which St. Paul asserts to have been believed by the patriarchs. But what is a tradition, though founded originally in revelation; or what are types and figures, compared with that open and clear light in which the resurrection to everlasting life is exhibited in the New Testament? In what full and distinct terms is it expressed! It was even demonstrated in the person of our Lord! The resurrection of Christ from the grave was designed to be a sensible evidence, that death infers not a final extinction of the living principle. He rose, in order to show, that, in our name, He had conquered death, and was 'become the first fruits of them that sleep.' Nor did He only rise from the grave, but, by ascending to heaven in a visible form before many witnesses, gave an ocular demonstration of the transition from this world into the regions of the blessed. The employments which now occupy Him there, are fully declared. 'As our forerunner, He hath entered within the vail. He appears in the presence of God for us. He maketh perpetual intercession for His people. 'I go,' saith He, 'to my Father, and your Father, to my God and your God. In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you. I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am, there ye may be also.' The circumstances of His coming are again distinctly foretold. The sounding of the last trumpet, the resurrection of the dead, the appearance of the Judge, and the solemnity with which He shall discriminate the good from the wicked are all described. The very words in which He shall pronounce the final sentence, are recited in our hearing:

'Come, ye blessed of my Father! inherit the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world.' Then shall the holy and the just be 'caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air.' They shall enter with Him into the 'city of the living God.' They shall possess the 'new earth and new heavens, wherein dwelleth righteousness. God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. They shall behold his face in righteousness, and be satisfied with his likeness for ever.' Such is the language of Scripture, and such the firm belief of every Christian. By recording such a train of striking circumstances and facts, the Gospel familiarizes us in some measure with a future state. Blair's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 224, &c.; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, Essay iv.; Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity, p. 212.

GAB

GAB'BATHA, Γαββαθᾶ, signifies high, or elevated, and was the Hebrew name of a place in Pilate's palace, (John xix. 13.) called in Greek lithostrotos, that is, a pavement. From this place Pilate pronounced sentence against Christ. It was probably an eminence, or terrace, a raised pavement; a gallery, or balcony, paved with stone or marble, and pretty high; perhaps, also, it was balustraded. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. 1. p. 98.

GAB'RIEL, גַּבְרִיֵּאל, signifies God is my strength, or man of God, or strength of God, or my strong God. Gabriel, a principal angel in heaven, was sent to the prophet Daniel, to explain his visions. He was also sent to Zacharias, to announce to him the future birth of John the Baptist, five or six months before the birth of Christ. (Luke i. 11, &c.) Six months after, Gabriel was sent to Nazareth, to a virgin named Mary, betrothed to Joseph, in the year of the world 4004, nine or ten months before the birth of Christ. (Luke i. 26, &c.) Calmet is of opinion, that Gabriel was the angel who appeared to Joseph when he thought of dismissing Mary; who, on another occasion, enjoined Joseph to retire to Egypt; and who, after the decease of Herod, directed him to return into Judea.

GAD, גַּד, signifies happy, or armed and prepared; otherwise, goat. It was the name of the son of Jacob and Zilpah, Leah's servant. (Gen. xxx. 9, 10, 11.) Leah, Jacob's wife, gave him also Zilpah, that by her she might have children. Zilpah bare a son whom Leah called Gad, saying, A troop cometh. Gad had seven sons, Ziphion, Haggi, Shuni, Ezbon, Eri, Arodi, and Areli. (Gen. xli. 16.)

Jacob, blessing Gad, said, 'A troop shall overcome him, but he shall overcome at the last;' (Gen. xlix. 19.) and Moses, in his last song, mentions Gad as 'a lion which teareth the arm with the crown of the head,' &c. (Deut. xxxiii. 20, 21.)

The tribe of Gad came out of Egypt in number 45,650. After the defeat of the kings Og and Sihon, Gad and Reuben desired to have their divisions in these countries, and alleged their great number of cattle. Moses granted their request, on condition that they would accompany their brethren, and assist in the conquest of the land beyond Jordan. Gad had his inheritance between Reuben south, and Manasseh north, with the mountains of Gilead east, and Jordan west.

GAD, a prophet, David's friend, who followed him when persecuted by Saul, and was very much attached to him. The Scripture calls him a prophet, and David's seer. (2 Sam. xxiv. 11.) The first time we find him with this prince is, when he fled into the land of Moab, (1 Sam. xxii. 5.) to secure his father and mother in the first year of his flight, and of Saul's persecution. The prophet Gad warned David to return into the land of Judah.

After David had determined to number his people, the Lord sent to him the prophet Gad, who gave him his choice of three scourges: seven years' famine, or three months' flight before his enemies, or three days' pestilence. Gad advised David to erect an altar to the Lord in the threshing-floor of Ornan or Araunah, the Jebusite. Gad wrote a history of David's life, cited in 1 Chron. xxix. 29.

GAD, or GOOD FORTUNE, was a Syrian idol. Selden mentions this goddess as the first idol noticed in Scripture, and worshipped by the Hebrews. This opinion is founded on the exclamation of Leah, (Gen. xxx. 11.) when her handmaid Zilpah bore a son to Jacob. She said, I am prosperous, (or as some in the present day, who ascribe every thing to chance, would say, Good luck to me;) and she called his name Gad, that is prosperity. Though this interpretation has been questioned, yet in Isaiah lxx. 11, Gad is certainly joined with Meni (or the Moon,) and both are names of idols, where the prophet says,

But ye who have deserted JEHOVAH,
And have forgotten my holy mountain;
Who set in order a table for Gad,
And fill out a libation to Meni.

Bp. Lowth's Version.

What these objects of idolatrous worship were it is now impossible exactly to ascertain; it is probable that the latter was an Egyptian deity, if not also the former. 'It seems to me,' says the author of a new translation of Isaiah, 'that by Gad and Meni, the two great divinities of Egypt, Isis and Osiris, are here intended.' Jerome, as cited by Bishop Lowth, gives an account of the idolatrous practice of the apostate Jews, which is alluded to by the prophet, of making a feast, or a lectisternium, as the Romans called it, for these pretended deities. 'It is,' he says, 'an ancient idolatrous custom in every city in Egypt, and especially at Alexandria, that on the last day of the last month in the year, they set out a table with various kinds of dishes, and with a cup filled with a mixture of water, wine, and honey, indicating the fertility of the past or future year.' This also the Israelites did. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 349; Lowth's Translation of Isaiah, pp. 275, 276; New Translation of Isaiah, pp. 366, 367, edit. 1790.

GAD'ARA, GADARENES', Γαδάρηνοι, signifies surrounded, walled, fenced. Gadara was a city beyond Jordan. Josephus calls it the capital of Peræa, east of the lake of Tiberias sixty furlongs. Pliny says, that the river Hieramiac, now denominated Hippodion, flows near this city. Gadara was sometimes reckoned among the cities of Decapolis. It gave name to a canton beyond Jordan.

St. Mark (v. 1.) says, that our Saviour having passed the sea of Tiberias, came into the district of the Gadarenes. Luke (viii. 26.) says the same. Matthew (viii. 28.) calls it Gergasenes; but some Greek copies read Gadarenes. Gergasa was near Gadara; and the territory belonging to it was more extensive than that of this last city. As the lands belonging to one were included within the other, one evangelist might say the country of the Gergasenes, and another that of the Gadarenes. It is thought by some, that the Gadarenes might be a remnant of the ancient Gergashites, who formerly composed one tribe in this district.

'Along the borders of this lake (Gennesareth),' says Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'may still be seen the remains of those ancient tombs, hewn by the earliest inhabitants of Galilee, in the rocks which face the water. They were empty in the time of our Saviour, and had become the resort of wretched men, afflicted by diseases, and made outcasts of society; for in the account of the cure performed by our Saviour upon a demoniac, in the country of the Gadarenes, these tombs are particularly alluded to, and their existence to this day offers strong internal evidence of the accuracy of the evangelist who has recorded the transaction: 'There met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling among the tombs.' (Mark v. 2, 3.) The remains of the warm baths for which this place was anciently celebrated, are also still to be seen. Gadara is now called Oomkais, or Omkeis. Quarterly Review, vol. xxvi. p. 389; Irby's and Mangle's Travels, pp. 297, 298; Sacred Geography; Clarke's Travels in Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land, vol. iv. pp. 211, 212; fourth edition.

GA' IUS, Γάιος, may signify earthy. Gaius, Paul's disciple, was probably a Macedonian, but settled at Corinth, where he lodged the apostle during his abode in that city. (Rom. xv. 23.) When Paul went into Asia, Gaius and Aristarchus accompanied him to Ephesus, where they abode with him some time. In the sedition raised there, about great Diana, the Ephesians ran to the house of Gaius and Aristarchus, whom they dragged to the theatre. However, no harm happened to either of them, as the commotion was appeased by the prudence of the town-clerk. Gaius is said to have been bishop of Thessalonica.

GA' IUS, to whom the apostle John wrote his third Epistle, was, in the opinion of several commentators, the same as Gaius, Paul's disciple and host at Corinth; but others think, that the Gaius of John is mentioned (Acts xx. 4.) as of Derbe in Lycaonia, and consequently is not Gaius the Macedonian.

GALA'TIA, Γαλαρία, signifies milking, or milky; or, rather, Gaul Asia, from the settlement of the Gauls in it. Galatia was a province of Asia Minor, and was bounded on the east by Cappadocia, on the west by Bithynia, on the south by Pamphylia, and on the north by the Euxine Sea. This country was seized by a body of Gauls, who were called in to assist a king of Bithynia. Having expelled his former enemies, they established themselves in these districts, and divided the territory among them. As it was now peopled by a mixture of Gauls and Greeks, it was called Gaulo-græcia, and at length Galatia.

St. Paul preached in Galatia, in the year 51, (Acts xvi. 6.) and afterwards, in 53, or 54; (Acts xviii. 23.) and he formed there considerable churches. Not long after St. Paul had converted the Galatians to the belief of the Gospel, some Judaizing Christians endeavoured, with considerable success, to persuade them of the necessity of being circumcised, and of observing the law of Moses. For this purpose they urged, though without any foundation, the authority of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem; and they represented Paul as having only an inferior commission, derived from the church at Jerusalem, and that even he, in certain cases, had allowed of circumcision. The object of the Epistle to the Galatians, which is written in a strain of angry complaint, was to counteract the impression made by these false teachers, and to re-establish the Galatians in the true Christian faith and practice. St. Paul, after proving the independence and divine original of his mission, and that he was 'not a whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles,' states that he had not compelled his convert and companion Titus, who was a Greek, to be circumcised: and shows that he had uniformly resisted the Judaizing Christians, and in particular Peter, who, through fear of the Jewish Christians, had refused to associate with heathen converts. He contends, that he had always maintained that the Gospel was alone able to save those who believed it, knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ. He proves that the obligation of the ritual part of the Mosaic law is completely abolished with respect to both Jews and Gentiles; points out the moral and spiritual nature of the Gospel, in opposition to outward observances; and concludes with a variety of directions and precepts, all of which tend to the cultivation of practical virtue. Some have thought that the Epistle to the Galatians was written as early as the year 52, and others as late as the year 58. However, an expression in the beginning appears to fix its date with a considerable degree of probability: 'I marvel,' says the apostle, 'that you are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ, unto another Gospel.' This passage seems to prove, that the Epistle was written soon after the Galatians were converted to Christianity; and as Paul does not mention in it that he had been twice in Galatia, it is supposed to have been written between his two visits, and most probably in the year 52, while he was at Corinth, or, as Michaelis thinks, in Macedonia, before he went to Corinth. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. vol. i. p. 400, &c.; Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. vi. p. 9, edit. 1802; Sacred Geography.

GALILE'ANS, a sect of Jews that arose about the time of our Saviour's birth. Of this sect, Judas, of Gaulon, in Upper Galilee, was author, on account of the enrolment of the people appointed by Augustus. This enrolment was executed by Cyrenius (Luke ii. 1. Acts v. 37.) who was afterwards governor of Syria. See CYRENIUS.

Judas the Gaulonite pretended, that the tax established by the Romans was a manifest instance of servitude, which all true Israelites ought to oppose with all their power. These discourses inflamed the minds of the people, many of whom joined Judas, took up arms, and commenced a civil war. This spirit of insurrection, properly speaking, was pacified only by intervals, till it ended in the destruction of Jerusalem. The disciples of Judas were called Galileans, because Judas was of Upper Galilee; and his followers, for the most part, were of the same province. According to Josephus, the Galileans agreed in all things with the Pharisees, but were distinguished by an excessive love of liberty. They were a political faction, rather than a religious sect. They were strongly prejudiced with the idea, that God alone is the prince whom they ought to obey. Perhaps there was some reference to this, not only in representing Jesus as a Galilean to Pilate; but when (Luke xxiii. 2.) his accusers, to render him suspected of this heresy, say, that they found him perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar.

GAL'ILEE, גליל, Γαλιλαία, signifies rollings, or a wheel. This name seems to denote the nature of the country. It may import either the rounds, limits, or circuit of the Israelite territory, northward; or the hills and mountains of which it consists were considered as rounds, knolls, or what we call haughs.

Galilee was one of the most extensive provinces into which the Holy Land was divided. It exceeded Judea in extent, but probably varied in its limits at different times. This province is divided by the Rabbins into, 1. The Upper; 2. The Nether; and, 3. The Valley. Josephus divides it into only Upper and Lower; and he says, that the limits of Galilee were, on the south, Samaris and Scythopolis, unto the flood of Jordan. Galilee contained four tribes: Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher; a part also of Dan; and part of Peræa, that is, beyond the river. Upper Galilee abounded in mountains, and was eminently understood by the term Galilee of the Gentiles, as the mountainous nature of the country enabled those who possessed the fastnesses, to maintain themselves against invaders. Strabo enumerates among its inhabitants Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Lower Galilee, which contained the tribes of Zebulun and Asher, was sometimes called the Great Field, 'the champaign.' (Deut. ix. 30.) The Valley was adjacent to the sea of Tiberias. Josephus describes Galilee as very populous, and containing two hundred and four cities and towns. It was also very rich, and paid two hundred talents in tribute. The natives were brave and good soldiers; but they were seditious, and prone to insolence and rebellion. In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, the inhabitants of Galilee and Peræa are scarcely mentioned; whether they were Jews returned from Babylon, or a mixture of different nations. The language of these regions differed considerably from that of Judea; as did various customs, in which each followed its own mode.

Our Lord so frequently visited Galilee, that he was called a Galilean. (Matth. xxvi. 69.) He was addressed under this title by his adversary, the dying Julian, who, being cut off from prosecuting his purposes against Christianity, exclaimed with indignation, 'Thou hast conquered, O Galilean!' The population of Galilee being very great, our Lord had many opportunities of doing good in this country; and being there out of the power of the priests at Jerusalem, he seems to have preferred it as his abode. Nazareth and Capernaum were in this division. From such a mixture of people many provincialisms might be expected. Hence we find Peter detected by his language, probably by his phraseology as well as his pronunciation. (Mark xiv. 70.) Sacred Geography.

GAL'LIO, Γαλλίων, signifies he that sucks, or lives on milk, and was the name of the brother of Seneca, the philosopher. He was before named Marcus Annæus Novatus; but being adopted by Lucius Junius Gallio, he took the name of his adoptive father. The emperor Claudius made him proconsul of Achaia. He was of a mild and agreeable temper. To him his brother Seneca dedicated his books, Of anger. He shared in the fortunes of his brothers, as well when out of favour as in their prosperity at court. At length, Nero put him as well as them to death. The Jews were enraged at Paul for converting many Gentiles, and dragged him to the tribunal of Gallio, who, as proconsul, generally resided at Corinth. (Acts xviii. 12, 13.) They accused him of teaching 'men to worship God contrary to the law.' Paul being about to speak, Gallio told the Jews, that if the matter in question were a breach of justice, or an action of a criminal nature, he should think himself obliged to hear them; but as the dispute was only concerning their law, he would not determine such differences, nor judge them. Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was seized and beaten before Gallio's seat of justice; but this governor did not concern himself about it.

GAMALIEL, גמליאל, signifies recompence of God, or camel of God, or weaned of God. Gamaliel was a Pharisee, a doctor of the law, and Paul's master. He is also said by some to have been master of Barnabas and Stephen. The Jews having brought Peter before the assembly of rulers, Gamaliel moved that the apostles should retire. He then advised the assembly to take heed what they intended to do concerning these men, &c. and to treat them with lenity. The advice of Gamaliel was followed, and the apostles were liberated. (Acts v. 34.)

Gamaliel is supposed to have been the grandson of Hillel, and either uncle or cousin to Nicodemus. (John iii. 1.)

GATH, גת, signifies a wine-press, and was a city of the Philistines, one of their five principalities. (1 Sam. vi. 17.) The name is usually supposed to have arisen from the plenty of wine made at this town; but the neighbouring towns were no less famous for wine than Gath. Perhaps its situation resembled a wine-press in form. Some think that wine-presses were first invented or employed at Gath.

Gath appears to have been an ancient city. (Josh xi. 22. 1 Sam. v. 8.) It is famous for having given birth to Goliath. It was conquered by David in the beginning of his reign over all Israel (1 Chron. xviii. 1.); and it continued subject to his successors till the declension of the kingdom of Judah. (2 Sam. viii. 1.) It was rebuilt or fortified by Rehoboam. (2 Chron. xi. 8.) It was retaken by Uzziah; and Hezekiah reduced it under his subjection. It was afterwards demolished by Hazael king of Syria, and was of little consequence till the time of the Holy war, when Fulk, king of Jerusalem, built a castle on its ruins.

Calmet thinks that Mithcah, mentioned by Moses, (Numb. xxxiii. 29.) is the Metheg of 2 Sam. viii. 1. In our English Bible, it is translated 'David took Metheg-ammah,' (Metheg the mother,) which in Chronicles is explained by, 'he took Gath and her daughters;' or, as it is in our translation, 'Gath and her towns;' Gath being the mother or capital, and the towns the daughters or dependencies. The district of Gath and its dependencies might be called in David's time Metheg-ammah; but this name becoming obsolete, the author of Chronicles explains it to be Gath and her towns. Is Metheg transposed Gathem?

Gath was situated about five or six miles from Jamnia, about fourteen south of Joppa, and thirty-two west of Jerusalem. Hence some authors, among whom is Calmet, say that Gath is the most southern, and Ekron the most northern, of the cities of the Philistines, as if these had been the two boundaries of their dominions; but it appears that Gath and Ekron are not more than five miles from each other, and Gaza is the last of the five principal cities south. Several more towns called Geth or Gath are mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome, besides those distinguished by an additional name. Universal History, b. i. c. 7; Sacred Geography.

GA'ZA, גַּזָּא, גַּזָּה, signifies strong, or a goat; and this name very probably imports well provided, well fortified. Gaza is a city of great antiquity, and is noticed among those which marked the bounds of the territory of the Canaanites. It was one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, (1 Sam. vi. 17.) and was a frontier defence against Egypt. Pharaoh smote Gaza, (Jerem. xlvii. 1.); and it seems from Amos (i. 7.) that part, at least, of its walls and defences was composed of wood, as the prophet threatens to send a fire on it, to consume it, which he would scarcely have preferred, had it been wholly of stone. Alexander the Great besieged Babamesis the Persian, during two months, in Gaza; and that city, which had formerly been very famous, was laid waste by the Macedonian conqueror, and was rendered desert, says Strabo. He did not wholly destroy it, but rather dismantled and degraded it; and a new city, nearer to the sea, and to the haven of Gaza, rose out of the former. Diodorus Siculus mentions Palæ Gaza, Old Gaza; and Strabo notices 'Gaza, the desert,' which agrees with Acts viii. 26. Gaza was afterwards called New Majuma, and afterwards Constantia, says Eusebius; and it is now pronounced Rassa, with a strong guttural, by the Arabs.

'From the walls of Gaza,' says Volney, 'we view at once the sea, separated by a sandy beach, a quarter of a league wide, and the country, whose date trees, and flat and naked aspect, as far as the eye can discern, reminds us of Egypt; and in fact, in this latitude, the soil and climate both appear to be truly Arabian. The heat, the drought, the winds and the dews, are the same as on the banks of the Nile: and the inhabitants have the complexion, stature, manners, and accent of the Egyptians, rather than those of the Syrians.'

Gaza is situated upon an eminence, and is rendered picturesque by the number of fine minarets which rise majestically above the buildings, and by the beautiful date trees interspersed. A very fine plain commences about three miles from the town, on the other side, in which are several groves of olive-trees. Advancing towards Gaza, the view becomes still more interesting; the groves of olive-trees extending to the town, in front of which is a fine avenue of these trees. About a mile distant from the town is a commanding height. The soil in the neighbourhood is of a superior quality. There is much pasture. On the east side of the town is a small gate-way, near to which, it is said, Samson performed his exploit of carrying away the gate of the city; and where he threw down the building which killed him and his adversaries.

The neighbourhood of modern Gaza is described by Captains Irby and Mangles as being richly wooded with olives, sycamores, mulberries, cedars, fir-trees, &c. &c. The country is enclosed with hedges of prickly pears, the hills gently rising to the view beyond each other, and the whole has a beautiful appearance. Excepting the perishable materials, with which the houses are constructed, stone being substituted for mud, the town partakes of the wretched appearance of those in Egypt. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 583, 584; Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 339; Dr. Wittman's Travels in Syria and Egypt, p. 267; Sacred Geography.

GEDALIAH, גְּדַלְיָהוּ, Γεδολίας, signifies God is my greatness, or fringe of the Lord. Gedaliah, son of Ahikam, was left by Nebuchadnezzar in Palestine, after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, (Jer. xl. xli. 2 Kings xxv. 22.) to govern the remainder of the Jewish people, and to gather again those who had fled. Jeremiah retired to him at Mizpah; and many Jews, who had fled into Moab and Ammon came thither also. Gedaliah assured them of Nebuchadnezzar's protection, provided they lived peaceably. Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, of the royal family of Judah, came also to see Gedaliah, who had been informed that Ishmael was sent by Baalis, king of Ammon, to kill him; but Gedaliah would not believe it, nor would permit any one to prevent the designs of Ishmael. He received him at his table, and entertained him; and when the banquet was ended, Ishmael and his associates massacred Gedaliah, and all about him, as well Jews as Chaldeans.

GEHA'ZI, גִּיזִי, signifies valley of sight, or vale of the breast. Gehazi, Elisha's servant, almost continually attended that prophet, and was concerned in whatever happened to him, till, being overcome by avarice, he went in the prophet's name, as if the prophet had sent him, and solicited from Naaman a talent of silver, and two changes of garment.' (2 Kings v. 20, &c.) Naaman gave him two talents. When Gehazi returned, Elisha demanded of him whence he came? Gehazi answered, he had been no where. Elisha said to him, Went not my heart with thee, when thou didst receive money and garments? The leprosy, therefore, of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. Immediately Gehazi was seized with a leprosy, and from that time quitted Elisha. The king of Israel would sometimes cause Gehazi to relate the wonders which God had wrought by Elisha. (2 Kings viii. 4, 5, &c.) See ELISHA.

GEMA'RA. This word signifies completion, perfection. The Rabbins call the Pentateuch the law, without any addition. Next to this they have the Talmud, which is divided into two parts: the first is only an application of the law to particular cases, with the decision of the ancient Rabbins, and is called Mishnah, or second law; the other part, which is a more extensive application of the same law, is a collection of determinations by Rabbins, later than the Mishnah. This last is termed Gemara, perfection, finishing, because they consider it as conclusive explanation of the law, to which no farther additions can be made.

There are two Gemaras, or two Talmuds; that of Jerusalem, and that of Babylon. The former was compiled, according to the Jews, about the end of the second or third century, by a celebrated Rabbini called Jochanan; but father Morinus maintains, that the Gemara was not finished till about the seventh century. Dr. Prideaux says, that it was completed about A. D. 300. The Jews have little value for this Jerusalem Talmud, on account of its obscurity. The Babylonish Gemara is, as the Rabbins say, more modern. It was begun by a Jewish doctor named Asa, and continued by Mar-mar and Mar, his sons or disciples.

The Jews believe that the Gemara contains nothing but the word of God, preserved in the tradition of the elders, and transmitted without alteration, from Moses to Rabbi Judah the Holy, and the other compilers of the Talmud; who did not reduce it to writing till they were afraid it would be corrupted by the several transmigrations and persecutions to which their nation was subjected. Prideaux's Connection, Part i. Book v. p. 470. See TALMUD.

GENEALOGY, from the Greek Γενεαλογία, signifies a list of ancestors. In Hebrew it is called sepher toledoth, liber generationis. The Hebrews carefully preserved their genealogies, and never was a nation more circumspect in such matters. We find genealogies in their sacred writings, carried on above 3500 years.

In the Evangelists we have the genealogy of Christ for four thousand years, from Adam to Joseph his father, or to Mary his mother. The genealogy given by Matthew, was principally designed for the Jews; and it, therefore, traces the pedigree of Christ, as the promised seed, downwards from Abraham to David, and from him, through Solomon's line, to Jacob, the father of Joseph, who was the reputed or legal father of Christ. (Matt. i. 1—16.) That given by Luke was intended for the Gentiles also, and traces the pedigree upwards, from Heli, the father of Mary, to David, through his son Nathan's line, and from David to Abraham, concurring with the former, and from Abraham up to Adam, who was the immediate 'Son of God,' born without father or mother. (Luke iii. 23—38.) It is evident that Luke gives the pedigree of Mary, the real mother of Christ. These ancient genealogies have been handed down to us in rather an imperfect state; and from the collations of Wetstein and Griesbach, it appears that there is a great diversity, both in the names of the several generations, and in the order of some, occurring in the manuscripts now extant. The numbers also of the generations in our present editions do not correspond with those recorded by the early Christian writers, who reckon the amount of Luke's seventy-two or seventy, which at present amount to seventy-seven. This proves that there must have been some interpolations since their time. Hence the learned Grotius, Newcome, Barret, &c. have endeavoured to correct the two genealogies, and to harmonize them together by supplying deficiencies in the one, and retrenching interpolations in the other, by the help of philological criticism, founded upon similarities or different descriptions of names, in the manuscripts, and in the first book of Chronicles. Indeed, there is reason to think with Wetstein, that of the two evangelists, Matthew did not propose to give a full pedigree of our Lord, but to notice only the most remarkable among his ancestors. This appears from his three series of fourteen generations each, which certainly are each of them deficient. If it be asked why the interpolations are confined to Luke's genealogy, it may be answered, that in Matthew's the whole number of generations being limited to forty-two, any interpolation could be easily detected; but in Luke's, the whole number not being specified, interpolations could not be detected, except by comparison with more correct copies. Perhaps, some of the early Christians wished to include their own ancestors in the genealogy of Christ.

It is observed (Ezra ii. 62.) that such priests as were not able to produce an exact genealogy of their families, were not permitted to exercise the sacred functions. Josephus says, that they had, in his nation, an uninterrupted succession of priests for 2000 years; that the priests were particularly careful to preserve their genealogies, not only in Judea, but also in Babylonia and Egypt; and wherever they were, they never married but into their own rank, and they had exact genealogical tables, prepared from those authentic documents which were kept at Jerusalem, and to which they had recourse; that in all their wars, persecutions, and calamities, they always were particularly diligent in securing these documents, and in renewing them from time to time. However, since the war of the Romans against the Jews, about thirty years after the death of our Saviour, and since their entire dispersion in the reign of Adrian, the Jews have lost their ancient genealogies; and perhaps not even one of the sacerdotal race can produce authentic proofs of his genealogy. Jerome says, that the Jews know so perfectly their genealogies, that they could repeat all the names from Abraham to Zerubbabel, as easily as their own. St. Paul seems to condemn this affectation of knowing old genealogies, when used only for ostentation: 'But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.' (Titus iii. 9.)

The genealogies set down by Ezra and Nehemiah vary in some particulars. The reason of this variation is thus assigned by Dr. Prideaux: 'For the true settling of these genealogies,' says he, 'search was made by Nehemiah for old registers, and having among them found a register of the genealogies of those who came up at first from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Joshua, he settled this matter according to it, adding such as afterwards came up, and expunging others whose families were extinguished: and this hath caused the difference between the accounts which we have of these genealogies, in Ezra and Nehemiah. For in the second chapter of Ezra we have the old register made by Zerubbabel; and in the seventh of Nehemiah, from the sixth verse to the end of the chapter, a copy of it, as settled by Nehemiah, with the alterations I have mentioned.' Prid. Connection, &c. Part i. B. vi. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 699.

GENERATION. This word, besides its common acceptation, as signifying descent, is used for the history and genealogy of any man: 'The book of the generations of Adam,' (Gen. v. i.); that is, the history of Adam's creation and of his posterity; 'the generations of the heavens and of the earth,' (Gen. ii. 4.); that is, a recital of the creation of heaven and earth; 'the book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David,' (Matt. i. 1.); that is, the genealogy of Jesus Christ, and the history of his life.

The ancients sometimes computed by generations: 'In the fourth generation, thy descendants shall come hither again.' (Gen. xv. 16.) 'Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation.' (Gen. l. 23.) A bastard shall not be admitted into the congregation 'till the tenth generation.' (Deut. xxiii. 2.) Among the ancients, when the duration of generations was not exactly described by the age of four men succeeding one another from father to son, it was fixed by some at a hundred years, by some at a hundred and ten, by others at thirty-three, thirty, twenty-five, and even at twenty years; being neither uniform nor settled. Only it is remarked, that a generation is so much longer as it is more ancient.

'This generation shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled' (Matth. xxiv. 34.); that is, some are now living, who shall be witnesses of the event foretold. 'O faithless and perverse generation!' 'Save yourselves from this unward generation,' from these perverse men. 'To generation and generation;' that is, to future ages.

GEN'ESIS, the first book of Scripture. It is called in Greek Γένεσις, genesis, or generation, because it contains the genealogy of the first patriarchs; in Hebrew, bereschith, because it begins with that word. It comprehends the history of at least 2369 years; from the beginning of the world to the death of the patriarch Joseph. It contains an account of the creation of the world, and its first inhabitants; the original innocence and fall of man; the rise of religion; the invention of arts; the general corruption and degeneracy of mankind; the universal deluge; the re-peopling and division of the earth; the origin of nations and kingdoms; and a particular history of the patriarchs from Adam to the death of Joseph. It is the most ancient history in the world; and from the great variety of its singular details, and most interesting accounts, is as far superior in its value and importance to all others, as it is in its antiquity.

If it be asked, how a detail so circumstantial and minute could have been preserved, unless there had been writings of some kind, especially as the earth, whose history is here given, had already existed more than 2000 years? To this it may be answered, that, if in the antediluvian world no writing of any kind existed, tradition would answer every purpose to which alphabetical characters could be subservient. It was easy for Moses to be satisfied of the truth of all he relates, as the accounts came to him through the medium of very few persons. From Adam to Noah, one man only was necessary to the correct transmission of the history of this period of 1656 years. This history was without doubt perfectly known to Methuselah, who lived to see them both. In like manner, Shem connected Noah and Abraham, having lived to converse with both; as Isaac did with Abraham and Joseph, from whom these things might be easily conveyed to Moses by Amram, who was contemporary with Joseph. If then all the interesting facts recorded in the book of Genesis had no other authority than the tradition already referred to, they would rest on a foundation of credibility superior to any that the most reputable of the ancient Greek and Roman historians can boast. But, to preclude every possibility of mistake, the unerring Spirit of God directed Moses in the selection of his facts, and the ascertaining of his dates. Indeed, the narrative is so simple; so much resembling truth; so consistent every where with itself; so correct in its dates; so impartial in its biography; so accurate in its philosophical details; so pure in its morality; and so benevolent in its design; as amply to demonstrate that it never could have had an earthly origin. Dr. Adam Clarke's Preface to Genesis; Broughton's Dictionary, vol. i. p. 440.

GENTILE. The Hebrews called the Gentiles, גוים Goiim, גויות, the nations; that is, those who have not received the faith, or law of God. All who are not Jews and circumcised, are Goiim. Those who were converted, and embraced Judaism, were called proselytes. Since the Gospel, the true religion is not confined, as before, to any one nation and country. God who had promised, by his prophets, to call the Gentiles to the faith, with a superabundance of grace hath executed His promise. Hence, the Christian church is composed principally of Gentile converts; and the Jews, too proud of their particular privileges, and abandoned to their reprobate sense of things, have disowned Jesus Christ, their Messiah and Redeemer, for whom, during so many ages, they had impatiently wished. In the writings of St. Paul, the Gentiles are generally denoted as Greeks. (Rom. i. 14. 16.; ii. 9, 10.; x. 12. 1 Cor. i. 22. 24. Gal. iii. 28.) St. Luke expresses himself in the same manner. (Acts vi. 1.; xi. 20.; xviii. 4.; et al.) Paul is commonly called the apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 8.) or the Greeks, because principally to them he preached Jesus Christ; but as Peter, and the other apostles, preached generally to the Jews, they are styled 'apostles of the circumcision.' (Gal. ii. 7.)

The prophets declared in a very particular manner the calling of the Gentiles. Jacob foretold, that when Shiloh, or the Messiah, should come, to him should the gathering of the people be. Solomon, after the dedication of his temple, prays for the stranger who in it should entreat God. The Psalmist says, that the Lord shall give the Gentiles to the Messiah for an inheritance; (Ps. ii. 8.) that Egypt and Babylon shall know him; (Ps. lxxxvii. 4.) that Ethiopia shall hasten to bring him presents; (Ps. lxxii. 9, 10.) and that the kings of Tarshish, and of the isles, the kings of Arabia and Sheba, shall be tributary to him. Isaiah abounds with prophecies of a like nature, and hence he has been justly styled the evangelical prophet.

In the New Testament, we see that Gentiles came to Jerusalem to worship. Some of these, a little before the death of our Saviour, addressed themselves to Philip, and desired them to show him Jesus. (John xii. 20, 21.) Queen Candace's eunuch, who came to Jerusalem, was likewise a Gentile, as some think. (Acts viii. 27.)

GERIZIM, גרזים, signifies safeties, or cuttings; that is, by reapers. Gerizim was the name of a mount near Shechem, in Ephraim, a province of Samaria. Shechem was situated at the foot of two mountains, Ebal and Gerizim. Gerizim was fruitful; Ebal, barren. Maundrell observes, that neither Ebal nor Gerizim has much to boast of with respect to pleasantness; but that Gerizim appears to discover a rather more verdant, fruitful aspect than Ebal. The reason of this may be, that Gerizim, fronting the north, is in some respects sheltered from the sun by its own shade, or declivity; and that Ebal, having a southern sun, is scorched.

God commanded that the Hebrews, after passing the Jordan, should go to the mountains Ebal and Gerizim; and should be divided in such a manner, that six tribes might be stationed upon Mount Gerizim, and six upon Mount Ebal. The former were to pronounce blessings on those who observed the law of the Lord; the latter curses against those who should violate it. (Deut. xi. 29.; xxvii. 12.) It is probable, however, that the blessings or curses were not pronounced upon either mountain, but only on the sides of the valley adjacent to those mountains.

The Samaritans maintain, that Abraham and Jacob erected altars at Gerizim; and that here Abraham prepared to sacrifice his son Isaac. (Gen. xii. 6. 7.; xiii. 4.; xxxiii. 20.) They add, that God required the blessings to be given from Mount Gerizim, and his curses from Ebal; that Joshua's altar upon Gerizim is in being at this day: and that Mount Gerizim, on account of its beauty and fertility, was chosen as the place of blessing. They quote from their Bible as follows: 'When ye be gone over Jordan, ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in Mount Gerizim (in the Hebrew copies mount Ebal,) and thou shalt plaister them,' &c. (Deut. xxvii. 4. 12. 13.) The same in Exod. xx. 18. Hence it is generally supposed, that the text has been corrupted, either by the Jews, who substituted Ebal for Gerizim, or by the Samaritans, who substituted Gerizim for Ebal. Yet, both the Jewish and Samaritan copies of the Pentateuch might be correct in their seemingly opposite readings of Gerizim and Ebal. We have only to reflect, that the Hebrew particle used, is taken with a latitude, and that the person speaking did not strictly stand upon these mountains, but at them, that is, in the edge of the valley between them. A person who pronounces a blessing from the place where he stands, blesses the part opposite to him, rather than that upon which he stands. Hence, a number might stand at, adjacent to, against Ebal, to bless, as the Jewish copies say; but their blessing would be directed to Gerizim, which would be the Mount of Blessings, as the Samaritan copies say. In fact, it is extremely probable, that the altar, &c. stood in the valley between both mountains, and not on the upper parts of either. (Deut. xi. 29.)

A temple was built upon Gerizim, and consecrated to the God of Israel, in the year of the world 3672; and as the mountain was very high, many steps were cut for the convenience of the people. When Antiochus Epiphanes began to persecute the Jews, the Samaritans intreated him that their temple upon Mount Gerizim, which had hitherto been dedicated to an unknown and nameless God, might be consecrated to Jupiter, the Grecian. This was easily consented to by Antiochus. It is certain, that in the time of our Saviour, this temple was in being; and that the true God was there worshipped, as the woman of Samaria, pointing to Gerizim, said to him, 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship.' (John iv. 20.) We are assured, that Herod the Great having rebuilt Samaria, and called it Sebaste, in honour of Augustus, would have obliged the Samaritans to worship in the temple which he had erected; but they constantly refused, and have continued to this day to worship God upon this mountain. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary; Maundrell's Travels, p. 60; Sacred Geography.

GIANT, in Hebrew נָפִיל nophel, or נִפְלִים nephilim, in Greek γίγας, which may signify a monster, a terrible man, who beats and bears down other men. Some think, that the word nephilim denotes those who had apostatized or fallen from the true religion. Mr. Parkhurst is of opinion, that it means such as fall upon others, assaulters, violent. Thus, Aquila translates nephilim. ἐπιπίπτοντες, irruentes, men who attack, who fall with impetuosity on their enemies; and this renders very well the force of the term. Symmachus translates βίαιοι, violent men, cruel, whose only rule of action is violence and force.

The Scripture calls giants sometimes Rephaim: Chedorlaomer beat the Rephaim at Ashteroth-Karnaim. (Gen. xiv. 5.) The Emim, ancient inhabitants of the land of Moab, were of a gigantic stature, that is Rephaim. The Rephaim and the Perizzites are connected as ancient inhabitants of Canaan. Job says, that the ancient Rephaim groan under the waters. Solomon says, that the ways of a debauched woman lead to the Rephaim, (Prov. ii. 18.; ix. 18.) that he who deviates from the ways of wisdom, shall dwell in the assembly of giants, Rephaim, in hell. (Prov. xxi. 16.) The Anakim, or sons of Anak, were the most famous giants of Palestine. They dwelt at Hebron, and in that neighbourhood. The Israelites sent to view the promised land, reported, that, in comparison, they themselves were only grasshoppers. (Num. xiii. 33.)

The Septuagint sometimes translate gibbor, gigas, though literally it signifies a strong man, a man of valour, a warrior. Thus, they say, that Nimrod was a giant before the Lord; that the sun rises like a giant to run its course; that the Lord will destroy the giants, and the warlike man; that he will call his giants in his wrath, to take vengeance on his enemies; that he will destroy the power of Egypt by the sword of his giants. It is also observable, that our English translators have rendered six different Hebrew words by the one term giants; nephilim, gibborim, enachim, rephayim, emim, and zuzim. By these appellatives are probably meant, in general, persons of great courage, wickedness, &c., and not men of enormous stature, as is commonly supposed.

With respect to the existence of giants, several writers, both ancient and modern, have imagined that the giants of Scripture were indeed men of extraordinary stature; but not so much so as those have fancied, who describe them as three or four times larger than men are at present. They were, say they, men famous for their violences and crimes, rather than for their strength or stature. But it cannot be denied, that there have been men of a stature much above that common at present. Moses (Deut. iii. 11.) speaks of the bed of Og, king of Basan, as nine cubits long and four wide, fifteen feet four inches in length. Goliath was six cubits and a span in height; ten feet seven inches, or, as Mr. Parkhurst contends, nine feet six inches. (1 Sam. xvii. 4.) Giants were still common in the times of Joshua, and of David, when the life of man was already shortened, and, as may be presumed, the size and strength of human bodies was proportionably diminished.

Pliny relates, that a man named Gabara, brought out of Arabia, in the days of Claudius, was nine feet nine inches high. In the time of Augustus Caesar, were two persons called Idusio and Secundilla, each of whom were ten feet high. Vitellius sent Darius, the son of Artabanus, an hostage to Rome, with divers presents, among which was a man seven cubits, or ten feet two inches high, a Jew born; he was named Eleazer, and was called a giant, by reason of his greatness. Merula, who succeeded Justus Lipsius as professor of history in the university of Leyden, asserts that, A.D. 1583, he himself saw in France a Fleming who exceeded nine feet in height. Delrio affirms, that in 1572, he saw at Rohan a native of Piedmont above nine feet high. Calmet says, that in 1719, near Salisbury in England, a human skeleton was found, which was nine feet four inches long. Becanus saw a man near ten feet, and a woman full ten feet high. O'Brien, who, a few years ago, was exhibited in England, under the name of 'the Irish Giant,' measured eight feet six or eight inches when living, and two or three inches more when dead. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary; Parkhurst's Heb. Lexicon, pp. 24, 25, 458; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment on Gen. vi. 4.

GIB'EAH, גִּבְעָה, signifies the hill, or high place; elevation. The most considerable city of this name was Gibeah of Benjamin. It gave birth to Saul, the first king of Israel; and hence it is frequently called Gibeah of Saul. (Josh. xviii. 24. Ezra ii. 26. Nehem. vii. 30.) It is also famous for its sins, particularly for that committed by forcing the young Levite's wife, who was come to lodge at Gibeah; and for the war which succeeded it, to the almost extermination of the tribe of Benjamin. (Judg. xix.) The Scripture remarks, that this happened at a time when there was no king in Israel; but every one did that which was right in his own eyes. This city was situated north of Jerusalem twenty or thirty furlongs.

Some are of opinion, that Gibeah of Benjamin was a different place from Gibeah of Saul. It is observed, that the attention employed by the sacred writers to distinguish them, appears to be intended to establish this difference. Thus, we read (1 Sam. xiii. 15.) that Samuel went up to Gibeah of Benjamin; but (xv. 34.) 'Saul went up to his house (palace) to Gibeah of Saul.' Hence, it is thought that this palace probably distinguished Gibeah of Saul, though not far from Gibeah of Benjamin. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 10.

GIB'EON, גִּבְעֹן, signifies a high hill. It was the capital city of the Gibeonites, who took advantage of the oaths of Joshua, and of the elders of Israel, procured by an artful representation of their belonging to a very remote country. (Josh. ix.) Some have thought, that in this they spoke truth, as their ancestors were settlers from the east, who followed those tribes from India, which overran Canaan as well as Egypt. Thus the Gibeonites mingled fact with their guile, and spoke truth, but not the whole truth. Joshua and the elders had not the precaution to consult God on this affair; but inconsiderately entered into a league with this people. The Israelites soon discovered their mistake, and, without revoking their promise of giving them their lives, they condemned them to labour in carrying wood and water for the tabernacle, and to other works of women, as a mark of their pusillanimity and duplicity, as slaves and captives. In this state of servitude the Gibeonites remained till the entire dispersion of the Jewish nation. Three days after the Gibeonites had surrendered to the Hebrews, the kings of Canaan being informed of it, five of them came and besieged the city of Gibeon. The Gibeonites requested the aid of Joshua, who attacked the five kings early in the morning, put them to flight, and pursued them to Bethoron. (Josh. x. 3, &c.)

The Gibeonites were descended from the Hivites, the old inhabitants of the country, and possessed four cities; Cephirah, Beeroth, Kirjath-jearim, and Gideon, their capital, all afterwards given to Benjamin, except Kirjath-jearim, which fell to Judah. The Gibeonites continued subject to those burdens which Joshua imposed on them, and were very faithful to the Israelites. Yet Saul, through some mistaken zeal, destroyed a very great number of them; (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) but God, as a punishment of his cruelty, sent, in the reign of David, a great famine, which lasted three years. The prophets told David, that this calamity would continue so long as that cruelty remained unavenged, which Saul had exercised against the Gibeonites. David asked the Gibeonites, what satisfaction they desired? They answered, We will put to death seven of Saul's sons, to avenge the blood of our brethren. The Gibeonites crucified them before the Lord. From this time the Gibeonites are not mentioned, as forming a sort of separate people. Many commentators are of opinion, that they were included among the Nethinim, who were public slaves appointed for the service of the temple. (1 Chron. ix. 2.)

It is not known when, or by whom, or on what occasion, the tabernacle and altar of burnt-sacrifices, made by Moses in the wilderness, were removed to Gibeon; but it is certain, that, toward the end of David's reign, and in the beginning of Solomon's, they were at that place. (1 Chron. xxi. 29, 30.) David, seeing the angel of the Lord at Araunah's threshing-floor, was so terrified, that he had not time nor strength to go so far as Gibeon, there to offer sacrifice. But Solomon being seated on the throne, went to sacrifice at Gibeon, because this was the most considerable of all the high places, where sacrifices were then tolerated, the temple not being yet built. (1 Kings iii. 4.) Calmet's Dictionary; Sacred Geography.

GID'EON, גִּדְעוֹן, signifies he that bruises and breaks; otherwise, cutting off iniquity. Gideon was the son of Joash, of the tribe of Manasseh. He dwelt in the city of Ophrah, and had a very extraordinary call, to deliver Israel from the oppression of the Midianites. After the deaths of Barak and Deborah, (Judg. vi. 1, 2,) the Midianites so distressed the Hebrews, that they were forced to flee into caves, from the year of the world 2752 to 2759. Israel, overwhelmed with misfortunes, cried to the Lord, who deputed a prophet to them, who reproached them sharply with their ingratitude. At the same time, God sent his angel to Gideon, who was threshing out his corn privately, near a winepress, under an oak, to conceal from the Midianites what he was doing, and to be able to flee away immediately with his corn, as soon as they appeared. Bishop Patrick observes, that it is plain from the incommunicable name Jehovah, which the angel here assumes, and by which he suffers himself to be called, that he was not a mere angel; and hence the Jews, according to their Targum, which styles him the Word of the Lord, consider this angel not merely as a heavenly messenger, but as the Son of God Himself, in the form of an angel. The angel saluted Gideon, and said, The Lord is with thee! thou mighty man of valour. Gideon hesitated; but the angel answered, Go, in this thy might, thou shalt save Israel from the Midianites. Gideon excused himself; but the Lord said to him, I will be with thee, and thou shalt beat the Midianites, as if they were but one man. Gideon asked a sign of him, that he might be convinced it was no delusion; he made ready a kid and unleavened cakes, which he brought and presented to him. The angel said, Put them on this rock, and pour out the broth. Then the angel, with the end of the staff that was in his hand, touched the flesh and unleavened cakes; fire issued out of the rock, and consumed them. The angel disappeared. Gideon exclaimed, Alas! O Lord God, for I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face. The Lord said to him, Fear not, thou shalt not die. In that same place he erected an altar to the Lord, which he called, the peace of the Lord. The night following, God commanded him to cut down the grove, and the altar of Baal, to build an altar to the Lord upon the top of the rock, where he had lately offered, and to make a burnt-sacrifice of one of his father's two bullocks. Gideon obeyed. The next day, the inhabitants of Ophrah told Joash, that Gideon must be slain, for this affront offered to Baal. Joash answered, Are ye to defend Baal? If Baal be God, let him avenge himself. From that time, Gideon was called Jerobaal, that is, let Baal see, or let Baal contest with him, who has thrown down his altar.

The Midianites came and encamped in the valley of Jezreel; and Gideon assembled the Israelites of the house of Abiezer, who dwelt nearest to him; also Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Gideon, to assure them that God intended their deliverance, prayed for a sign, that God would let the dew fall on a piece of wool, spread on the ground, while all around was dry. After this, he desired another sign, quite the contrary, that the fleece of wool should remain dry, while all the earth about it abounded with dew. As the militia assembled on this occasion were too numerous, the Lord, 'lest the people should vaunt themselves against him,' or ascribe the victory to their own numbers or valour, directed Gideon to dismiss all the eastern Manassites, who came from Mount Gilead, and might possibly be more afraid of their neighbours, the Midianites, than the western tribes. The passage may be thus more correctly rendered, by a slight transposition of the English translation, (Judg. vii. 3.): 'Whosoever, from Mount Gilead, is fearful and afraid, let him return (home) and depart early. So there returned (home) twenty-two thousand of the people.' Ten thousand only remained with him. The Lord next dismissed all the people that stooped to drink water with their mouths at the surface; and he retained only three hundred men who lapped, or took up water in the palms of their hands to drink.

Gideon ordered these three hundred to hold themselves in readiness, and gave to each a trumpet, a lamp or light, and an empty pitcher to conceal that light. Stealing over to the enemies' camp, he heard a Midianite relating his dream, of a cake of barley-bread, which, rolling into the camp of Midian, overset a tent (rather the tent, the general's tent.) The hearer replied, This is the sword of Gideon. Gideon returned to his people, encouraged them, bid them take their lamps, their pitchers, and their trumpets, and do as they should see him do. He divided them into three companies, of one hundred men each; which advanced three different ways towards the camp of the Midianites. At the beginning of the second, or middle watch, at midnight, on a signal given by Gideon, the three companies blew their trumpets, broke their pitchers, showed their lights, and shouted, 'The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon,' and stood every man in his place; as if they were the advanced guard of the whole army of Israel, whom they were lighting to attack the camp. All the host of the enemy 'ran, and cried, and fled' through the openings between the three companies, and, in their panic terror, put each other to the sword. The neighbouring tribes of Manasseh, Asher, and Naphtali, came in and pursued them. Gideon, with his three hundred warriors, passed the Jordan, followed the Midianites to Succoth and Penuel, (Judg. viii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) defeated them, took their two kings, Zeba and Zalmunna, and returned towards Succoth and Penuel before sun-set. As these two cities had refused to supply him with provisions and refreshment, when he passed them in pursuit of the enemy, at his return he took a terrible vengeance on them. He put Zeba and Zalmunna to death, and took away the golden ornaments (crescents), which were about their camels' necks, and which were probably consecrated to the moon, who was worshipped in that neighbourhood, before the time of Abraham, under the title of Ashtaroth Karnaim, 'the shining cow two-horned.' (Gen. xiv. 5.)

After this victory, Israel said to Gideon, 'Rule thou over us.' Gideon answered, 'I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you, the Lord shall rule over you.' But 'give me every man the ear-rings of his prey;' for the Midianites were accustomed to wear gold pendants at their ears. Of these Gideon made an ephod, and placed it in the city of Ophrah. This ephod seems to have included not only the priest's dress, but also a sacerdotal establishment in his own town; and this establishment, infringing on that at Shiloh, (Judg. viii. 27.) proved a 'snare to Gideon and his family,' or a seduction to idolatry, in worshipping the true God in an improper manner. It appears also, that 'all Israel went thither a whoring after it;' as they did after Gideon's death, relapsing into the worship of false gods.

Calmet says, that Gideon judged Israel nine years, from the year of the world

2759 to 2768. Dr. Hales says, that Gideon's administration lasted forty years; and he dates the commencement of his administration in the year before Christ 1359. Gideon had seventy sons, born of many wives, whom he had married; and besides these, he had another, Abimelech, the son of a concubine, who reigned three years at Shechem. It has been observed, that the Spirit of the Lord, by which Gideon was animated to undertake the deliverance of his country, was a spirit of fortitude and of prudence, and of all the virtues requisite in a commander. (Judg. vi. 7—40.) Gideon was a consummate judge; he possessed all the qualifications requisite for that arduous station among a contumacious, a divided, and a rebellious people.

It is very probable, that Gideon, or Jerobaal, or Jerubaal, is the Jerombal, priest to the god Jao, whom Sanchoniathon declares he consulted concerning the Phœnician antiquities. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 310, &c.

GI'HON, גִּיחֹן, signifies the breast, or eduction, or issue: otherwise, the valley of favour; or of the mansion. Gihon was the name of one of the four rivers, whose sources were in Paradise. (Gen. ii. 13.) Many have believed, without any probability, that this was the Nile. The Arabians believe, generally, that this is the Oxur, a river which rises in the mountains of Imaus, and runs from east to west: when it comes near the country of Choraruem, it winds much; but it afterwards returns, and discharges itself into the Caspian Sea, westward. Modern geographers call the Oxur Abiamu, the river Amu; the Arabians name it Gehon, and Neher-Balkh, the river of Balk, because it passes through that city: might it be the Nilab of India? Some, as Calvin, Scaliger, &c., think that Gihon is the most western channel of the two formed by the Tigris and Euphrates, when, after their conflux, they separate again to enter the sea. Some, as Bochart, Huetius, Wells, &c., are of opinion that Pison is the western, and Gihon the eastern channel, which skirts a rich and fertile land, 'the land of Cush,' now Chusistan, or Chuzestan, formerly called Susiana, or Asiatic Ethiopia. Some, as Reland, Calmet, &c., think that Gihon is the Araxes, which has its source, as well as the Tigris and Euphrates, in the mountains of Armenia, and, running with almost incredible rapidity, falls into the Caspian Sea. Captain Wilford supposes the Gihon to be the Hermund, the country of which is the original land of Cusha of the *Purânu*s, which begins at the Candahar, and includes part of Iran, or Persia. A late writer thinks, that the Gihon is the western branch of the Oxus. Asiatic Researches, vol. vi.; Sacred Geography; Geograph. Excurs. pp. 2, 3; Hales's New Analy-

GIL'EAD, גִּלְעָד, signifies the heap, round, (rather circle,) of witness; the name given to the monument erected by Laban and Jacob, in testimony of a mutual covenant and agreement. (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48.) Hence the hill upon which it was erected, was called Mount Gilead. (Cant. iv. 1.; vi. 5. Jer. l. 19.) The mountains of Gilead were part of that ridge of mountains which extend from Mount Lebanon southward, on the east of the Holy Land; they gave their name to the whole country which lies on the east of the sea of Galilee, and included the mountainous region called in the New Testament Trachonitis.

The Scripture speaks highly in commendation of the balm of Gilead. (Jer. viii. 22.; xlv. 11.; li. 8.) The merchants who bought Joseph, came from Gilead, and were carrying balm into Egypt. (Gen. xxxvii. 25.) If the zori of the Hebrew text be the same as the balsam of Mecca, it will prove the balsam-tree to have been in Gilead long before it was planted in the gardens of Jericho, and before the queen of Sheba brought that root of it to king Solomon, which Josephus mentions. For the Ishmaelites traded with it from Gilead to Egypt, when Joseph was sold to them by his brethren. It seems, however, most likely, that the zori of Gilead, rendered in our English Bible by the word balm, was not the same with the balsam of Mecca, but only a better sort of turpentine, then in use for curing wounds and other diseases. The word zori appears to be a general name for gums and resins issuing from shrubs and trees. Parkhurst's Heb. and English Lexicon, p. 629; Prideaux's Connect. part ii. book vi.; Wells's Geog. vol. i.; p. 181; Sacred Geography.

GIL'GAL, גִּלְגָּל, signifies a wheel or revolution, or heap of heaps, or revolution of the heaps. Gilgal was a celebrated place, west of the Jordan, where the Israelites encamped, after their passage of this river. A considerable city was afterwards built there, which became famous for many events. Gilgal was situated between Jordan and Jericho, and about two miles from the former. This name was given to it, because here circumcision was renewed. (Josh. v. 2.) The Lord said, 'This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt, (that is, uncircumcision) from off you,' &c. Gilgal signifies rolling. Here Joshua pitched the twelve stones, which were taken out of Jordan, by one man of every tribe. As the ark was long at Gilgal, this place became celebrated, and the people continued to go thither in pilgrimage. It is thought that Jeroboam, or some king of Israel, his successor, set up there one of the golden calves. (Hos. iv. 15.; xii. 11.; Amos iv. 4.; v. 5.)

There had been idols, perhaps, at Gilgal, so early as the time of Ehud, judge of Israel: for it is said, (Judg. iii. 19.) that Ehud having made his presents to the king, went away as far as Gilgal; that he returned from thence, and pretended to have some secret message to him from God, as if he had received some oracle at Gilgal. Here the people met to confirm the kingdom to Saul, (1 Sam. xi. 14, 15.); here Saul incurred God's displeasure, by offering sacrifices before Samuel came, (1 Sam. xiii. 8.); and here he received the sentence of his rejection for sparing the king of Amalek, with the best of the spoils. (1 Sam. xv. 26.) Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 290.

GIRDLE. The Hebrews generally wore no girdle in the house, or abroad, unless when at work, or on a journey. At these times, they girt their clothes about them, as the eastern people do at this day. This appears from many passages of the Old and New Testament. Our Saviour preparing himself to wash the feet of his disciples, 'girt himself about with a towel.' (John xiii. 4, 5.) Soldiers also had their belts generally girt about them: 'Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle.' (Ps. xviii. 39.)

Belts were often made of precious stuff. The virtuous wife made rich girdles, and sold them to the Canaanites, that is, the Phœnician merchants. (Prov. xxxi. 24.) These girdles were used by both men and women: the women's are more frequently called zonæ. The value of them may be estimated by the kings of Persia giving, sometimes, cities and provinces to their wives for the expense of their girdles. Our Lord, in the Revelations, (i. 13.) appeared to St. John with a golden girdle. The seven angels who came out of the temple, were clothed with linen, and girt about with golden girdles. On the contrary, the prophets, and persons secluded from the world, wore girdles of skin, or leather. The prophet Elijah had one of this sort, as well as John the Baptist. (2 Kings i. 8. Matt. iii. 4.) In times of mourning, they used girdles of ropes, as marks of sorrow and humiliation. Isaiah (iii. 24.) threatens the daughters of Sion, who had offended by the excess of their ornaments, to reduce them to the wearing of sackcloth and cord-girdles. He also (xxii. 12.) menaces Jerusalem with bringing her into captivity, with cutting off her hair, the instrument of her pride, and obliging her to gird herself with sackcloth.

The military girdle, or belt, did not come over the shoulder, as among the Greeks, but was worn upon the loins; whence the expression of 'sword girded on the loins.' These belts were generally rich, and sometimes given as rewards to soldiers. Joab tells the soldier who had seen Absalom hanging on a tree, that 'if he had smitten him to the ground, he would have given him ten shekels of silver, and a girdle.' (2 Sam. xviii. 11.) Jonathan, the son of Saul, made David a present of his girdle. (1 Sam. xviii. 4.) Job (xii. 18.) exalting the power of God, says 'He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle;' where we observe two kinds of girdles: 1. the royal cincture; 2. the ordinary girdle.

For the priests' girdle, see PRIESTS.

The girdle was used as a purse. Our Saviour forbids his apostles to carry money in their girdles. (Matt. x. 9.)

GIRGASHITES, or GERGESENES, גִּרְגָּשִׁים, Γεργεσαῖοι, signifies who arrives from pilgrimage. The Girgashites were an ancient people of the land of Canaan, beyond the sea of Tiberias; we find traces of their name in the city Gergesa. The Jerusalem writers say, that when Joshua came and proclaimed, 'He that will go out hence, let him go,' the Girgashites withdrew into Africa. Yet it is certain that many of them remained, as Joshua (xxiv. 11.) informs us, that he subdued the Girgashites. Dr. Wells is of opinion, that the Girgashites were a very small nation; and that, as they are seldom mentioned, they were comprehended very probably under the name of Hivites. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 161; Sacred Geography.

GLORY of GOD, in Moses, denotes, commonly, the divine presence; as when He appeared upon Mount Sinai; or the bright cloud which declared His presence, descended on the tabernacle of the congregation. (Exod. xxiv. 9, 10, 16, 17.) Moses, with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders of Israel, went up Mount Sinai, and saw the glory of the Lord. The glory of the Lord was, as it were, a burning fire upon the mountain; all under His feet was, as it were, the brightness of the sapphire-stone, resembling heaven itself in clearness. All this must have been only an appearance, unconnected with any personal similitude. The glory of the Lord appeared also (Exod. xvi. 7, 10.) to Israel in the cloud, when He gave them manna and quails. It appears, that the glory of the Lord is here spoken of as something distinct from the Lord; for it is said HE, namely the glory, 'heareth your murmurings against the Lord.' It is probable that, as the words of St. Paul, (Heb. i. 3.) 'Who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person,' &c. are spoken of the Lord Jesus, so the words of Moses refer also to Him. As no man hath seen God at any time, we may infer, that Christ was the visible agent, in all the extraordinary and miraculous interferences which took place in both the patriarchal times, and under the law. Moses having earnestly begged of God, to reveal His glory to him, (Exod. xxxiii. 18—22.) God said, 'thou canst not see my face, for no man is able to support the brightness of that without dying; but I will place thee in a cleft of the rock, and when my glory shall pass before it, I will cover thee with my hand, and thou shalt see my back parts, train, rear, termination of glory, but my face shall not be seen.' Some think it probable, that this alludes to the appearance which God should assume in after times, when it should be said, 'God is manifest in the flesh;' and that John had this in view when he said, 'We beheld his glory.' Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exodus.

GNOSTICS. This name does not occur in the sacred writings; but the apostles Peter and Paul, in their Epistles, frequently attacked the heretics of their time, who were afterwards known by this name; or, at least, those principles which afterwards produced the Gnostic heresy. Paul gives us a description of certain ancient heretics, who very much resembled them. (2 Tim. iii. 2, 3, &c.)

However, the Gnostics did not render themselves conspicuous, either for their numbers or reputation, till the time of Adrian. They obtained their name from boasting of their being able to restore mankind to the knowledge (γνώσις) of the Supreme Being, which had been so long lost. They blended with the faith of Christ many sublime but obscure tenets, which they derived from the oriental philosophy. The sages of the East had long expected a heavenly messenger, endued with sufficient power to release them from their bondage to corrupt matter, which they held to be the source of all evil. The miracles of Christ and his apostles induced them readily to accept Him as this heavenly messenger; and they interpreted all the precepts of Christianity in the manner most agreeable to the absurd opinions which they had previously conceived. They introduced among their followers a multitude of absurd legends respecting the actions and precepts of Christ, and of the creation of the world by inferior beings. These opinions were so entirely dissonant to many parts of both the Old and New Testament, that they rejected much of these books, though they admitted the validity of a few parts. From the belief that whatever is corporeal is in itself intrinsically evil, they denied that Christ was invested with a real body or that he really suffered for the sake of mankind. As the Son of the Supreme God, they indeed consented to regard him; but they considered him as inferior in his nature, and believed that his mission on earth was designed to rescue the virtuous soul from the tyranny of wicked spirits, whose empire he was to destroy, and to instruct men to raise the mind from its corporeal impurity to a blessed unity with the Supreme God.

Far removed from the path of truth, it is not surprising that the Gnostics, having no certain rule to guide their steps, should separate, and wander into the manifold intricacies of error. Accordingly, we find these heretics were not only divided into many sects, differing in their various rules of religious faith, but in matters which related to practice. Whilst the more rigid sects rejected the most innocent gratifications, that the body might not be so nourished as to degrade the soul; their more relaxed brethren considered the soul as entirely unaffected by the actions of the body, asserted the innocence of complying with every dictate of nature, and abandoned themselves without any restraint to the impulse of the passions. Their persuasion that evil resided in matter, led them to reject the doctrine of the resurrection of their body; and their belief in the power of malevolent genii, the sources of every earthly calamity, induced them to have recourse to the study of magic to weaken or avert the influence of those malignant agents. Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. i. pp. 57, 58; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. pp. 107, &c.; Adams's View of Religions, p. 158.

GOAT. In Leviticus (xvii. 7.) God commands to bring all animals designed to be sacrificed, to the door of the tabernacle: 'And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils;' literally, to the hairy ones, to goats. Jeroboam ordained him priests for the high places, and for the devils, (goats,) and for the calves which he had made.' (2 Chron. xi. 15.) The famous heathen god, Pan, was represented as having the posteriors, horns, and ears of a goat; and the Mendesians, a people of Egypt, had a deity, which they worshipped under this form. Herodotus says, that all goats were worshipped in Egypt, but the he-goat in particular. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Levit. xxvii. 7; Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, pp. 758, 759.

SCAPE GOAT, the goat which was set at liberty on the day of solemn expiation. See AZAZEL.

GOD. This name we give to that eternal, infinite, and incomprehensible Being, the Creator of all things; who preserves and governs all by his almighty power and wisdom, and is the only proper object of worship. God, properly speaking, can have no name: for as he is one, and not subject to those individual qualities which distinguish men, and upon which are founded the different denominations given to them, he needs not any name to distinguish him from other gods, or to put a difference between him and any, since there is none like him. The names, therefore, which we ascribe to him, are descriptions or epithets, which express his divine qualities, in terms necessarily ambiguous, because they are borrowed from human life, or human conceptions, rather than true names which justly represent his nature.

The Hebrews call God Jehovah, which they never pronounce. Instead of it they say Adonai, or Elohim, lords, masters; or El, strong; or Shaddai, self-sufficient; or according to another pronunciation, the Destroyer, the Powerful One; or Elion, the Most High; or El sebaoth, God of Hosts; or Jah, God. In Exodus, (iii. 14.) the angel who spoke to Moses, said, 'Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you;' I am He who is, or I shall be He who shall be. See JEHOVAH.

A late writer observes, that 'a general definition of this great First Cause, as far as human words dare attempt one, may be thus given. The eternal, independent, and self-existent Being: The Being whose purposes and actions spring from himself, without foreign motive or influence: He who is absolute in dominion: the most pure, most simple, and most spiritual of all essences: infinitely benevolent, beneficent, true, and holy: the cause of all being, the upholder of all things: infinitely happy, because infinitely perfect: and eternally self-sufficient, needing nothing that he has made. Illimitable in his immensity, inconceivable in his mode of existence, and undescrivable in his essence: known fully only to himself, because an infinite mind can be fully apprehended only by itself. In a word, a Being who, from his infinite wisdom, cannot err, or be deceived; and who, from his infinite goodness, can do nothing but what is eternally just, right, and kind.'

God, says Sir Isaac Newton, is a relative term, and has respect to servants. It denotes, indeed, an eternal, infinite, absolutely perfect Being; but such a being, without dominion, would not be God. The word God frequently signifies Lord; but every lord is not God. The dominion of a spiritual being constitutes God: a true, supreme, or imaginary dominion constitutes a true, supreme, or imaginary God. From such true dominion it follows, that the true God is a living, intelligent, and powerful Being; and from his other perfections, that he is supreme, or most perfect. He is eternal and infinite, omnipotent and omniscient; that is, he endures from eternity to eternity, and is present from infinity to infinity. He governs all things that exist, and knows all things that are to be known. He is not eternity or infinity, but eternal and infinite. He is not duration or space; but he endures and is present. He endures for ever, and is every where present; and by existing always and every where, he constitutes duration and space, eternity and infinity.

He is omnipresent not only virtually, but substantially; for power cannot subsist without substance. All things are contained and move in him, but without any mutual passion; that is, he suffers nothing from the motions of bodies, and bodies experience no resistance from his omnipresence. It is allowed, that God exists necessarily; and by the same necessity he exists always and every where. Hence, also, he must be perfectly similar: all eye, all ear, all brain, all arm, all perception, intelligence, and action; but in a manner not at all human, not at all corporeal, and in a manner altogether unknown to us. He is destitute of all body and bodily shape, and cannot, therefore, be heard, seen, or touched; nor ought he to be worshipped under the representation of any thing corporeal. We know him only by his properties, or attributes, by his most wise and excellent structure of things, and by final causes. We admire him for his perfections; but we reverence and adore him on account of his dominion. For God, without dominion, providence, and final causes, is nothing else but fate and nature. Newton's Principia, vol. ii. p. 311. edit. 1803; Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. i. p. 448; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Genesis i. 1.

GOG AND MA'GOG. We do not separate these two names as the Scripture generally joins them. Moses (Gen. x. 2.) speaks of Magog the son of Japheth, but says nothing of Gog. According to Ezekiel, (xxxviii. 2, 3, &c.; xxxix. 1, 2, &c.) Gog was prince of Magog. Magog signifies the country or people; and Gog the king of that country. Suidas says, that Magog is the Persians, and hence we might suppose, that Ezekiel, who describes the army of Magog, intended the army of Xerxes. Josephus says, that the people named Magoges, were so called from their leader Magog, who, by the Greeks, is denominated a Scythian. It would seem, therefore, that Josephus speaks of a name and a people well known in his own time. Asseman places Magog in Chorasán and Bukharia. Ebedjesu, in the thirteenth century, says, that Adeus planted Christianity 'throughout Persia, the regions of Assyria, Armenia, Media, Babylonia, the land of Huz (in the south of Persia, not far from the Tigris, whose metropolis is marked Ahvaz in D'Anville, about lat. 40°,) to the confines of India, and even to the Land of Gog and Magog.' Elias Damascenus, who lived about A.D. 893, says, 'Alpheus, disciple of Adeus, called to the faith of Christ, Keбал (that is Parthia), and Persia, and Ahvaz, to the borders of Sind (that is, India), and Gog and Magog.' Amras says, 'Persia and Gebal, and the country beyond, even to Gog and Magog.' These authorities clearly point to the country which we now call Tartary, largely taken, as what was formerly called Magog. These regions used the Syriac language. Moses has only Magog as a people; the name Gog seems to have been added by Ezekiel among the Jews, and from him to have been received by Christian writers in the Apocalypse. The Arabs, Persians, and Turks, says D'Herbelot, always associate Jiouge and Magiougé (Gog and Magog,) and they understand by these names the same as by Tsin and Matsin, the Chinese of the north, and those of the south. But this prophet also seems to take Gog for the king, and Magog for the people; as if Gog was the chief of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal; and these were military tribes under his orders. It is certain, that the Arabs and Turks take Jiouge and Majiougé for northern nations; and it seems very probable that Gog and Magog was the general name of the northern nations of Europe and Asia, or the districts north of the Caucasus, or Mount Taurus.

Dr. Hales says, that 'Gog and Magog seem to be the general name of the northern nations of Europe and Asia, or the districts north of Caucasus, or Mount Taurus, colonized by Gog or Magog, one of the sons of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) called, by the Arabian geographers, Jajuje and Majuje. (Rennel's Herod. p. 112.) Gog rather denotes the people, Magog the land. Thus, Balaam foretold that Christ would be 'a king higher than Agag,' or rather than 'Gog,' according to the more correct reading of the Samaritan Hebrew text, and of the Septuagint version of Numb. xxiv. 7: and Ezekiel, foretelling a future invasion of the land of Israel, by these northern nations, Meshech, Tubal, and Togarmah, styles Gog their chief prince, and describes their host precisely as Scythian or Tartarian; 'coming out of the north, all of them riding on horses,' 'bows and arrows,' their weapons; 'covering the land like a cloud, and coming like a storm,' in the 'latter days,' (Ezek. xxxviii. 1—17.) He also describes their immense slaughter, in the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea, thence called the valley of Hamon Gog, 'the multitude of Gog,' (Ezek. xxxix. 1—22.) This prophecy seems also to be revived in the Apocalypse, where the hosts of Gog and Magog are represented as coming to invade 'the beloved city,' and perishing with immense slaughter likewise in Armageddon, 'the Mount of Mageddo,' or Megiddo. (Rev. xvi. 14—16.; xx. 8—10.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 463; Sacred Geography.

GOLD, a yellow metal, the heaviest, purest, most ductile, and shining, and on these accounts the most valuable, of metals. Of all the metals, gold is most frequently found native; and is indeed very rarely found in a state of ore; that is, divested of its metallic forms, by its particles being penetrated by, and intimately mixed with sulphur; and in the few instances in which it is found thus, it never constitutes a peculiar ore, but is found intermixed among ores of other metals; and most frequently among those of silver, or those ores in which, though of some other metal, there is a large quantity of silver in which the gold lies in its state of ore. Native gold, though free from the penetrating sulphurs which reduce metals to ores, is very seldom found pure; but has almost constantly an admixture of silver with it, and very frequently of copper. Native gold is sometimes found in pure masses of considerable size; many having been found of more than a pound weight; these masses are met with in gold mines, and are called aurum Obryzum, Obrizium, but they are very rare; such, however, have been sometimes found in the German mines. Its common appearance in its more loose state, is in form of what is called gold dust: this is native gold in smaller masses, usually indeed very small, mixed among the sand of rivers. This is found in many parts of the world, but the greatest quantity of it is from Guinea. By the trials that have been made, gold seems the most simple of all substances. It is wholly incapable of rust, and is not sonorous when struck. It requires a strong fire to melt it, remaining unaltered in that degree of heat which fuses tin or lead, but running with a less vehement heat than is necessary to fuse iron or copper. Gold occurs throughout the Scripture; and the use of that metal among the ancient Hebrews, in its native and mixed state, and for the purposes in which it is used at present, was common. The ark of the covenant was overlaid with pure gold; the mercy-seat, the vessels and utensils belonging to the tabernacle, were of gold, as were those also of the house of the Lord, and the drinking vessels of king Solomon: they made chains, bracelets, and other ornaments of gold, coins and medals, crowns of gold, &c. The mines whence Solomon had the greatest part of his gold, were those of Ophir. See OPHIR.

Dr. Prideaux observes, that from the time of David and Solomon, for above fifteen hundred years afterwards, gold and silver were in much greater plenty in the world than either of them is at present. This is sufficiently proved by the immense riches which Solomon had in gold and silver, the prodigious quantities of both these which Alexander found in the treasures of Darius, and the vast loads of them which were often carried in triumph before the Roman generals, when they returned from the conquered provinces. Prideaux's Connect. part. i. book v.; A Dictionary of the Holy Bible, vol. ii. p. 550. edit. 1759.

GOLI'ATH, גִּלְיָת, signifies passage, dissolution, discovery, heap. Goliath was a famous giant of Gath, who presented himself between the armies of the Philistines, encamped between Shochoh and Azekah, and defied the Hebrews. He was six cubits and a span high; about twelve feet and a half, reckoning the cubit at twenty-one inches: or, as Mr. Parkhurst thinks, nine feet six inches. His armour was suitable to his stature. At length, David coming to the camp, to bring provisions to his brothers, declared that he would encounter this giant. Accordingly, David marched against Goliath, and slung at him a stone, which struck the giant with such force that he fell down. David running upon him, drew the giant's sword, and cut off his head.

Goliath was descended from Arapha; that is, the old Rephaim. An author who has examined the weight of his armour, finds, that allowing a proportionable weight to each part, it must have been two hundred and seventy-two pounds thirteen ounces.

It is believed by some, that David, on this occasion, composed the 144th psalm.

GO'MER, גֹּמֶר, signifies to finish, complete, accomplish. Gomer, son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2.) was father to the people of Galatia, according to Josephus. The ancient inhabitants of that country were called Gomares, before the Galatians seized it. The Chaldee places Gomer in Africa; Bochart, in Phrygia. It would seem, that the ancient Cimbri, or Cimmerians, and probably the Welsh or Cymri, sprung from Gomer. Michaelis approves of Bochart's placing the Gomerians in Phrygia. The probability is, that Gomer received his possession in the regions north of the Danube; that from hence he spread abroad to the west, till Germany, France, and Britain, were peopled by him; and that his posterity still continue marked, if not distinct, in the ancient Britons now resident in Wales. The Gomerites might also make excursions east, and crossing the Black Sea, might colonize Pontus; so that the Galatians were possibly a branch of Gomer, notwithstanding their distance of time and place from the main stem. The ancient Britons consider themselves as having emigrated from the Crimea, and by that route from the east. This would be an interesting inquiry, did we not know that our country has been successively over-run by other nations; and that the Romans, the Saxons, and the Normans, have intermingled themselves so greatly throughout England, that not a trace of the early original remains. In Wales the mountains have afforded means of preserving a purer descent; and some individuals can derive their pedigree from remote antiquity, with great appearance of probability. Sacred Geography.

GOMOR/RAH, עֲמֹרָה, signifies a rebel people; otherwise, fearful people, or a handfuit, or servant; or, more probably, it denotes a well-watered place. Gomorrah was one of the principal cities of the Pentapolis, consumed by fire from Heaven. Dr. Wells thinks, that this was the most considerable of the five cities, except Sodom. Wells's Geog. vol. i. p. 140; Sacred Geography.

GOODNESS, desirable moral qualities. All corporeal good is short-lived, and liable to satiety; but the pleasures of goodness are immutable and eternal. Of all temporal possessions and enjoyments we shall be stripped by death; but goodness alone is that property and that pleasure, which the possessor will carry with him beyond the grave. How great and innumerable are the benefits likely to accrue from a heart governed by the precepts of religion, in all the varied circumstances and conditions of life! Are we rich and prosperous, is not religion necessary to confirm our happiness? Are we poor, or in a low and despised condition? Then religion is necessary to console us, to give us right notions of our dignity as immortal beings. Great is the difference between a good and a bad man, even in that difference of circumstances which tends to make the temporal condition of the good man apparently the most disastrous. Is the good man depressed with indigence? Still he has a sure refuge from impatience and distrust, in reflecting on the providential government of His heavenly Father, who feedeth the ravens, and who consequently will not, without some good reason, suffer His rational creatures to suffer hunger? Is the good man stretched on the bed of sickness, or involved in the depths of misery? Still he knows that the languor, and weariness, and pain, which he endures, are wisely appointed for his ultimate improvement. He murmurs not against the righteous government of His heavenly Father, who, in the ministration of His providence, inflicts many things on him, which only tend to render him the more fit for glory, and honour, and immortality, beyond the grave. 'We know,' says St. Paul, 'that all things work together for good, to those who love God.' (Rom. viii. 28.) In short, the inward satisfaction of the good man, even in the most distressing circumstances, is really greater than that of the bad man, in the highest honour, or the greatest affluence.

Does any one deserve, or can any one command, so much respect as the good man? We may gaze with envy on the rich, or look with dread on the powerful; but we never contemplate with any thing like respect either the rich or the powerful, when they are wanting in goodness, when their moral character is base, when they are notorious for their covetousness, their injustice, or their cruelty. But, however distressed or poor a man may be, we cannot avoid regarding him with sensations approaching to those of veneration, if he be morally good, and upright in his general conduct. Then we cannot help esteeming and applauding him. Is the good man barren of delight, or destitute of pleasure? No; to him belong the purest delights, and the most exquisite pleasures. He rejoiceth before Him, 'in whose presence is the fullness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures for evermore.' How sweet, how deliciously satisfactory is that pleasure, which we experience, when in trying circumstances, we have resisted the temptations that beset us, and obeyed the will of God! No pleasure, either in purity or degree, can equal that which is felt in doing good. Compared with this, all other joys are vapid, unsubstantial, and illusory.

No true freedom can exist where the person is not morally free from the oppressive tyranny of unrighteous habits; and what can exempt us from this tyranny but the doctrine of Jesus, accompanied with such weighty sanctions, such deterring threats, and such animating promises? What produces so many vexations, or subjects a man to so many vicissitudes and cares, as unrighteousness? The good man lays down all the burthen of his worldly cares, his temporal distractions and solitudes, at the foot of the cross. He takes upon him the yoke of the doctrine of Jesus; and he finds rest to his soul.

Though the good man may be despised for want of wisdom by worldly men, who regard nothing but the interest of the present moment, yet it is certain that he alone is wise. For what wisdom can equal either in its present or remote benefits, the wisdom of goodness; which tends more than any thing else to make us resemble God, the Father of Lights? Wicked men, who omit no opportunity of promoting their present interest, or securing their present purposes, may think themselves wise; but, if the matter be rightly considered, it will be found, that no man can be so truly foolish as he who commits evil. Wickedness is, indeed, the greatest abuse, or rather defect of reason; for reason, rightly employed, will always teach us, 'that to depart from evil is understanding.' He certainly is the wisest man, who turns his time and his talents to the best account. Other men may be wise in their generation; but the good man alone is wise unto salvation. Who is so largely or so universally beneficial as the good man; who benefits others so much by his instruction, his alms, his example, and his prayers? Who is, on all occasions, so willing to contribute to the good of others, to alleviate their misery, or increase their happiness? Who takes so warm an interest, so sincere a delight, in the welfare of his friends, who is so willing to forgive his enemies, or so well entitled to the praise of benefactor to his country and the human race? Such are the gains and pleasures of goodness; and these gains and pleasures are not delusive and transient, vain, unsubstantial, and unsatisfactory, like those of sin, but solid, immutable, and eternal.

Let it, however, be understood, that religious principles alone can destroy the seeds of vice, and produce the fruits of true goodness. A semblance of virtue and goodness may exist, where there is no sense of religion; but a principle of true religion implanted in the heart by the Divine Spirit, is the only root from which genuine virtue and true unaffected goodness can spring. Such a principle will naturally and necessarily produce every virtue that can render a man happy in himself and amiable in society. On the contrary, where the heart is destitute of religious principles, and a stranger to sentiments of piety, though the outward conduct may be unexceptionable, there no true goodness can exist. To attempt to promote the interests of virtue in the world, and to gain the hearts of mankind to a love of true goodness, without endeavouring to impress the mind with a reverence for God and religion, is to labour in vain. Pious principles will naturally produce virtuous sentiments and virtuous practice; but a contempt of religion will assuredly be productive of base principles, and immoral conduct. Dr. Hood's Sermons, p. 71; Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. p. 449, &c.

GOSHEN, גֹּשֶׁן, signifies nearness or approximation. The land of Goshen was a part of Egypt, in which Joseph placed his father and brethren. (Gen. xlvii. 6.) This was the most fertile pasture-ground in the whole of Lower Egypt; and hence it was called Goshen, from gush, in Arabic, signifying 'a heart,' or whatever is choice or precious. There was also a Goshen in the territory of the tribe of Judah, which was so called for the same reason. (Josh. x. 41.) Hence, Joseph recommended it to his family as 'the best of the land.' (Gen. xlvii. 11.) and 'the fat of the land.' (Gen. xlv. 18.)

The land of Goshen lay along the most easterly branch of the Nile, and on the east side of it; for it is evident, that at the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, they did not cross the Nile. In ancient times, Goshen was considerably more extensive, both in length and breadth, in consequence of the general failure of the eastern branches of the Nile; the main body of the river verging more and more to the west continually, and deepening the channels on that side. Rennel's Herodot. p. 537; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 374.

GOSPEL, a Saxon word, which denotes good news, glad tidings, news from God. The same is the meaning of εὐαγγέλιον, the Greek word for Gospel. The book which contains the recital of our Saviour's life, miracles, death, resurrection, and doctrine, includes the best news that could be published to mankind. We acknowledge only four canonical Gospels; those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

Some German critics, as Le Clerc, Michaelis, Koppe, Lessing, Eichhorn, &c. have supposed that the first three Evangelists did not see each other's Gospels; and to account for the remarkable verbal harmony that appears between these Gospels, they have supposed that all these evangelists used a common document in the Hebrew or Syro-Chaldee dialect, which contained a short narrative of the principal transactions of Christ's ministry, which served as a basis for their Gospels, and which they altered and enlarged, according as they obtained fuller information. This hypothesis has been adopted and modified by the learned and ingenious Dr. Herbert Marsh, who in his elaborate 'Dissertation on the origin of our three first canonical Gospels,' annexed to his Notes on the third volume of Michaelis, conjectures that Luke meant to express the title of this common document, which was Διήγησις περὶ τῶν πεπληροφορημένων πραγμάτων, κ. τ. λ. At the same time, he candidly notices an objection, which he leaves to the decision of the learned, whether Luke's omitting the article τὴν, in his account, ἀνατάξασθαι διήγησιν, may not destroy the whole conjecture. That profound Greek critic, Middleton, in his doctrine of the Greek Article, gives a verdict against Dr. Marsh, by observing, that 'the title of a book, as prefixed to the book itself, should be anarthrous (without the article:); but when the book is referred to, the article should be inserted.' It appears, indeed, that Luke's preface militates entirely against this hypothesis. Matthew and John, who were 'eye witnesses and ministers' of the 'ORACLE,' had no need of a common document; and Luke expressly asserts, that he derived his information from apostles; and we may conclude the same of Mark: whilst, according to Origen, all were impelled to write, and inspired by THE HOLY SPIRIT, whom Christ had solemnly promised to send to guide them into all the truth of the Gospel. (John xvi. 13.) That the succeeding evangelists did not see the Gospels of their predecessors, upon which the whole hypothesis hinges, is a negative which cannot be proved. On the contrary, the affirmative, that they did, is not only highly probable, if we consider the intimate connexion and correspondence subsisting between them, but seems to be sufficiently proved from internal evidence, namely, by the verbal agreement between the first three evangelists. This will appear by comparing, first, Matthew and Mark together, and Matthew and Luke together; secondly, Mark and Luke together; and thirdly, all three together.

Of the three evangelists, Matthew is generally allowed to have written the first. His Gospel, in all the codes or volumes of the Gospels, and most ancient manuscripts, is placed first; and the priority is given to it, in the citations of the primitive fathers, and of the early heretics. Whether he wrote in Hebrew or in Greek, is a point greatly contested by the critics. The presumption is strongly in favour of the latter. Greek was at that time the prevailing language. As not only the rest of the evangelists, but also the apostles, Peter, James, John, Jude, and Paul, wrote all their epistles in Greek, to Christians, Jews, and Gentiles, throughout the known world; and as Matthew's Gospel was intended for universal dissemination, not less than theirs; (Matth. xvi. 13.; xxviii. 19.) it is unlikely that it was written in any other language than that employed by all the other writers of the New Testament. This is strongly confirmed by the numerous and remarkable instances of verbal agreement between him and the other evangelists; which, on the supposition that he wrote in Hebrew, or the vernacular Syro-Chaldaic dialect, would not be credible. Even they who maintain that opinion, are forced to confess, that, before Luke and Mark wrote their Gospels, there existed an early Greek translation of Matthew's Gospel, which those evangelists consulted.

Whether Mark or Luke wrote first, is a matter of difficult determination. It was long the received opinion, that the Gospels were written exactly in the order in which they are placed in our canon, from the testimonies of Irenæus, Origen, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, &c. who thus cite the evangelists. Hence, Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Townson, &c. entertained no doubt of the priority of Mark's Gospel to that of Luke. But later critics have found reason to question the validity of this assumption; and the penetration of Griesbach has, by an elaborate process, furnished internal evidence of the priority of Luke's Gospel. He has shown that Mark copied from both Matthew and Luke; that his Gospel is a compilation from both; and that the whole of it is contained in their Gospels, with the exception of about twenty-four verses, which retain facts not recorded by either of his predecessors, but illustrative of the general subject. Mark alone mentions, that Christ was with the wild beasts in the wilderness during his temptation, (i. 13.); that additional circumstance in our Lord's first preaching, 'the time is fulfilled,' foretold by the prophets, (i. 15.); David's eating the shew-bread in the days of Abiathar, (ii. 26.); Boanerges, the emphatic surname of the apostles James and John, signifying 'sons of thunder,' (iii. 17.); our Lord's anger and grief at the obduracy of the Jews, (iii. 5.); the expression of his unbelieving friends, he is beside himself, (iii. 21.); the beautiful parable of the spontaneous growth of the seed, (iv. 26—29.); the number of the herd of swine 2000, (v. 13.); Christ's expression, Talitha cumi, 'Damsel arise,' (v. 41.) Ephphatha, 'Be opened,' (vii. 34.) the 5000 fed on the green grass, characterizing the spring of the year, (vi. 39.) the distribution of the two fishes as well as the loaves of bread, (vi. 41.) the first cock-crowing during Peter's denial of Christ, (xiv. 68.) the addition of Salome to Matthew's party of women, (xv. 40.) Christ's resurrection about sun-rise, (xvi. 2.) the vision of the second angel at the holy sepulchre, (xvi. 5.) the silence of the women respecting his message to Peter, (xvi. 7, 8.) his appearance under another form to the disciples going to Emmaus, (xvi. 12.) the disbelief of their report by the rest, and our Lord's censure, (xvi. 13, 14.) his commission to the apostles to preach and work miracles, (xvi. 15—18.) and their discharge of the commission. (xvi. 20.) All these important facts and circumstances have been judiciously added to the conciser accounts of Matthew and Luke. Had Luke followed him, it is not credible that he would have omitted them all, as John has noticed those of Mark which coincided with his scheme, or came within the range of his Gospel. Hence we seem warranted, by the internal evidence, to conclude that Mark wrote after, and not before Luke. To this internal evidence in favour of the priority of Luke's Gospel to that of Mark, early testimonies of considerable weight might be added. In support of this opinion, we might also mention the modern authorities of Basnage, Büsching, Griesbach, and Marsh, founded on the internal evidence, and of Lardner and Michaelis founded on the testimonies.

Hence we can satisfactorily account for Mark's omission of certain portions of their Gospels entirely. On the same principle, John coming after him, omits considerably more than Mark, so as to form a distinct Gospel, which may be considered as a supplement to the rest; he inserts only so much common matter as was necessary to connect his Gospel with theirs, and, by recording the four passovers that included our Lord's public ministry, gives a short but masterly outline of the chronology of the whole, which had before been vague and undetermined. That the omissions, no less than the correspondences of the Evangelists, were designed, incontestably appears from a critical comparison of their Gospels. They agree in promoting the common design, which was to collect in their admirable memoirs of Christ (as the Gospels were originally termed), the most authentic and important materials from the mass of original or traditional evidence well known to them all, and to condense, or rather concentrate them into the smallest compass, for the edification of the Church of Christ. In the Gospels is a simplicity of style and manner peculiar to themselves, and adapted to all ranks. 'They were written' for the highest and noblest of all purposes, to instruct the world how to attain everlasting happiness in the mansions of bliss; 'that mankind might believe,' on reasonable evidence, 'that Jesus is the CHRIST, the SON of God; and that believing they might have life in his name.' (John xx. 31.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 659—674.

GOULD, in Hebrew Kikiun, a word that occurs in Jonah iv. 6, which the Septuagint and our English version translate 'gourd.' It is supposed, that the el-kheroa or ricinus, is the kikiun of Job. Niebuhr says, 'I saw for the first time at Basra the plant el-kheroa. It has the form of a tree: the trunk appeared to me rather to resemble leaves, than wood; nevertheless, it is harder than that which bears the Adam's fig. Each branch of the kheroa has but one large leaf, with six or seven foldings in it. This plant was near to a rivulet which watered it amply. At the end of October, 1765, it had risen in five months' time about eight feet, and bore at once flowers and fruit, ripe and unripe. Another tree of this species, which had not had so much water, had not grown more in a whole year. The flowers and leaves of it which I gathered, withered in a few minutes; as do all plants of a rapid growth. This tree is called at Aleppo, Palma Christi: an oil is made from it called oleum de keroa; oleum CICINUM; oleum ficus infernalis. The Christians and Jews of Mosul (Nineveh) say, it was not the kheroa whose shadow refreshed Jonah, but a sort of gourd, el-kerra, which has very large leaves, very large fruit, and lasts only about four months.' Volney observes, that 'whoever has travelled to Cairo, or Rosetta, knows that the species of gourd, called kerra, will in twenty-four hours send out shoots near four inches long.'

It is to be wished, that these authors had observed, whether the cool of night is noticeably favourable to the growth of the plant described: in order to settle the import of the Hebrew phrase, in the history of Jonah, 'which a son of night was, and, as a son of night, died.' Does it mean, that the plant grew chiefly by night; or, that it grew in one single night? or, that it cast so much shade as to occasion a kind of night? We are also not obliged to understand the expression 'on the morrow,' lemecheret, as strictly importing the very next day, as the word has a reference to a much more distant time, (Exod. xiii. 5. Deut. vi. 20. Josh. iv. 6.) and may be taken simply as afterwards.

The gourd called kerra is related to Jonah's kikiun only by its resemblance in name to the kheroa: for, though it be of rapid growth, yet it does not appear to be proper for rising, to come up over Jonah, probably too, over his booth, 'to spread a shadow over his head, to deliver him from grief.' But the el-kheroa rises eight feet high, and consequently is capable of casting a shadow on the head of a man, or of contributing to fill up the intervals in a hut or hovel. The circumstance of the speedy withering of the flowers and leaves of the kheroa ought to be attended to, as well as its present name cicinum, which is sufficiently near to the kikiun of Jonah. As the history in Jonah expressly says, 'the Lord' prepared this plant, we may consider it as an extraordinary one of its kind, remarkably rapid in growth, remarkably hard in its stem, remarkably vigorous in its branches, and remarkable for the extensive spread of its leaves, and the deep gloom of their shade; and, after a certain duration, remarkable for its sudden withering, and a total uselessness to the impatient prophet. The el-kheroa, or ricinus, besides being well known in the East, grows also in the West Indies, and some of its species have been cultivated in Europe. They were first planted in England A.D. 1562. It is often called Palma Christi, and is the same plant from which our castor oil is extracted. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. lxxviii. p. 135; Scripture Illustrated, *Expos. GRACE is used in Scripture in various senses; but the general idea of it is the aid and assistance which we receive from God. The most pious of those who lived under the Mosaic dispensation, frequently acknowledge the necessity of extraordinary assistance from God. David prays to God 'to open his eyes, to guide and direct him,' (Ps. cxix. 18, 32, 35.); 'to create in him a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him.' (Ps. li. 10.) Solomon says that 'God directeth men's paths, and giveth grace to the lowly.' (Prov. iii. 6.) Even we, whose minds are enlightened by the pure precepts of the Gospel, and influenced by the motives which it suggests, must still be convinced of our weakness and depravity, and confess that we have no power to perform works pleasing and acceptable to the Almighty, unless the grace of God prevent and assist us. The necessity of Divine grace to strengthen and regulate our wills, and to co-operate with our endeavours, is clearly asserted in the New Testament: 'No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me, draw him.' (John vi. 44.) 'No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.' (1 Cor. xii. 3.) 'It is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure.' (Phil. ii. 13.) 'Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God.' (2 Cor. iii. 5.) We are said to be 'led by the Spirit,' (Rom. viii. 14.) and to 'walk in the Spirit.' (Gal. v. 16. 25.) These texts sufficiently prove, that we stand in need of both a preventing and a co-operating grace. Dr. Nichols, after quoting many authorities to show that the doctrine of Divine grace always prevailed in the Catholic church, says, 'I have spent, perhaps, more time in these testimonies than was absolutely necessary; but whatever I have done is to show that the doctrine of Divine grace is so essential a doctrine of Christianity, that not only the Holy Scriptures and the primitive fathers assert it, but likewise that the Christians could not in any age maintain their religion without it, it being necessary not only for the discharge of Christian duties, but for the performance of our ordinary devotions.'

This assistance of Divine grace is not inconsistent with the free agency of men; it does not place them under an irresistible restraint, nor compel them to act contrary to their will. Though human nature is greatly depraved, yet every good disposition is not totally extinguished, nor is all power of right action entirely annihilated. Men may, therefore, make some spontaneous, though feeble attempts to act conformably to their duty, which will be promoted and rendered effectual by the co-operation of God's grace; or the grace of God may so far prevent our actual endeavours, as to awaken and dispose us to our duty; but yet, not in such a degree that we cannot withstand its influence. In either case our own exertions are necessary to enable us to work out our own salvation, but our sufficiency for that purpose is from God. We cannot, however, ascertain the precise boundary between our natural efforts and the Divine assistance, whether that assistance be considered as a co-operating or a preventing grace. Without destroying our character as free and accountable beings, God may be mercifully pleased to counteract the depravity of our hearts by the suggestions of His Spirit; but still it remains with us to choose whether we will listen to those suggestions, or obey the lusts of the flesh. We ought to speak with diffidence and humility concerning the extent of Divine grace; as we only know, in general, that God will not subject us to greater temptations and trials than we are able to bear. If we cherish our good dispositions, and feel a sincere desire to be virtuous, we may rest assured that He will, by the communication of His grace, help our infirmities, invigorate our resolutions, and supply our defects. The promises, that 'if we draw nigh to God, God will draw nigh to us, and pour out His Spirit upon us,' (James iv. 8.) and that he will give His Holy Spirit to every one that asketh him, (Acts ii. 17.)

imply that God is ever ready to forward our progress and continuance in well doing through the powerful, though invisible, operation of His Spirit.

Some sects contend for the irresistible impulses of grace; and others reject the idea of any influence of the Divine Spirit upon the mind. The former opinion seems irreconcilable with the free agency of man; and the latter contradicts the authority of Scripture. 'Therefore, let us neither ascribe nothing to free-will, nor too much; let us not, with the defenders of irresistible grace, deny free-will, or make it of no effect, not only before, but even under grace; nor let us suffer the efficacy of saving grace, on the other hand, to be swallowed up in the strength and freedom of our wills; but, allowing the government or superiority to the grace of God, let the will of man be admitted to be its hand-maid, but such an one as is free, and freely obeys; by which, when it is freely excited by the admonitions of preventing grace, when it is prepared as to its affections, strengthened and assisted as to its powers and faculties, a man freely and willingly co-operates with God, that the grace of God be not received in vain.'— 'All men are also to be admonished, and chiefly preachers, that in this high matter they, looking on both sides, so temper and moderate themselves, that they neither so preach the grace of God that they take away thereby free-will, nor on the other side, so extol free-will, that injury be done to the grace of God.'— 'Thus do the doctrine of divine grace, and the doctrine of free-will or human liberty, unite and conspire, in a friendly manner, to our everlasting good. The first is adapted to excite in us gratitude, faith, and humility; the second to awaken our caution and quicken our diligence.' Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theol. vol. ii. p. 250, &c.

GRAPE, the fruit of the vine. There was abundance of fine vineyards and excellent grapes in Palestine. The bunch of grapes cut in the valley of Eshcol, and brought on a staff between two men, to the camp of Israel, at Kadesh-barnea, (Numb. xiii. 24.) may give us an idea how large this fruit became in that country. Travellers mention some growing there of a prodigious size. Indeed, it would be very easy to produce a great number of witnesses to prove that grapes in the Promised Land, as well as in various other hot countries, grow to a wonderful size. Pliny mentions bunches of grapes in Africa, each of which was larger than an infant. Radzvil saw at Rhodes bunches of grapes three quarters of an ell in length, each grape as large as a plum. Dandini, though an Italian, was surprised at the extraordinary size of the grapes of Mount Liba-

nus. Paul Lucas saw at Damascus some bunches of grapes which weighed forty-five pounds. The Egyptian grape is said to be very small; and this being the only one with which the Israelites had been acquainted, the great size of the grapes of 'Hebron' would appear still more extraordinary.

Moses, in the law, commanded, that when the Israelites gathered their grapes, what fell, or what was left behind on the vine, should be for the poor. (Levit. xix. 10.) Persons who were passing might enter another man's vineyard, and eat grapes, but not carry any away. (Deut. xxiv. 21, 22.; xxiii. 24.) Some are of opinion that the prohibition against glean- ing grapes after the vintage, may signify a second vintage after the first. (Levit. xix. 10.; Deut. xxiv. 21.)

The Scripture frequently describes a total destruction by the similitude of a vine wholly stripped; not a bunch of grapes being left for those who came to glean. (Isai. xvii. 6.; xxiv. 13.) The 'blood of grapes,' signifies wine. (Gen xlix. 11.)

The vineyards of Sodom are said to have produced bitter grapes: 'Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter.' (Deut. xxxii. 32.) As gall is not a vegetable juice, some have thought that the plant here referred to might be hemlock, of which there are the cicuta major, and the cicuta aquatica, a very noxious plant. Hasselquist, speaking of the wild grape of Scripture, labrusca, observes, 'Isaiah says, (v. 4.); What could I do more for my vineyard than I have done, yet it produced wild grapes? I believe the prophet here means to speak of the solanum incanum, (deadly nightshade,) seeing it is common in Egypt, in Palestine, and throughout the East. Moreover, the Arabs give it a name which agrees perfectly with his expression; they call it Aneb-il-dib, wolf's grape. The prophet could not have chosen a plant more opposite to the vine, for it grows in vineyards, and does infinite damage to them; therefore it is carefully rooted out. It resembles the vine by the creepers which it produces.' This is the nearest approach to the vegetable intended by Moses, which has been hitherto discovered. If the wild grape be the deadly nightshade, which grows in our own hedges, yet probably the grape of Sodom is a plant growing in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, and named from its native soil. Hasselquist found at Jericho, the solanum fruticosum quadripedale, caule et foliis spinosis, the nightshade. He also observes, that 'the Poma Sodomitica, the apple of Sodom, is the fruit of the Solanum Melongana of Linnæus, called by others mad apple. It is found in great quantities near Jericho, in the valleys near the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea.'

If this fruit causes madness, if it grows near the city of Sodom, and retains the name of Sodomitica, may it be the vegetable intended by Moses? does it sufficiently resemble the vine to be compared to it? We are not obliged to take, strictly, the word rendered grape, or the word vine, to signify a grape vine. It is a word common to many kinds of plants; and Moses, to distinguish the true vine, adds its description; 'the wine vine.' (Num. vi. 4.)

'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge,' (Jer. xxxi. 29.; Ezek. xviii. 2.) is a proverbial expression, meaning that the fathers sinned, but their children bore the punishment. In using this proverb, the Jews reproached God, who punished in them those sins, of which they pretended they were not guilty. But the Lord said he would cause this proverb to cease in Israel, and that every one should suffer the punishment of his own faults. Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. p. 8.; Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 68. 76.; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Numb. xiii. 24.

GRASSHOPPER. The creature intended by our English version, under the name grasshopper, is a kind of locust. (Lev. xi. 22.) In Arabic the verb signifies to veil, hide; and hence Bochart conjectures that these insects were so called, because, as is well known, they sometimes fly in such swarms as to veil the sun, and darken the air. Mr. Parkhurst, however, is of opinion, that as this circumstance is not peculiar to any particular kind of locusts, the word chagab, rendered grasshopper, denotes the uccullated species of locusts, so denominated from the ucculus, cowl or hood, with which they are naturally furnished, and which serves to distinguish them from other kinds. It appears from Scheuchzer, that some of the locusts, particularly those of the uccullated species, nearly resemble in shape our common grasshopper. Hence may be illustrated Eccles. xii. 5. And the locust, or grasshopper, shall be a burthen to itself: where the dry, shrunk, shrivelled, crumpling, craggy old man, his back-bone sticking out, his knees projecting forwards, his arms backwards, his head downwards, and the apophyses, or bunching parts of the bones in general enlarged, is very aptly described by that insect: and from this exact likeness arose the fable of Tithonus, who, living to extreme old age, was at last turned into a grasshopper. Parkhurst's Heb. and Eng. Lexicon, p. 192.

GRATITUDE is that pleasing affection of the mind which arises from a sense of favours received, and by which the possessor is excited to make all the returns of love and service in his power.

When we consider the multiplicity of benefits which we are daily and hourly receiving from God, it seems, at first view, natural to suppose, that the sensation of gratitude would never be long absent from our hearts. To whom are we indebted for our creation? To whom but God? To whom can we ascribe our preservation amid so many daily and continual perils and accidents, and often for such a length of years? Is not the Divine providence, on this account, the object of our gratitude? Did God take pity on our race when exposed to perdition? Did he send his beloved Son into this guilty world, 'to seek and to save those who were lost?' And can we sufficiently admire 'the exceeding riches of his grace?' Can we sufficiently love and praise the Father of mercies, whose love to the children of men 'surpasseth all understanding?' Hath he made known to us the way of salvation by Christ? Hath he made the light of the Gospel to shine around us, who must otherwise have been surrounded with thick darkness? And are we not bound to bless him with our souls, and all that is within us? Yet, many as are the benefits which we receive from God, how seldom do we make them the object of our thanksgiving, when they are present, or of our grateful recollection when they are past! How slight is the gratitude which we feel, how faint the acknowledgments which we make, compared with the good which we enjoy! How great is our debt, and yet how slender, partial, and transient, our returns of gratitude! Our sense of favours received seldom lasts longer than the enjoyment, and, in this case, our gratitude is little better than the physical sensation of present pleasure; and, when the object which excited it is departed, the recollection also is lost. But that gratitude is not much to be prized for its purity or worth, which does not remain longer than the benefit, of whatever nature it might be, which caused the physical sensation of enjoyment. Hence it behoves us, in order to establish a right principle of gratitude within us, not only to render to God our most devout acknowledgments for present favours, but often to meditate on the proofs of his loving-kindness in time past. 'My mouth,' says the Psalmist, (lxiii. 5—7.) 'shall praise thee with joyful lips, when I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches; because thou hast been my help.' Because we are in safety, ought we to forget our deliverance from danger; or, because we are in health, ought we not to remember the succour which we received when we were sick? In our youth, should we not think of God's fatherly preservation of us in our helpless infancy? and, in the later, should we not call to mind the mercies which we experienced in the earlier periods of our lives? We are continually receiving fresh benefits from God; every day, nay, every hour, adds to their number, and, of course, increases the weight of our obligations. The sense of present favours ought not to obliterate the recollection of the past. For if one act of kindness, one good gift, one deliverance in danger, one succour in misfortune, deserve our gratitude, and merit our acknowledgments, much more ought many such exertions of benevolence. Is not an accumulation of benefits an object of accumulated gratitude? Is not the debt of gratitude increased in proportion to the favours conferred and the benefits received? If this be the case, surely it behoves us to register past benefits in our memory, by frequent recollection, and thus to keep alive a grateful sense of our former obligations.

We ought to be gratefully disposed towards our benefactors among men. If any one has at any period assisted us, we ought not to cease to be grateful to him, nor ought the recollection of this service to be obliterated. Examples of ingratitude check and discourage voluntary beneficence; and in this the evil of ingratitude consists. Nor is the evil small. After all that can be done towards providing for the public happiness, by prescribing rules of justice and enforcing the observance of them by penalties or compulsion, much must necessarily be left to those offices of kindness, which men remain at liberty to exert or withhold. Now, not only the choice of the objects, but the quantity and even the existence of this sort of kindness in the world, depends, in a great measure, on the return which it receives. This is a consideration of general importance. Another reason for cultivating a grateful temper in ourselves is, that the same principle which is affected with the kindness of a human benefactor, is capable of being affected with the divine goodness, and of becoming, under the influence of that affection, a source of the purest and most exalted virtue. Though gratitude can never oblige a man to do what is wrong, and consequently, what he is previously obliged not to do, yet to allege this as a reason, when it is not the real one, is both ingratitude and hypocrisy. Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, vol. i. p. 280; Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. p. 519; Dr. Hood's Sermons, p. 267, &c.

GREECE, in Hebrew Javan. Simon thinks, that Javan imports soft, tender. Javan was a son of Japheth, (Gen. x. 2, 4.) after whom that part of Greece called Ionia was named. Ionia is interpreted from the Hebrew deceptive, insinuating; otherwise, making sorrowful; otherwise, dirty; otherwise, the dove's country. Greece itself is rendered robust or strong. Greece may be considered as a country partly in Asia, and partly in Europe. (Acts xx.)

Greece, in its largest acceptation, as denoting the countries where the Greek language prevailed, included from the Scardian Mountains north, to the Levant Sea south, and from the Adriatic Sea west to Asia Minor east. Hence it is used by Daniel to denote Macedonia, as part of Greece; whereas, we read in Acts xx. 2. that St. Paul, passing through Macedonia, came to Greece, that is, Græcia Propria. In this more restricted sense, Macedonia and the river Strymon formed the northern boundary of Greece. The Scripture has but little reference to Greece, till the time of Alexander, whose conquests extended into Asia, where Greece had hitherto been of no importance. Yet that some intercourse was maintained with these countries from Jerusalem, may be inferred from the desire of Baasha to shut up all passage between Jerusalem and Joppa, which was its port, by the building of Ramah; and the anxiety of Asa to counteract his scheme. (1 Kings xv. 17—22.) Greece was certainly intended by the prophet Daniel, under the symbol of the single-horned goat: and it is probable that when Daniel calls Greece Chittim, he spoke the language of the Hebrew nation, rather than that of the Persian court.

After the establishment of the Grecian dynasties in Asia, Judea could not but be considerably affected by them, and the books of the Maccabees afford proofs of this. The Roman power superseding the Grecian establishments, yet left traces of Greek language, customs, &c. to the days of the Herods, where the Gospel history commences. By the activity of the apostles, and especially by that of Paul, the Gospel was propagated in those countries which used the Grecian dialects; hence, we are interested in the study of this language: moreover, as Greece, like all other countries, had its peculiar manners, we are not able to estimate properly an epistle written to those who dwell where they prevailed, without a competent acquaintance with the manners themselves, with the sentiments and reasonings of those who practised them, and with the arguments employed in their defence by those who adhered to them. Sacred Geography.

GREEK AND EASTERN CHURCHES. The society of Christians known under the denomination of the Eastern church, in contradistinction to the Western church, or that of Rome, is dispersed throughout Europe, Asia, and Africa, and may be divided into three distinct communities: 1. the Greek Christians who agree in all points of doctrine and worship with the patriarch residing at Constantinople, and reject the pretended supremacy of the Roman pontiff; 2. those who, adopting the doctrines and ceremonies of the Greek church, are entirely free from the jurisdiction of the patriarch at Constantinople; and 3. those who are subject to the see of Rome.

GREEK CHURCH subject to the PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE. Name, Antiquity, &c. The Greek church is so called, from its comprehending all Christians within the limits of Ancient Greece, to distinguish it from the Latin or Romish church, and chiefly from its members having long used the Greek language in its liturgies or religious service; a practice still continued in the part of it now under consideration, and also by some others. The Oriental or Greek church is the most ancient of all Christian churches; and, though it may be granted that the Roman pontiff had acquired a spiritual, or rather a temporal jurisdiction, before the patriarch of Constantinople, or perhaps before any other Oriental patriarch, yet it cannot be doubted that the first Christian church or society was established at Jerusalem. The next churches were certainly those of Syria and Greece, and the Latin church is unquestionably the daughter of the Greek, and is indebted to her for all the blessings of the Gospel. Jerusalem was the mother of all churches; the original emporium of the Christian faith; the centre from which the healing rays of Christianity diverged and spread over the world.

But though the Greek church is more ancient than the Latin, yet they had both the same apostolical foundation; and during the first eight centuries, they were in communion with each other, though they always disagreed in some points. They were divided as to the time and obligation of keeping Easter so early as the second century; and considerable jealousies broke out between them at the council of Sardis, in Illyricum, in 347. The flame of resentment, though occasionally stifled for a time, again broke out with increased fury in the eighth century, on the subject of images; and in the ninth, under the patriarch Photius, their disputes became so violent, that they dissolved communion with each other, and a final separation took place between them. Photius was elected patriarch of Constantinople, in the year 858, by the emperor Michael, who drove Ignatius from that see, and forced him into exile. Pope Nicholas I. took part with the exiled patriarch, condemned the election as unwarrantable, and excommunicated Photius. On this, Photius, a high-spirited prelate, and the most learned and ingenious man of the age, assembled a council at Constantinople, and, in return, excommunicated the pope. Hence, and from various other circumstances in the history of the Eastern and Western churches, it appears that the animosities which subsisted between them for so many ages, and the final separation which ensued, are not to be ascribed to the early difference in opinion concerning the observance of certain festivals, nor even to the more important subjects of dispute which gave rise to the Arian heresy. They are rather to be referred to that period when Constantine removed the seat of empire to Byzantium; and, by augmenting the dignity of the latter see, rendered it formidable to the Roman pontiff. In the second general council, the bishop of Constantinople was allowed to sit next to the successor of St. Peter; and by the twenty-eighth canon of the synod of Chalcedon, he was permitted to enjoy an equal rank. The head of the Latin church strongly resisted these encroachments; but the emperors of the East were strenuous to assert the privileges of the new city, and, by the preponderance of their authority, confirmed all its pretensions. In the eighth century, Pope Gregory having carried his persecution of the Iconoclasts, that is, the image-breakers, too far, the emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, from the place of his birth, as well to restrain the power, as to punish the arrogance of the Roman pontiff, seized his possessions in Calabria, Sicily, Illyricum, and Greece, and transferred them to the jurisdiction of the bishop of Constantinople. From that period, some consider this unfortunate breach as fixed and incurable; for, though the church of Rome was afterwards accused of various errors and irregularities, by the patriarchs Photius and Michael Cerrularius, and both the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope were warmly resisted, yet these were not the principal causes of contention. Hence the two attempts of the emperor Michael Palæologus, in the thirteenth century, to allay the fervour of dissension, and re-unite the two churches, were vain; and the union proposed by the council of Florence, in the fifteenth century, was of short duration. In short, every attempt to heal the wound has been hitherto without effect. The mutual sacrifices required have been disagreeable to both the Roman and the Constantinopolitan prelates, so that each remains to this day, the centre of a different system; and the Greeks have ever been considered as schismatics by the Latin church.

In the history of the Greek church, from this fatal separation in the ninth century, little more occurs, except the crusades or holy wars, and the vast accession made to it by the conversion of the Russian dominions, till about the middle of the fifteenth century, (1453); when Mahomet II. took Constantinople, and overthrew the Grecian empire, under Constantine Palæologus, the last of the Byzantine Cæsars. With the empire of the Greeks, their religious establishment was overthrown; and though a partial toleration was at first permitted, the religious despotism of their conquerors soon contracted it within more confined limits, and reduced the Christian religion and its professors to the miserable state in which they now exist under the yoke of the Ottomans. The Greek church still subsists under the sceptre of Mahomet. But it subsists like the tree that had suffered excision in the dream of the Chaldæan monarch: its root, indeed, remains in the earth, with a band of iron and brass, and it is wet with the dew of heaven, until certain times shall have passed over it; at the expiration of which it may come into remembrance before God, and again bud, and put forth its branches, and bear fruit, for the shadow and support of nations yet unborn.

Distinguishing Doctrines.—The Greek church agrees in most things with either the church of Rome or the Protestant church. In what it differs from the one, it commonly agrees with the other. Many of the corruptions of the church of Rome arose before the final separation took place between it and the Greek church; and, as several of these had their origin in the East, they continued in both churches after the division. Hence, in the Greek church, may be found many of what we consider as errors in the Latin church; but, though the former has departed widely from the faith which it once professed, and is now sunk into deplorable ignorance and superstition, it can scarcely be admitted to be so very corrupt as the latter.

With the reformed church it agrees in disowning the pretended supremacy and infallibility of the Pope, and the church of Rome as the true Catholic church; and in rejecting purgatory by fire, graven images, the celibacy of the secular clergy, and in administering the sacrament in both kinds. But it differs from the reformed church in the number of the sacraments, in using pictures, in admitting the invocation of saints, in transubstantiation, and, of course, the adoration of the host; and though it rejects purgatory, it has something that very nearly resembles it; and it admits masses and services for the dead.

The Holy Scriptures, and the decrees of the first seven general councils, are acknowledged by the Greeks as the rule of their faith; and the doctrine of the Trinity, together with the articles of the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, are received by them, in common with most other Christians. In one particular, indeed, they differ from the other churches of Europe, whether Romish or reformed, in believing that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father only, and not from the Father and the Son: but they acknowledge the Holy Spirit to be of the same substance with the Father and the Son; and to be God from eternity, proceeding from the essence and nature of the Father, and to be equally adored. They have seven sacraments, or, as they term them, mysteries: 1. Baptism; 2. the Chrism, or baptismal unction; 3. the Eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's Supper; 4. Confession; 5. Ordination; 6. Marriage; and 7. the Euchelaion, or mystery of the holy oil. Of these, baptism and the eucharist are deemed the chief, both of which, together with the baptismal unction and confession, are to be received by all Christians; but of the other three, none is deemed obligatory upon all.

The Greek church, strictly so called, and considered in itself, had no notion of the Romish scholastic doctrine of transubstantiation. Indeed, in their Orthodox Confession, as it is called, transubstantiation, in the Roman sense, is roundly asserted; but this has been transfused from their Latin teachers, whose scholastic sophistry the modern Greeks were not able to unriddle. They lay great stress on the necessity of baptism to salvation; and with the church of Rome, they admit of lay baptism, when a priest or deacon is not at hand to administer it. They baptize by immersion; and they use the trine immersion, or form of dipping the child thrice in water. When the child is baptized, the priest immediately anoints it with the holy chrism, which is applied to the forehead, eyes, nostrils, mouth, ears, breast, hands, and feet. Previously to receiving the communion, the mystery of confession is always necessary. It is said, that they do not consider confession as a Divine precept, but allow it to be only a positive injunction of the church. They have the same division of the clergy into regular and secular, as in that of Rome; and five orders of them are promoted by imposition of the bishop's hands, with prayer, namely, Readers, Subdeacons, Deacons, Presbyters, and Bishops. The euchelaion, or holy oil, is not confined to persons at the point of death, or dangerously ill, like the extreme unction of the church of Rome, but is administered, if required, to devout persons, on the slightest malady; and this ceremony, or mystery as they call it, is chiefly founded on the advice of St. James, (v. 14, 15.) but is not deemed necessary to salvation.

The invocation of saints is practised in the Greek as well as in the Roman church. They pay a secondary adoration to the Virgin Mary, to the twelve apostles, and to a great number of saints with which the Greek calendar abounds; but they deny that they adore them as believing them to be gods. Though the members of this church abhor the use of carved or graven images, and charge the Latins with idolatry on that account, yet they admit into their houses and churches the pictures of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and a multitude of saints, to instruct, they say, the ignorant, and to animate the devotions of others. On some of their great festivals, they expose to view on a table, in the middle of the choir, the picture of the saint whom they commemorate, bowing as they approach, and kissing it with the greatest reverence; and M. Tournefort observes, that their devotion to their saints, and particularly to the Blessed Virgin, is little short of idolatry. At the celebration of the Lord's Supper, this church commemorates the faithful departed, and even prays for the remission of their sins; at the same time, she rejects purgatory, and pretends not to determine dogmatically concerning the state or condition of departed souls. She must, however, believe in a middle or intermediate state between death and the general resurrection, and that no final judgment is passed on the great body of mankind till the consummation of all things, otherwise such prayers would not be offered; and in this belief she is countenanced by most of the primitive fathers of the church, if not by several passages of Scripture. Works of supererogation, with their consequent indulgences and dispensations, which were once so profitable, and afterwards so fatal to the church of Rome, are utterly abolished in the Greek church; nor does she lay claim, with her daughter of Rome, to the character of infallibility. Predestination is a dogma of this church; but if viewed in the same light by her members in general, as amongst the people of Russia, namely, 'as depending on the attribute of prescience in the Divine nature,' few, I presume, will find much difficulty in subscribing to their doctrine on this most intricate subject. They consider the Septuagint as the authentic version of the Old Testament; acknowledge the eighty-five apostolical canons as of great authority; receive nine provincial councils; and allow to the canons of the first seven oecumenical or general councils nearly the same authority that is due to the sacred Scriptures. They observe a great number of holy days, and days of abstinence; and they keep four fasts in the year more solemn than the rest, of which that of Lent is the chief. It is even said, that there is not a day in the year, which, in their church, is not a fast or a festival. They have twenty-two fixed and immovable feasts, besides those of the church of England. They use the cross to drive away evil spirits, &c.; and many of them abstain from things strangled, from blood, and from such other meats as are forbidden in the Old Testament.

Church-government, Discipline, Revenues, &c. The Greek church bears a striking resemblance to that of Rome, with regard not only to its burthensome ceremonies, but to its government and discipline. Both are episcopal, and in both is the same division of the clergy into secular and regular; the same spiritual jurisdiction of bishops and their officials; and the same distinction of offices and rank.

The supreme head of the Greek church is the patriarch of Constantinople, who is styled the 13th apostle, and whose usual title, when he subscribes any letter or missive, is, 'by the mercy of God, Archbishop of Constantinople, the New Rome, and Œcumenical Patriarch.' The right of electing him is invested in twelve bishops who reside nearest that capital; but the right of confirming the election, and of enabling the newly-chosen patriarch to exercise his spiritual functions, belongs only to the Turkish emperor. The office is very uncertain, as it is frequently obtained by bribery and corruption; and when a higher bidder appears, the possessor is often displaced. Yet, it is both honourable and lucrative, and of high trust and influence; for, besides the power of nominating the other three patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and all episcopal dignitaries, the Constantinopolitan patriarch enjoys a most extensive jurisdiction and dominion, comprehending the churches of a considerable part of Greece, the Grecian isles, Walachia, Moldavia, and several of the European and Asiatic provinces that are subject to Turkey. He not only calls councils by his own authority, to decide controversies, and direct the affairs of the church; but, with the permission of the Turkish emperor, he administers justice, and takes cognizance of civil causes among the members of his own communion. For the administration of ecclesiastical affairs, a synod, convened monthly, is composed of the heads of the church resident in Constantinople.

The patriarch of Alexandria resides generally at Cairo, and exercises his spiritual authority in Egypt, Nubia, Libya, and part of Arabia. Damascus is the principal residence of the patriarch of Antioch, whose jurisdiction extends to Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia, and other provinces. The patriarch of Jerusalem comprehends, within the bounds of his pontificate, Palestine, part of Arabia, the country beyond Jordan, Cana in Galilee, and Mount Sion. The episcopal dominions of these three patriarchs are extremely poor and inconsiderable. The revenue of the patriarch of Constantinople is drawn particularly from the churches that are subject to his jurisdiction; and its produce varies according to the state and circumstances of the Greek Christians, whose condition is exposed to many vicissitudes. 'The bishops depend entirely upon a certain tax, levied upon each house within their districts inhabited by Greeks; and they are universally charged with the interest, at least, of large sums, accumulated for ages, in consequence of money (avaniás) levied on the patriarchate, to which each diocese is bound to contribute its quota. By such burthens, the revenues are so diminished as to leave to the most opulent bishop, little more,' says Mr. Dallaway, 'than 300*l.* a year.' The same defalcation of their original incomes is said to extend throughout the whole ecclesiastical state, from the prelates to the parochial papas, or priests.

The power of the chief patriarch is maintained, on the one hand, by the authority of the Turkish emperor, and on the other, by his right of excommunicating the disobedient members of the Greek church. His influence with the Porte is very extensive, as far as his own nation is concerned.

Countries where found, Numbers, &c.—The Greek church is of the highest antiquity; and, including all its branches, its doctrine prevails at this day over a greater extent of country than that of any other church in the Christian world, and is supposed to be professed by about 30,000,000 of souls. It is professed throughout a considerable part of Greece, the Grecian Islands, Walachia, Moldavia, Sclavonia, Egypt, Nubia, Libya, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia, and Palestine; all of which are comprehended within the jurisdiction of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. At least one half, if not two-thirds, of the inhabitants of European Turkey are Greeks; and if all these be Christians, their number must be very considerable, notwithstanding the harsh treatment, and many hardships to which for several ages they have been exposed from the Turkish government.

Eminent Men, &c.—Almost all the fathers of the first four ages, down to Jerome, were of Greece, Syria, and Africa; and of these, Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenæus, Origen, Justin, and Chrysostom, were all of them great men, some of them learned and eloquent, and all of them luminaries and ornaments of the Greek church, except Irenæus, who was bishop of Lyons, but was a Grecian, and wrote in Greek. To these may be added, Basil, bishop of Cæsarea; Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria; and Gregory of Nazianzen, surnamed the Divine, who was one of its most illustrious ornaments, and died about the end of the fourth century. But, if we descend to later times, a different scene will open upon us; for nothing can be conceived more deplorable than the state of the greater part of the Greeks, ever since their subjection to the oppressive yoke of the Ottomans. Since that fatal period, almost all learning and science, human and divine, have been extinguished among them. Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 291, &c.; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 479, &c.; Dallaway's Constantinople, p. 100, &c.

GREEK CHURCH IN RUSSIA, &c. Rise, History, &c.—Of those independent Greek churches which are governed by their own laws, and are in communion with the patriarch of Constantinople, but not subject to his jurisdiction, the church established in Russia alone is of any importance in the Christian world; the rest, namely the Georgians and Mingrelians, are sunk in the most deplorable ignorance and barbarity that can be imagined.

The accounts which have been given of the introduction of Christianity into Russia, are extremely fabulous and absurd. Some have pretended, that this country was converted by the apostle St. Andrew. Another tradition, equally groundless, and still more absurd, reports, that St. Anthony of Padua converted the Russians to the Christian faith; and that the saint swam over the Levant on a great mill-stone, and then rode upon it to Novogorod! What we learn with most appearance of probability is, that the grand duchess Olga, or Olha, grandmother to Wladimir, was the first person of distinction converted to Christianity in Russia, about the year 955, and that, at her conversion, she assumed the name of Helena, under which name she still ranks as a saint in the Russian calendar. After the accession of Wladimir to the throne, and his marriage with Anna, a Christian princess, daughter of the Greek emperor Romanus II., he, in the year 988, was baptized, with 20,000 of his subjects. Whether Olga or Anna had the honour of converting Wladimir, it is fully ascertained that, about the end of the tenth century, the Christian religion was introduced into Russia, chiefly through their connection with Greece; and coming from this quarter, it was natural that the doctrine and discipline of the church of Constantinople should become at first the pattern of the church of Russia, which it still continues to follow in the greatest part of its offices. Hence also the patriarch of Constantinople formerly enjoyed the privilege of a spiritual supremacy over the Russians, to whom he sent a metropolitan whenever a vacancy happened. But in the year 1588, Jeremiah, patriarch of Constantinople, yielding to the desire of the czar Theodore Wanovitz, and the entreaties of the clergy, placed at the head of their church and nation an independent patriarch, on the terms that every new patriarch of Russia should inform the patriarch of Constantinople of his elevation and obtain his confirmation. From this obligation of depending on a foreign jurisdiction for confirming his installation, the patriarch of Moscow was exempted by the four Eastern patriarchs, about the middle of the following century.

Peter the Great introduced a considerable change in the manner of governing the church. The splendid dignity of patriarch, which approached too near the lustre and prerogatives of majesty, was suppressed in 1721, by this spirited monarch, who declared himself, and thus became (like the sovereign of Britain,) head of the national church.

In Russia are Lutherans, Calvinists, Hernhutters, Armenians, Jews, Mahometans, Pagans, Hindoos, &c. &c. all of whom are tolerated in their religious opinions. Roman Catholics are to be met with in almost every government, particularly in the parts conquered from Poland; their clergy are governed by their own rulers, and are totally independent of the Russian ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

Distinguishing Doctrines.—This church agrees in almost every point of doctrine with the Greek church subject to the patriarch of Constantinople. With regard to baptism, they do not differ in any thing from the church of Rome. They do not rebaptize proselytes from any communion of Christians, except those who are unsound in the doctrine of the Trinity; and all others are admitted members of their church, on their submitting to the mystery of the holy chrism.

Worship, rites, and ceremonies.—In addition to the forms and services of the Greek church, most of which the Russians have always used, they still retain various ceremonies and superstitions of their own. At present, however, instead of strictly observing all the canonical hours, they have service in both monasteries and parish churches, only three times a day; namely, the vespers, the matins, and the liturgy or communion. The church service, in general, is performed in the Slavonian language; but in some places it is performed also in the Greek, both ancient and modern; and in the administration of the Lord's Supper they use the liturgies of St. Basil and St. Chrysostom. The Greek church does not allow any musical instruments; but the rhythm observed in singing the hymns produces a melody, with which the ear may be very well entertained.

The Russians, with their mother church, have four lents annually, besides a great number of abstinences or fasts, and Wednesdays and Fridays, which are fish-days throughout the whole year. The first lent comprehends the forty days previous to Christmas; the second, which is their great lent, the same space of time before Easter; the third, called the lent of St. Peter, commences the week after Pentecost, or Whitsunday, and ends on the feast of St. Peter, June 29th; and the fourth, the lent of the mother of God, begins on the first and ends on the fifteenth of August, which is the day of Koimesis, or the assumption of the blessed Virgin.

Sect of Raskolniki, or Ibraniki.—Though no person is excluded from any office or employment under the Russian government on account of his religious tenets, yet as the sovereign and the imperial family always conform to the Greek church, and no Russian who has been educated in it can lawfully depart from it, it may, with propriety, be called the established church. Though in Russia are Pagans, Mahometans, and Christians of various denominations, yet it does not appear that any schismatics or sects separated from the Russian church, till about the middle of the sixteenth century; before which time there were scarcely any printed books in Russia, and the manuscripts were then miserably incorrect. To remedy this evil, the czar John Basilides caused a considerable number of the church books to be printed and distributed for the use of the churches in 1562. As the newly-printed copies were corrected, they differed considerably from the manuscripts; and this excited amongst the ignorant people a religious zeal, which was kept up by equally ignorant or designing clergy. But the external troubles of those times prevented the Raskolniks from spreading to any extent, till about the middle of the following century, when, in the time of the czar Alexis Michaelovitz, the same causes produced the same effects, and the number of the Raskolniks increased to a very great degree.

This is the only sect of which we have heard, that has separated from the established church in Russia; and it seems to have been formed on very frivolous grounds. Its members assume the name of Ibraniki, that is, the multitude of the elect; or, according to others, Straoivertsi, that is, believers in the ancient faith: but the name given them by their adversaries, and that by which they are generally known, is Raskolniki, that is, schismatics, or the seditious faction. In defence of their separation, they allege the corruptions, in both doctrine and discipline, that have been introduced into the Russian church. They profess a rigorous zeal for the letter of Holy Scripture, which they do not understand; and the transposition of a single word in a new edition of the Russian Bible, though this transposition was intended to correct an uncouth phrase in the translation commonly received, threw them into the greatest tumult. They will not allow a priest to administer baptism, after having tasted spiritous liquors; and in this, perhaps, they act rightly, since it is said 'that the Russian priests seldom touch the flask without drinking deep.' They hold, that there is no subordination of rank, no superior or inferior among the faithful; that a Christian may kill himself for the love of Christ; that Hallelujah must be only twice pronounced, and it is a great sin to repeat it thrice; and that a priest must never give a blessing except with three fingers. They are regular, even to austerity, in their manners; but as they have always refused to admit Christians of other denominations into their religious assemblies, they have been suspected of committing in them various abominations, which ought not to be believed without the strongest demonstrative proof. They have suffered much persecution; and various means have been used to bring them back into the bosom of the church, but in vain. Arguments, promises, threatenings, dragoonings, the authority of synods and councils, seconded by racks and gibbets, in a word, all the methods that artifice or barbarity could suggest, have been practised; but these, instead of lessening, have increased their numbers, and, instead of closing, have widened the breach. Some wealthy merchants and great lords are attached to this sect; and it is widely diffused among the peasants. It ought to be added that the members of this sect consider the worship of images as gross idolatry; and, perhaps, this practice in the Russian church was one reason of their separating from it. Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 344; *Mosheim's Eccles. H.

HAB

HABA'KKUK, חבקוק, Ἡμβακούκ, signifies he that embraces; otherwise, wrestler. Nothing is certainly known concerning the tribe or birth-place of Habakkuk. He is supposed to have prophesied about the year 605 before Christ, and to have been alive at the time of the final destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. It is generally believed, that he remained and died in Judea.

The genuine works of Habakkuk are contained in three chapters. In these he complains pathetically of the disorderly conduct of the kingdom of Judah. God reveals to him, that he would very shortly punish it severely by the arms of the Chaldeans, or Babylonians. He foretels the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar, his metamorphosis, his death, and what would happen after his death to the Chaldeans. He foretels, that the vast designs of Jehoiakim should be frustrated. He speaks against a prince, who built his palaces with blood and iniquity; probably meaning the king of Tyre. He accuses another king with having intoxicated his friend in order to discover his nakedness; by whom he probably meant the king of Egypt. Habakkuk composed an ode, in which he recollected God's remembrance of his mercy, even when he is most angry; he hopes that God will show him his brethren in their captivity, but will deliver him out of it, and save him from the hands of the Chaldeans, when they ravage Judea. He prophesied at the same time as Jeremiah.

The style of Habakkuk is highly poetical, and the ode or hymn is, perhaps, unrivalled for united sublimity, simplicity, and piety. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. vol. i. p. 127.

HABIT, a power and ability of doing any thing, acquired by frequent repetition of the same action. 'Man,' says Dr. Paley, 'is a bundle of habits. There are habits of industry, attention, vigilance, advertency; of a prompt obedience to the judgment occurring, or of yielding to the first impulse of passion; of extending our views to the future, or of resting upon the present; of apprehending, methodising, reasoning; of indolence and dilatoriness; of vanity, self-conceit, melancholy, partiality; of fretfulness, suspicion, captiousness, censoriousness; of pride, ambition, covetousness; of over-reaching, intriguing, projecting: in a word, there is not a quality or function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature.' All habits are only the result of so many particular acts, or particular sensations: and thus their acquisition is greatly facilitated, and the labour of acquiring them reduced. If any particular habit could be acquired only by one great and sudden exertion of strength, it could be accomplished only by a few of more than ordinary vigour and capacity. But as all habits are the result of repeated acts, which, though small in themselves, amount collectively to a great mass of force, so every habit may be supposed to contain a certain portion of difficulty which every new effort, or act agreeable to the habit that we wish to acquire, tends to diminish. Every act of temperance, justice, benevolence, or any other virtue, of which we wish to acquire the habit, lessens the difficulty of the next, and augments the force of the infant habit, till by a long succession of acts, it becomes established in a maturity of strength, and, by the same gradual exertions by which we acquire good, we may conquer bad habits. The force of any particular habit, is the accumulated product of all the preceding acts.

If, therefore, we wish to break the force and deliver ourselves from the tyranny of any vicious habit, we must begin with attacking it in particular instances, we must endeavour to liberate ourselves from its attractions by degrees. We must carefully watch the times, the circumstances, and the associations, in which we have found the temptations to it most powerfully active, and least easily subdued. If, instead of obeying, we strenuously oppose those inclinations to every gratification which is incompatible with innocence, with the dictates of temperance, of truth, of justice, and humanity, the force of those inclinations will not only be weakened by every defeat, but at the same time the counteracting force of the reason and the conscience will derive fresh power from every victory over the seductive enemy. By every practical exertion of the principle of virtue, that principle is rendered more steady and consistent. Habits of virtue are the best safeguard against acts of vice. Habits of temperance, of truth, of justice, of humanity, afford the surest protection against every commission of intemperance, falsehood, injustice, and inhumanity. Every immoral act tends to render the conscience less sensitively alive to the differences of good and evil, less impressed with the dread and the shame of a vicious course of life, while every act of virtue renders the will more averse to, and the moral sense more awakened by the deformity of its opposite.

Habits are like plants, which make the most healthy and durable shoots under a lowering and tempestuous sky. They flourish most amidst circumstances apparently the most adverse to their growth. Habits of goodness formed amidst temptations to the contrary acts, are those on which we can place the firmest reliance, and which give the fairest promise of vigour and of permanence. Habits of temperance, of truth, of justice, of humanity, which are affectionately cherished, and strenuously matured, amidst the most seductive allurements to intemperance and lust, to falsehood, to extortion, to rapine, and to cruelty, are less likely to degenerate, than those which have grown up amidst fewer difficulties and discouragements.

As the habit of righteousness requires great length of time, vigilance of mind, and labour of exertion to acquire, the habit of unrighteousness requires both time, vigilance, and the strenuous exercise of all our moral powers to overcome. He who will unlearn any vicious habit, which he may have acquired, must totally give up his thoughts, his mind, and heart, and will, to the doing of those things which are contrary to the habit that he wishes to reduce. The habit of intemperance can be withstood and finally mastered only by frequent acts of sobriety; the habit of lust, by the practice of a rigid continence; that of covetousness, by perseverance in repeated acts of liberality. As the conversion of the unrighteous implies a thorough change of the mind and heart, as it requires the expulsion of all irreligious notions and prejudices from the one, and of all impure desires from the other, it cannot be accomplished in any short time. It must proceed from small beginnings; and these beginnings must be cautiously watched, and the utmost care taken that we be not surprised by the temptations to those sins which we are labouring to subdue, but that we be continually on our guard against them; that we firmly maintain the ground which we have obtained; and, instead of resting idly at any point of distance from our old habits, to which we have attained, that we use it as a means of removing still farther from their reach, and of making greater and greater advances in real goodness. Above all, we should fervently and frequently pray to God, for the assistance of his grace, to enable us to break off those sins which most easily beset us, and to guide and direct us in the path of holiness and true righteousness. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. pp. 58, 59, &c.; Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 48, 49.

HA'DAD, הַדָּד, signifies noise, clamour, cry of mariners; otherwise, nipple, or friendship. Hadad, son to the king of East Edom, was carried into Egypt by his father's servants, when Joab, general of David's troops, extirpated the males of Edom. Hadad was then a child. The king of Egypt gave him a house, lands, and every necessary subsistence, and married him to the sister of Tahpenes, his queen. By her he had a son, named Genabath, whom queen Tahpenes educated in Pharaoh's house, with the king's children. Hadad being informed that David was dead, and that Joab was killed, desired leave to return into his own country. Pharaoh wished to detain him, but at last permitted his return to Edom. Here he began to raise disturbances against Solomon; but the Scripture does not mention particulars.

Josephus says, that Hadad did not return to Edom till long after the death of David, when Solomon's affairs began to decline, by reason of his impieties. He also observes, that not being able to engage the Edomites to revolt, because of the strong garrisons which Solomon had placed there, Hadad got together such people as were willing, and carried them to Razon, then in rebellion against Hadadezer, king of Syria. Razon received Hadad with joy, and assisted him in conquering part of Syria, where he reigned, and from whence he insulted Solomon's territories.

HA'GAR, הָגָר, signifies stranger, or that fears, or that ruminates. Hagar, an Egyptian servant to Sarah, the wife of Abraham. Sarah, seeing herself old and barren, gave her servant to Abraham for a wife, that by her he might have children. (Gen. xvi.) Hagar, finding herself pregnant, despised her mistress Sarah. Therefore Sarah complained to Abraham, who answered her, Thy servant is in thy hands, do with her as thou pleasest. Sarah having used her harshly, Hagar fled from the dwelling of Abraham, but an angel of the Lord finding her in the wilderness, commanded her to return to her mistress, and humble herself towards her; adding, for her encouragement, I will greatly multiply thy race, &c. Hagar discovering that it was an angel who had spoken to her, said, Is it possible then for me to live, after having seen the Lord? She called the well, therefore, where she had been accosted by him, Beer-lahai-roi, or the well of him who liveth and seeth me. She returned to Abraham's house, submitted to Sarah, and was delivered of a son, whom she named Ishmael.

About fourteen years after this, in the year of the world 2108, Sarah brought forth Isaac. Abraham was then 100 years old. Isaac being weaned, Ishmael, who was then seventeen years of age, was teasing Isaac, so that Sarah desired Abraham to expel Hagar and her son. Abraham was greatly afflicted at this proposal; but the Lord appeared to him and said, Agree to Sarah's request, in Isaac shall thy seed be called; yet, I will make Ishmael the father of a great people, because he is sprung from thee. Abraham, therefore, rising in the morning, took bread and a bottle of water, and sent away Hagar with her son. Hagar intended to return into Egypt, but lost her way, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. The water in her bottle failing, she left Ishmael under one of the trees in the wilderness; and going a short distance from him, she sat down, saying, I will not see him die. She then lifted up her voice and wept. But the angel of the Lord calling to Hagar, comforted her, and showed her a well of water, of which she took some to Ishmael, and gave him to drink. She afterwards retired to the wilderness of Paran, where they dwelt. Ishmael became very expert at the bow; and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman.

We know not when Hagar died. The rabbins say that she was Pharaoh's daughter; but St. Chrysostom asserts, that she was one of those slaves that Pharaoh gave to Abraham. (Gen. xii. 16.) The Chaldee paraphrasts, and many of the Jews, believe Hagar and Keturah, to be the same person; but this is not credible. Philo thinks that Hagar embraced Abraham's religion; which is very probable.

The Mussulmans and Arabians, who are descended from Ishmael, the son of Hagar, speak highly in her commendation. They call her in eminence, Mother Hagar, and maintain that she was Abraham's lawful wife, the mother of Ishmael, his eldest son, who as such possessed Arabia, which very much exceeds, say they, the land of Canaan, given to his younger son Isaac.

According to St Paul, Hagar may symbolize the synagogue, which produces only slaves. (Gal. iv. 24.)

HAGARENES, or HA'GARITES, הַגָּרִיטִים, Ἀγαρίοι, of the family of Agar. The Hagarenes were the descendants of Ishmael. They are also called Ishmaelites, and Saracens, or Arabians, from their country. Their name, Saracens, is not derived, as some have thought, from Sarah, Abraham's wife, but from the Hebrew sarak, which signifies to rob or steal, because they chiefly carry on the trade of thieving; or from Sahara, the desert, and hence Saracens, inhabitants of the desert.

The Hagarenes dwelt in Arabia Felix, according to Pliny. Strabo joins them with the Nabathæans, and Chauloteans, in Arabia Deserta. Others think their capital was Petra, and that they should be placed in Arabia Petræa. Psalm lxxxiii. 6. joins them with the Moabites; 1 Chron. v. 10. says that the sons of Reuben, in the time of Saul, made war against the Hagarenes, and conquered their country, east of the mountains of Gilead. This therefore was their true and ancient country. When Trajan came into Arabia he besieged the capital of the Hagarenes, but could not take it. The sons of Hagar valued themselves on their wisdom. (Baruch iii. 23.)

HAG'GAI, הַגֵּי, Ἀγγάγας, signifies feast, solemnity. Haggai, the tenth of the minor prophets, was one of the Jews, who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, in consequence of the edict of Cyrus; and it is believed, that he was born during the captivity, and that he was of the sacerdotal race. The book of Haggai consists of four distinct revelations, all of which took place in the second year of Darius, king of Persia, which was the 520th year before Christ. The prophet reproves the people for their delay in building the temple of God, and represents the unfruitful seasons which they had experienced as a divine punishment for this neglect. He exhorts them to proceed in the important work; and by way of encouragement, he tells them, that the glory of the second temple, however inferior in external magnificence, shall exceed that of the first, which was accomplished by its being honoured with the presence of the Saviour of mankind. He again urges the completion of the temple by promises of divine favour, and under the type of Zerubbabel, he is supposed to foretell the great revolutions which shall precede the second advent of Christ.

However, by the assistance of a gloss added in the Septuagint to the conclusion of Haggai's prophecy, Dr. Heberden has attempted to limit the whole prophecy to the temple then building, and to its actual duration till the time of Herod. The gloss inserted in the Septuagint version, is as follows: 'And in this place I will give peace, saith the Lord of Hosts: (Also peace of mind for a possession, to every builder, in order to restore this temple.)' The doctor translates the gloss thus: 'And in this place I will give peace—(of mind for a possession, to every one who forwards the building, for the sake of restoring this temple.)' 'Here,' says Dr. Hales, 'the doctor has mutilated the passage, by dropping the important words, which distinguish the future peace of the prophecy, from the present peace of the gloss; thereby suppressing the former entirely. His whole interpretation, therefore, built on this suppression of evidence, falls to the ground as a false and dishonest fabrication.' It is, however, observable, that the Arabic version of the passage gives the same meaning, as that put upon it from the Septuagint by Dr. Heberden. The passage is thus translated in the Arabic version of the London Polyglot: 'And in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord Almighty; I say, peace of mind for a possession to every one that laboureth to erect this temple.' But it is also to be observed, that the Latin translation of the Arabic version, agrees in general with the Septuagint.

The style of Haggai is in general plain and simple; but in some passages it rises to a considerable degree of sublimity. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 128; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. part i. p. 515.

HAGIOGRAPHIA, holy scriptures, which deserve respect, whether they are truly inspired, or whether they only treat of holy things, and are written after the manner of Holy Scripture. The Hebrews distinguish the canonical books of the Old Testament into three classes: 1. The Law; 2. The Prophets; 3. The Hagiographa, or Chethubim.

The Chethubim, or Hagiographa, comprehended the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, reckoned as one, and the two books of Chronicles, also reckoned as one book. They are called Chethubim, or Holy Writings, because they were not orally delivered, as was the Law of Moses; but the Jews affirm that they were composed by men who were divinely inspired, though they had no public mission as prophets, and the Jews conceive that they were dictated, not by dreams, visions, or voice, or in other ways, as were the oracles of the prophets, but that they were more immediately revealed to the minds of their authors. It is remarkable, that Daniel is excluded from the number of prophets, and that his writings, with the rest of the Hagiographa, were not publicly read in the synagogues, as were the Law and the Prophets: this is ascribed to the singular minuteness with which he foretold the coming of the Messiah, before the destruction of the city and sanctuary, (Dan. ix.) and to the apprehension of the Jews, lest the public reading of his predictions should lead any to embrace the doctrines of Jesus Christ. Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. p. 162; Hottinger's Thesaurus, p. 510; Leusden's Philologus Hebræus, Diss. ii. pp. 13—22; Bishop Cosin's Scholastical History of the Canon, c. ii. pp. 10, et seq.

HAIL, STONES OF. Hail, no doubt, is congealed, frozen, drops of rain; rain formed into ice by the power of cold in the upper regions of the atmosphere. It probably falls from clouds which are pretty high in the air, and the drops coalescing in their fall, are formed into masses smaller or larger, as circumstances combine them. Hail, among us, is most frequent in summer. This is probably because the upper regions of the air are then coldest, and the vapours drawn from the earth being then warmest, when they are cooling or chilled, they proceed to the state of congelation with greater rapidity than vapours that have not been warmed; besides, their warmth elevates them higher in the atmosphere, as by that means they are raised with proportionately greater force, and this impulse mounts them into regions where cold has greater activity than in other regions.

Hail was among the plagues of Egypt. (Exod. ix. 24.) Hail, though uncommon, is not absolutely unknown in Egypt. Volney mentions a storm of hail, which he saw crossing over from Mount Sinai into that country, and some of whose frozen stones he gathered.

Hail was the means used by God, for defeating the armies of the kings of Canaan. (Josh. x. 11.) God's judgments are likened to a hail-storm. (Isaiah xxviii. 2.)

The most tremendous hail mentioned in Scripture is that alluded to Rev. xvi. 21., where every stone is said to be about the weight of a talent. In the Philosophical Transactions mention is made of hail as large as pullets' eggs. Mezeray, in his History of France, says, that in Italy, in 1510, was a dreadful storm of hail-stones, some of which weighed one hundred pounds. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exod. ix. 18.

HAM, or CHAM, חם, signifies brown. Ham, son of Noah, and brother to Shem and Japheth, is believed to have been Noah's youngest son. One day, when Noah had drunk wine, Ham perceived his venerable parent lying in his tent, and indecently exposed, which he turned into ridicule. Noah, when he awoke, said, as it is in the Arabic version, 'Cursed be Ham, the father of Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be to his brethren.' The phrase 'a servant of servants,' signifies the lowest of servants. How remarkably has the prophecy been fulfilled of the slavish subjection of Ham's posterity in general, to the Shemites, and Japhethites, from the earliest ages even to the present time!

'Ham,' says Dr. Hales, 'signifies burnt or black, and this name was peculiarly significant of the regions allotted to his family. To the Cushites, or children of his eldest son, Cush, were allotted the hot southern regions of Asia, along the coasts of the Persian Gulf, Susiana or Chusistan, Arabia, &c.; to the sons of Canaan, Palestine and Syria; to the sons of Misraim, Egypt and Libya, in Africa. The Hamites in general, like the Canaanites of old, were a sea-faring race, and sooner arrived at civilization and the luxuries of life, than their simpler pastoral and agricultural brethren of the other two families. The first great empires of Assyria and Egypt were founded by them; and the republics of Tyre, Sidon, and Carthage, were early distinguished for their commerce: but they sooner also fell to decay: and Egypt, which was one of the first, became the last and basest of the kingdoms, (Ezek. xxix. 15.) and has been successively in subjection to the Shemites and Japhethites, as have also the settlements of the other branches of the Hamites.'

Though the Scripture does not always give exactly the same account as we find in other writings of the sons of the patriarchs, or in other words, of the heads and fathers of nations, yet there is frequently a wonderful and striking coincidence. The following extract is from the History of the World, translated from the Khelassut ul Akhbar, of Khondemeer: 'In the Rozitul Suffah it is written, that God bestowed on Ham nine sons: Hind, Sind, Zenj, Nuba, Kanaan, Kush, Kopt, Berber, and Hebesb; and their children having increased to an immense multitude, God caused each tribe to speak a different language; wherefore they separated, and each of them applied to the cultivation of their own lands.' Here we find nine sons, instead of the four given in Scripture. Hind must be the origin of perhaps the Hindoos; Sind, of the nations bordering on the Indus; Zenj is perhaps Zanguebar, in eastern Africa; Nuba, the origin of the Nubians in Africa; Kanaan, and Kush, the same as those in Scripture; Kopt, the Egyptians, who would therefore seem to have been called Copts, from a father of this name; Berber, the Barabari, beyond Nubia, and remotely Barbary; Hebesb, Abyssinia, which is still denominated Habesh, by the Turks and Arabs. We find, then, that Hind, Sind, and Kanaan, with more or less of Kush, remained in Asia, though Africa was the allotted portion of Ham. With this agrees in part the tradition of the Brahmins, who acknowledge that they are not originally of India, but came into India through the pass of Heridwar, or Hardwar. This also contributes to account for the finding of Hamite kingdoms in western Asia. It may also be observed, that it is said, 'God caused each tribe to speak a different language; wherefore, they separated.' This restricts the interference of the Deity in the confusion of tongues to the sons of Ham, and is probably the true import of the Mosaic history of that event; not all mankind on the face of the earth, but all connected with Shinar and its population.

The Indian accounts are no less corroborative of the Mosaic geography; and this representation can never be suspected of being drawn, by any medium whatever, from the writings of the great Hebrew legislator. 'We now come,' says captain Wilford, 'to the sons of Ham, the Hasyasilas, or Habashis, who are mentioned, I am told, in the Puranas, though but seldom; and their name is believed to have the following etymology: Charma, having laughed at his father Satyavrata (Noah), who had by accident intoxicated himself with a fermented liquor, was nicknamed Hasyasila, or the Laugher; and his descendants were called from him Hasyasilas, in Sanscreeet, and, in the spoken dialects, Hasyas, Hanselis, and even Habashis; for the Arabic word Habesh is supposed by the Hindoos to be a corruption of Hasya. By those descendants of Charma they understand the African negroes, whom they suppose to have been the first inhabitants of Abyssinia: and they place Abyssinia partly in the Dweepa of Cush, partly in that of Sancha Proper.' Cush, says Moses, was the eldest son of Ham. The land of Cush was encompassed by the Gihon, one of the rivers of Paradise, which some have placed at the head of the Indus. It is very remarkable, that the north of India is denominated in the Sanscreeet geography, CUSHA-Dweepa, or the continent of Cush. It appears, that there are two Cusha-Dweepas: that of India is Cusha-Dweepa within; one in Africa is called Cusha-Dweepa without. 'Cusha-Dweepa without,' says captain Wilford, 'is Abyssinia and Ethiopia; and the Brahmins account plausibly enough for its name, by asserting that the descendants of CUSHA, being obliged to leave their native country, from them called CUSHA-DWEEPA within, migrated into SANCHA-DWEEPA, and gave to their new settlement the name of their ancestor.' By Sancha-Dweepa is here meant Egypt; but this is not the only name by which Egypt was known to the Sanscreeet writers. The second son of Ham was Misraim; and it appears from the Sanscreeet, that the name derived from him by which Egypt is distinguished in Scripture, is equally applied in India to that country.

Thus it is evident, that the geographical documents preserved in Holy Writ, are in perfect unison with the most ancient histories of those people who had, after the inspired writers, the most authentic sources of information. *Sacred Geography; Geograph. HAM'AN, חמאן, signifies noise, tumult; otherwise he that prepares. Haman was son of Hammedatha an Amalekite, of the race of Agag, according to our English Bible and the Vulgate; or, according to the Septuagint, son of Hamadath, the Bugæan or Gogæan, that is, of the race of Gog: or it may be read, Haman, the son of Hamadath, which Haman was Bagan, or Bagoas, eunuch, that is, servant, to the king of Persia. We have no proof that Haman was an Amalekite, but Esther iii. 1. reads of the race of Agag. In the apocryphal additions to the book of Esther (xvi. 10.) he is called a Macedonian; and so he might be, as Mr. Pool observes, from his birth or habitation, though from his origin he was of another people.

King Ahasuerus having received Haman into favour, promoted him above all the princes of his court, who bent the knee to him, or probably prostrated themselves wholly before him as to a deity, when he entered the palace. This Mordecai the Jew declined; for which slight Haman plotted the extirpation of the whole Jewish nation which was providentially prevented. Haman was hanged upon a gibbet fifty cubits high, which he had prepared for Mordecai. His house was given to queen Esther, and his employments to Mordecai. His ten sons were also executed. See ESTHER and MORDECAI.

HAN'ANI, חנני, anani, signifies my grace, my mercy; otherwise, he has showed me mercy. Hanani, a prophet who came to Asa king of Judah, and said, (2 Chron. xvi. 7.) Because thou hast put thy trust in the king of Syria, and not in the Lord, the army of the king of Syria is escaped out of thine hands. We know not on what occasion the prophet spake thus; but Asa ordered him to be seized and imprisoned. Some suppose that this Hanani was father to the prophet Jehu; but this does not appear clear from Scripture. Jehu prophesied in Israel, Hanani in Judah. Jehu was put to death by Baasha, king of Israel, who died in the year of the world 3075; and Hanani reprov'd Asa king of Judah, who reigned from the year of the world 3049 to 3090.

HANANI'AH, חנניא, signifies grace, mercy, gift of the Lord. HANANIAH, one of the three young men of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family, who, being carried captives to Babylon, were selected for instruction in the sciences of the Chaldeans, and to wait in Nebuchadnezzar's palace. The name of Hananiah was changed into Shadrach, under which name he is famous for his refusal to worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadnezzar. (Dan. iii. 4, &c.)

HANANIAH, son of Azur, (Jerem. xxviii. 1.) a false prophet of Gibeon, who coming to Jerusalem in the fourth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the year of the world 3409, said to Jeremiah and all the people, Within two full years I will bring again into this place all the vessels of the Lord's house, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath carried to Babylon. At the same time, Hananiah took hold of the chains, or yokes, which Jeremiah wore about his neck, as emblems of the future captivity of Judah, and breaking them, said, Thus saith the Lord, even so in two years will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon. Jeremiah answered, Thou hast broken the yokes of wood, but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron; thou shalt die this year, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord. Hananiah died within the year.

HAND, sometimes denotes the vengeance of God. 'The hand of the Lord was heavy upon them of Ashdod,' after they had taken the ark. (1 Sam. v. 6, 7.)

To pour water on any one's hands, signifies to serve him. (2 Kings iii. 11.)

To wash one's hands, denotes innocence. Pilate washed his hands to denote his being innocent of the blood of Jesus. (Matt. xxvii. 24.)

To kiss one's hand is an act of adoration. (1 Kings xix. 18.) 'If I beheld the sun when it shined, and my mouth hath kissed my hand,' says Job. (xxxi. 27.)

To fill one's hands, is to take possession of the priesthood, to perform the functions of that office; because in this ceremony, those parts of the victim which were to be offered, were put into the hand of the newly-created priest. (Judg. xvii. 5, 12; 1 Kings xiii. 33.)

To lean upon any one's hand, is a mark of familiarity and superiority. The king of Israel had a confidant on whom he thus leaned. (2 Kings vii. 17.) The king of Syria leaned on the hand or arm of Naaman when he went up to the temple of Rimmon. (2 Kings v. 18.)

To lift up one's hand, is a way of taking an oath which has been in use among all nations.

To give one's hand, signifies to grant peace, to swear friendship, to promise entire security, to make alliance. (2 Kings x. 15.) The Jews say, (2 Macc. xiii. 22.) they were obliged to give the hand to the Egyptians and Assyrians, that they might procure bread; that is, to surrender to them, to submit.

The right hand, as a distribution of space, with the Hebrews, generally denotes the south.

To stretch out one's hand, signifies to chastise, to exercise severity or justice. (Ezek. xxv. 7.) God delivered his people with a high hand, and arm stretched out; by performing many wonders, and inflicting many chastisements on the Egyptians.

To stretch out one's hand, sometimes denotes mercy. 'I have spread out my hands (intreated) all the day unto a rebellious people.' (Isai. lxv. 2.)

Hand is also frequently taken for the power and impression of the Holy Spirit felt by a prophet. 'The hand of the Lord was on Elijah.' (1 Kings xviii. 46.) It is said, that God gave his law by the hand of Moses, that he spoke by the hand of prophets, &c. that is, by their means, by them, &c.

HAN'NAH, חנה, signifies gracious, merciful; or he that gives. Hannah was the wife of Elkanah, of the tribe of Levi, who dwelt at Ramah, or Ramathaim-zophim in Ephraim. (1 Sam. i. 2, &c.) Elkanah going to Shiloh, to worship there, took with him his two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. Peninnah had children, who accompanied her to the feast; but Hannah had none. Elkanah having offered his sacrifice, which he had provided out of pure devotion, made an entertainment for his family before the Lord, and gave parts of it to Peninnah for herself and children: but to Hannah, his well-beloved wife, he gave only one portion of it, because she had no children. Hannah, therefore, was melancholy; and her rival Peninnah increased her affliction, by reproaching her with barrenness. Elkanah comforted her; but Hannah went alone to the tabernacle, to pour out her heart before the Lord. She vowed, that if God would bless her with a son, she would give him unto God all the days of his life.

As she was very fervent in her devotion, the high priest Eli believed she had been drinking to excess, and said to her, How long wilt thou be drunken? put away thy wine from thee. Hannah answered, Pardon me, my lord, I am a woman overwhelmed with affliction; I have drunk no wine, nor any thing that could intoxicate, but have been pouring forth my heart before the Lord. Eli, therefore, said to her, go in peace, and the God of Israel grant thee thy petition. Hannah went away, took nourishment, and was no longer dejected. After this they returned to Ramah; Hannah conceived, and had a son, whom she called Samuel, because she had asked him of the Lord.

Hannah went not to the tabernacle, till she had weaned her son, when she brought him thither, in compliance with her vow. She took three bullocks, three measures of flour, and a bottle of wine. Having made her offering and prayer, she presented her son to the Lord, and committed him to Eli, whom she reminded of her former petitions. Hannah also composed an ode of thanksgiving, in which she exalts the power of God's mercy, who dispenses fruitfulness or barrenness as he pleases. (1 Sam. ii.) The history of Hannah, after she had thus disposed of Samuel, is unknown.

HANUN, חֲנָן, ḥannan, signifies gracious, merciful, or he that rests. Hanun, son of Nahash king of the Ammonites, is famous for his insult to David's ambassadors, who came to compliment him after his father's death. (2 Sam. x.; 1 Chron. xix.) David, exasperated at this dishonourable treatment, declared war against the Ammonites, and sent Joab against them. The Ammonites procured assistance from Syria, and from beyond the Euphrates; but Joab, giving part of the army to his brother Abishai, attacked the Syrians, while Abishai fought the Ammonites. They conquered the enemy on both sides. David being informed of this success, passed the river Jordan in person, with the rest of his troops, and defeated the Syrians in a pitched battle.

The year following, David sent Joab to besiege Rabbah their capital. During this siege, David committed the sin of adultery with Bathsheba, and procured the death of Uriah by the Ammonites. When the city was reduced to extremities, Joab informed David, who came with the rest of Israel, took the city, enslaved the inhabitants, and carried off a great booty.

HAPPINESS. The word happy, when applied to any state or condition of human life, will admit of no positive definition; but is merely a relative term: that is, when we call a man happy, we mean that he is happier than some others, with whom we compare him; than the generality of others; or than he himself was in some other situation. Happiness does not consist in the pleasures of sense; as eating, drinking, music, painting, architecture, gardening, theatric exhibitions, &c. These pleasures continue only a short time; by repetition they lose their relish, and by high expectation, frequently bring disappointment. Nor does happiness consist in an exemption from labour, care, business, &c.; such a state is often attended with depression of spirits, imaginary anxieties, and the whole train of hypochondriacal affections. Nor is it to be found in greatness, rank, or elevated stations; for if all superiority afforded pleasure, it would follow that the greater our superiority, the greater would also be our happiness. But do we not observe the deepest misery and the most distressing inquietudes among the richest, the most elevated, and most distinguished sons of men? In what then does happiness consist, or where is it to be found? Only where the wise king of Israel was convinced that it resides, and where both reason and revelation teach us that it ought more especially to be sought; in a religious and virtuous course of life. Though we are far from depreciating the value of those sensible enjoyments which are compatible with sobriety and innocence, yet the experience of life, the deductions of reason, and the injunctions of religion, oblige us to confess that it is only in a virtuous conduct, or in a life regulated by the precepts of virtue and religion, in which happiness consists, and true joy is to be found.

Religion is not that sour and forbidding thing, which men of weak and superstitious minds are apt to imagine it to themselves, or to represent it to others. On the contrary, it is the only way to happiness; and true serenity, and true joy of heart, cannot so certainly be produced by anything else. That religion which Christ taught and practised, has nothing to do with gloominess of look, or dejection of soul; with a life spent in melancholy musings, or devout austerities, which render us insensible to the social sympathies, and to the happiness of others. On the contrary, there is a degree of cheerfulness and gaiety which is the natural product of religion. The genuine fruits of religion, according to the apostle, are 'love, joy, peace;' and what sensations can be more delightful than these?

joyed without any detriment to our health, or any reproach on our innocence, at the same time enjoins the culture of those habits, and the practice of those duties, which we shall find a source of the purest and most permanent satisfaction and delight. Has the belief in a God, in a Being who made and who governs the world, any natural tendency to make us gloomy and dejected? Does it not rather tend to allay our uneasy doubts, to calm our troubled thoughts, to reconcile us to the uncertainties of life, and to the manifold changes and chances of the world? In whatever may befall us, must it not assuage our sorrow to reflect, that nothing can happen to us without the permission of Him who is infinitely wise and good, and that consequently, whatever may be its present appearances or effects, it must be ultimately beneficial? Trust in God is in itself a most pleasurable feeling; it is a stay in misery, a refuge from every care. Must it not greatly alleviate the sorrows of humanity to think that this life is only designed as preparatory to a better; that it is the infancy of our being; and a place of trouble which conducts to a scene of rest? What can be more enlivening than the hope of a happy immortality? Christ is the true Physician of souls; and there is no evil to which we can be subject, for which his doctrine will not be found to contain a remedy. In whatever light we view the Christian dispensation, we shall find that there is no one duty which it enjoins, of which the performance is not, on the whole, greatly conducive to our happiness; and though it lead not to wealth or honour, it has a necessary tendency to produce that inward peace and satisfaction, that heartfelt cheerfulness and delight, for the want of which wealth and honour cannot make amends, and for the possession of which they are only a poor substitute. Fellowes's Body of Theol. vol. ii. p. 520, &c.; Paley's Moral and Politic. Philosophy, vol. i. p. 21, &c.

HAR'AN, הָרָן, signifies mountain, or mountainous country; otherwise, which is inclosed; otherwise, song, cry.

HARAN, eldest son of Terah, and brother to Abraham and Nahor. Haran was father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah. Nahor married Milcah; and Abraham, according to several interpreters, married Sarah, otherwise called Iscah; but this second name of Sarah is very dubious. Haran died before his father Terah; a circumstance which had not occurred among mankind till this time. Epiphanius says, that Haran was smitten by God, as a punishment to his father Terah, who had invented the figures of new gods. The rabbins tell us, that Haran was accused by Terah for refusing to adore the deity fire, and was condemned to be cast into a burning furnace, where he was consumed in the presence of his father. Others say, that Abraham having set fire to the place where Terah's idols were, Haran attempted to rescue them from the flames, and was himself consumed by them.

HARAN, CHARRAN, or CARRHÆ, in Mesopotamia, a city to which Abraham first retreated after he had left Ur; and where Terah, Abraham's father, died and was buried. (Gen. xi. 31, 32.) Thither also Jacob retired to Laban, when he fled from his brother Esau. (Gen. xxvii. 43.)

This city is commonly placed in Mesopotamia; but several geographers, and among them Dr. Wells, have included it in Chaldaea. Stephen (Acts vii. 2, 3, 4.) says, that 'God appeared to Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Carrhæ:—then came he out of the land of the Chaldæans, and dwelt in Carrhæ.' Hence it clearly appears, that Carrhæ was out of the land of the Chaldæans. It is, therefore, argued by some, that the Greek Mesopotamia, of which Carrhæ was the metropolis, could not possibly be the Mesopotamia alluded to by Stephen. Carrhæ was not only in Mesopotamia, usually so called, but was also the metropolis of this province. Unless, then, we could deprive this city of its dignity as the proper, the ancient metropolis of this province, we must admit another Mesopotamia, from which Abraham removed to Carrhæ; and this the inspired martyr seems carefully to distinguish, by annexing the remark 'before he dwelt in Carrhæ.' The character of Carrhæ, or Haran, could not be unknown to Stephen. Sacred Geography, Geog. Index.

HARE. This animal resembles a rabbit, but is rather larger. Moses ranks it among unclean creatures, because it divides not the hoof, though it chews the cud. (Lev. xi.)

It appears, that solipedes, or animals of one hoof, as the horse and the ass, are unclean: that fissipedes, or animals of hoofs divided into two parts, are clean; but then this division must be entire, not partial, effective not apparent; and besides its external construction, its internal, its anatomical construction, must also correctly correspond with this formation. Moreover, animals whose feet are divided into more than two parts are unclean, so that the number of their toes, as three, four, or five, is an entire rejection of them, whatever other quality they may possess. Such is the principle of the Levitical distinction of animals into clean and unclean, so far as relates to their feet. Their rumination is a distinct character; but a character absolutely unavailing without the more obvious and evident marks derivable from the construction of their members.

Hence the hare, whose feet are divided by three clefts into four toes, is declared unclean. The difficulty with respect to this animal is, that Moses says the arnebeth, which is translated hare, chews the cud. This our hares do not; and in this particular, we have no ancient testimony respecting hares. Either, then, this word means a creature of the hare kind, not known among us in Europe, or the hare of Asia does in some degree ruminant. Both these ideas may be correct: the arnebeth of Moses may be of this kind, yet a different creature from our hare; and it may ruminant. Yet, we must remark, that interpreters are agreed that the creature meant in this passage is the hare; and the Arabs at this day call the hare arneb, erneb, eraneb. However, the Septuagint translate the word by δαρπύς, which Aristotle and Pliny seem to describe differently from the hare. But Bochart, and the lexicographers think, that the hare is really designed by this word. From a hint in Prov. xii. 27, Mr. Harmer is of opinion that the Israelites did not always abstain from the hare. Harmer's Observations, vol. ii. p. 96; Scripture Illustrated, Exposit. Index, p. 51, &c.

HARP, a stringed musical instrument. The Hebrew word kinnor, which is translated harp in our English version, very probably denoted all stringed instruments. By the Hebrews, the harp was called the pleasant harp; and it was employed by them not only in their devotions; but also at their entertainments and pleasures. Those who have heard it, as animated by Ancient-British vivacity, will probably think, that it was quite as well calculated for mirth, as for solemnity. It is probable, that the harp was nearly the earliest, if not the earliest, instrument of music. David danced when he played on the harp. The Levites did the same. Hence it appears, that it was light and portable, and that its size was restricted within limits which admitted of that service, and of that manner of using it. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cexxxii. p. 130; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. iv. 21.

HARVEST, the time of reaping corn. It appears, that in Palestine the harvest takes place according to the duration of the rainy season. After the rain ceases, the corn soon arrives at maturity. Much depends on the time of its being sown. Corn also remains in the fields long after it is ripe; and the threshing, which is performed in the open air, interrupts the harvest. When Mariti was at Jericho in the beginning of April, wheat was not only in full ear, but began to turn yellow, and to ripen. Dr. Shaw informs us, that it always ripens later than barley; that at Jericho and Ptolemais, it is ripe about the end of the month of April; but that at Bethlehem and Jerusalem it is still later. It must, however, be observed, that Dr. Shaw visited Palestine in a year in which the harvest was late. Hasselquist says, that wheat is cut down in the month of May, in Galilee. Barley is frequently not all cut down before May.

The prophet Amos says, 'I have withholden the rain from you, when there were yet three months to the harvest, and I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city: one piece was rained upon, and the piece whereupon it rained not withered. So two or three cities wandered unto one city, to drink water; but they were not satisfied.' (Amos iv. 7, 8.) God suspended the rain, not only to punish them with want of bread, but with thirst; for in that country they have only cistern-water; and therefore if the divine anger suspended the rains, there was danger of perishing by thirst as well as by famine. According to Dr. Shaw, the cisterns of that country are usually filled in the month of February. 'It is an observation,' says the doctor, 'at or near Jerusalem, that provided a moderate quantity of snow falls in the beginning of February (whereby the fountains are made to overflow a little afterwards), there is the prospect of a fruitful and plentiful year: the inhabitants making, upon these occasions, the like rejoicings with the Egyptians upon the cutting of the Nile.' Harmer's Observations, vol. i. p. 77, &c.; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary.

HATE. To hate is not always to be understood rigorously, but frequently signifies merely a lesser degree of love. 'If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated,' that is, less beloved. (Deut. xxi. 15.) Our Saviour says, that 'he who would follow him, must hate father and mother,' that is, he should love them less than Christ, less than his own salvation, and not prefer them to God. Solomon says, 'he that spareth the rod, hateth his son.' Fathers often spare their children from excessive love to them; but to forbear correcting them, is improper affection. Paul says, 'no one hateth his own flesh;' his own person, his life, his relations, &c. 'Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated,' that is, loved less.

HATTEMISTS, a Dutch denomination, which arose in the seventeenth century. They derive their name from Pontium Van Hatten, a minister in the province of Zealand. He interpreted the Calvinistic doctrine concerning absolute decrees, so as to deduce from it the system of a fatal and uncontrollable necessity. Having laid down this principle to account for the origin of all events, he denied the difference between moral good and evil, and the corruption of human nature. Hence he concluded that mankind were under no sort of obligation to correct their manners, to improve their minds, or to endeavour after a regular obedience to the divine laws; that the whole of religion consisted not in acting, but in suffering; and that all the precepts of Jesus Christ are reducible to this single one—that we bear with cheerfulness and patience the events that happen to us through the Divine will, and make it our constant and only study to maintain a permanent tranquillity of mind. This denomination also affirmed, that Christ had not satisfied the Divine justice, nor made an expiation for the sins of men by his death and sufferings; but had only signified to us, by his mediation, that there was nothing in us that could offend the Deity. They maintained that this was Christ's manner of justifying his servants, and presenting them blameless before the tribunal of God. This opinion was peculiar to the Hattemists, and distinguished them from the Verschorists. They also taught, that God does not punish men for their sins, but by their sins. Mosheim, vol. iv. pp. 553, 554.

HAV'ILAH, חַוִּילָה, signifies lamenting, or bringing forth; otherwise, their speakings, or their giving notice; or, as Simon thinks, terror, dismay, that is, to enemies.

HAVILAH, son of Cush, (Gen. x. 7.) peopled, according to Bochart, the country where the Tigris and Euphrates reunite, and discharge themselves together into the Persian Gulf. This is thought by some to be the land of Havilah, (Gen. xxv. 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7.) which reached as far as Shur, over against Egypt. The sons of Ishmael 'dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria.'

It is, however, to be observed, that by this Havilah, the paraphrast Jonathan on Gen. x. 29, and the Chaldee paraphrast on Chronicles, understand India. Jonathan says, that 'the name of the first river is Phison, which environs the whole land of India (Indike,) where there is gold, and the gold of that land is excellent;' by which some think to be intended India at the head of the Indus, and not the present Hindoostan. Sacred Geography.

HAVILAH, son of Joktan, (Gen. x. 29.) according to Calmet, in all probability, peopled Colchis, and the country encompassed by the river Pison. Some, however, place this Havilah in Arabia, and they think that Gen. xxv. 18. and 1 Sam. xv. 7. may refer to this Havilah, which appears to have been of considerable extent. It was situated, say they, between the southern extremity of the Dead Sea and Egypt, probably in the tract between the wilderness of Paran, and the desert of Shur. Sacred Geography.

HA'VOTH-JA'IR, חַוּתֵּי יַעַר, signifies cities of illumination, or annunciation of light; or, more probably, the villages of Jair, deriving their appellation from the name of their proprietor Jair. (Numb. xxxii. 41.) They were in the Batanæa, beyond Jordan, in the land of Gilead, and belonged to the half-tribe of Manasseh.

HAU'RAN, חֲרֹר, is supposed to signify extremely white. Ezekiel (xlvii. 16.) speaks of Hauran as a district situated north-east of the Holy Land. It is supposed to be the same as Iturea. St. Luke (iii. 1.) says, that Philip was tetrarch of Iturea and the Trachonitis. Josephus says, that he possessed Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis; where Auranitis and Iturea are put one for the other. St. Jerome says, that Hauran is a city in the wilderness belonging to Damascus. An Arabian geographer, mentioned by Reland, places the land of Hauran or Auran, south of Damascus; and Abulfeda says, that Bozra is the capital of the country of Hauran. Golius in his notes on Abulpharagus, observes, that the Syrians and Arabians call that part of the land Hauran, where Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee is situated. William of Tyre calls it the Auranitis. It is certain that the Auranitis was beyond Jordan.

HAZ'AEL, חֲזַאֵל, signifies that sees God. The prophet Elijah, (1 Kings xix. 15.) at Mount Horeb, received orders from God to go and anoint Hazael king of Syria. The prophet returned home for this purpose, but it does not appear that he himself executed this commission. Yet Elisha, many years afterwards, foretold to Hazael that he should reign over Syria. (2 Kings viii. 13.) Hazael had been sent by Benhadad to inquire of Elisha whether he should recover; the prophet, foreseeing his cruelty, wept; Hazael inquired the cause; which, when he knew, he could not think it possible such barbarity should lurk in his heart. The Lord, said Elisha, hath revealed to me that thou shalt be king of Syria. Hazael returned to the king his master, and told him he would recover. The next day, he spread over the king's face, or person, a cloth dipped in water, which might perhaps have been recommended as a cure for the disorder. However, Benhadad immediately died, and Hazael usurped the throne. See BENHADAD.

Hazael, without delay, executed on Israel all the evils which Elisha had foretold. When Jehu broke up the siege of Ramoth-Gilead, Hazael took advantage of his absence, fell on his territories beyond Jordan, and destroyed the land of Gilead, Gad, Reuben, and Manasseh, from Aroer to Bashan. Many years passed without Hazael's attacking the kingdom of Judah, because it was more remote from Damascus; but he began to distress it in the reign of Joash, son of Jehoahaz. He took Gath, and marched against Jerusalem. Joash perceiving himself unable to resist Hazael, gave him all the money that was in his treasury, and in the treasures of the house of God, to purchase his absence; but the year following, Hazael returned against Judah and Jerusalem, slew all the princes, and sent a very rich spoil to the king of Syria. The Syrian army was not numerous; but God delivered up to it the inhabitants of Judah; and Joash himself was treated by the Syrians with the utmost ignominy. Hazael did not spare the king of Israel any more than the king of Judah; but the particulars are not distinctly known. He died about the same time as Jehoahaz, king of Israel, (2 Kings xiii. 1.) and was succeeded by his son Benhadad, in the year of the world 3165.

HEAD. This word has several significations, besides its natural one, which denotes the head of a man. It is sometimes used in Scripture for the whole man: 'Blessings are upon the head of the just,' that is, upon their persons. (Prov. x. 6.) God says of the wicked, 'I will recompense their way upon their head.' (Ezek. ix. 10.) It is taken for life: 'Ye shall make me endanger my head to the king.' (Dan. i. 10.) It signifies a chief or capital city. 'The head of Syria is Damascus.' (Isai. vii. 8.) It denotes a chief or principal member in society. 'The Lord will cut off from Israel head and tail. The ancient and honourable, he is the head.' (Isai. ix. 14, 15.) 'The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent,' that is, Christ Jesus, the blessed seed of the woman, shall overthrow the power, policy, and works of the devil. (Gen. iii. 15.) The river in Paradise was divided into four heads, or branches. (Gen. ii. 10.) 'The stone which the builders rejected was made the head of the corner;' (Ps. cxviii. 22.) that is, it was the first in the angle, whether at the top of that angle to adorn and crown it, or at the bottom to support it. This in the New Testament is applied to Christ, who is the strength and beauty of the church, to unite together its several parts, namely, both Jews and Gentiles.

Head is sometimes taken for poison, because the Hebrew rosch, which signifies head, also signifies poison. 'He shall suck the poison or head of asps.' (Job xx. 16.) It is certain, that the poison of serpents is concealed in bags, which lie in the roof of the mouth. This poison in the act of biting passes down a slit in the fang teeth, and is ejected into the wounds caused by them.

In times of grief, the mourners covered their heads; they cut and plucked off their hair. Amos (viii. 10.) speaking of unhappy times, says, 'I will bring baldness upon every head.' In prosperity, they anointed their heads with sweet oils: 'Let thy head lack no [perfumed] ointment.' (Eccles. ix. 8.)

To shake the head at any one, expresses contempt: 'The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn; the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee.' (Isai. xxxvii. 22.)

HEAR, HEARING. This word is used in several senses in Scripture. In its obvious and literal acceptation, it denotes the exercise of that bodily sense, of which the ear is the organ; and as hearing is a sense by which instruction is conveyed to the mind, and the mind is excited to attention, and to obedience, so the ideas of attention, and obedience, are also grafted on the expression, or sense, of hearing.

God is said, speaking after the manner of men, to hear prayer, that is, to attend to it, and comply with the requests it contains: 'I love the Lord, because he hath heard—hath attended to—hath complied with—the voice of my supplication.' (Psalm cxvi. 1.) On the contrary, God is said not to hear—that is, not to comply with—the requests of sinners. (John ix. 31.)

Men are said to hear, when they attend to, or comply with, the requests of each other, or when they obey the commands of God. 'He who is of God, heareth—obeyeth—practiseth God's word.' (John viii. 47.) 'My sheep hear my voice,' and shew their attention to it by following me. (John x. 27.) 'This is my beloved Son, hear ye him.' (Matt. xvii. 5.) This seems to be an allusion to Deut. xviii. 15, 18, 19: 'The Lord shall raise up unto you a prophet, him shall ye hear;' which is also expressly applied in Acts iii. 22.

The other senses which may be attached to the word hear, seem to rise from the preceding, and may be referred to the same ideas. To hear signifies to judge; to settle a matter. (2 Sam. xv. 3.) 'Thy matters—words—pleadings are good and right, but there is no man deputed by the king to hear thee;' that is, the king by office should hear and do justice between man and man, but David holds every thing under his own cognizance, though he is able to do justice to only a small part of those who want it, and he will not delegate his power to any one who might in his stead distribute equity. The caution to 'take heed how we hear,' or 'what we hear,' as it includes application, reception, and practice, was never more necessary than at present among ourselves; never was the necessity greater for appealing 'to the law and to the testimony.'

HEART. The Hebrews regarded the heart as the source of wit, understanding, love, courage, grief, and pleasure. Hence are derived infinite ways of speaking. 'An honest and good heart,' (Luke viii. 15.) is a heart studious of holiness, being prepared by the Spirit of God to receive the word with due affections, dispositions, and resolutions. We read of a broken heart, a clean heart, an evil heart, a liberal heart. To harden one's heart; to lift up one's heart to God; to beseech him to change our stony hearts into hearts of flesh. To love with all one's heart, &c. 'To turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers,' (Mal. iv. 6.) signifies to cause them to be perfectly reconciled, and that they should be of the same mind.

To want heart, sometimes denotes to want understanding and prudence: 'Ephraim is like a silly dove, without heart.' (Hosea vii. 11.) 'O fools and slow of heart;' that is, ignorant and without understanding. (Luke xxiv. 25.) 'This people's heart is waxed gross,—lest they should understand with their hearts,' (Matt. xiii. 15.) the heart of this people is stupified, destitute of understanding. 'The prophets prophesy out of their own hearts,' (Ezek. xiii. 2.) that is, according to their own imaginations. To lay any thing to heart, to set one's heart on any thing, signifies to remember it, to apply one's self to it, to have it at heart. 'No one layeth it to heart,' (Jerem. xii. 11.); no one concerns himself about it.

The heart is dilated by joy, contracted by sadness, broken by sorrow, grows fat, and is hardened in prosperity. The heart sometimes resists truth; God opens it, prepares it, turns it as he pleases. To steal one's heart, (Gen. xxxi. 20. 26.) is to do any thing without one's knowledge. The heart melts under discouragement, forsakes one under terror, is desolate in amazement, and fluctuating in doubt. To speak to any one's heart is to comfort him, to say pleasing and affecting things to him.

The heart expresses also the middle, solid, and substantial part of any thing. 'Tyre is in the heart of the seas,' (Ezek. xxxii. 4.) in the midst of the seas. 'We will not fear, though the mountains be carried into the heart (middle) of the sea.' (Ps. xlvi. 2.) 'As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth,' (Matt. xii. 40.) that is, the Son of man shall be an equal space of time in the solid rock; not drowned in the waters, nor buried in the moist earth, but entombed in the solid heart of rock. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccx. p. 40.

HEATH, a well-known shrub, that grows on barren moors; it 'knows not when good cometh,' doth not flourish in the spring, but towards the end of summer. Men are likened to heath, (Jer. xvii. 6.) and it also represents men in a destitute and concealed condition. In this passage, the Septuagint and Vulgate translate the word oror by tamarisk; some, 'a leafless tree;' and Parkhurst quotes from Taylor, 'a blasted tree, stripped of its foliage.' In Jer. xlviii. 6. the Septuagint read orud a wild ass. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary; Scripture Illustrated Expos. Index, p. 177; Parkhurst's Heb. Lexicon, p. 557.

HEATHENS, or the people of the earth at large; those who are not of the family of Israel, to which family pertained the law, and the sacred oracles, and the covenants of promises, and the descent of the Messiah, &c. It was customary with polished nations to call all others barbarians, and with the Jews to designate all other nations by the name of heathens, and to consider them as entirely void of any knowledge of God. But we ought to remember, that in early ages mankind had generally much the same knowledge of God; that it was not till after some time that the promise of the Messiah was restricted to a particular family, and a particular nation was favoured with peculiar privileges. We ought also to remember that many persons among those called heathen nations, possessed the true knowledge of God, and were perhaps no less acceptable as worshippers to him, than were the Jews, who, to much information, and knowledge of their duty, made often a very ungracious and ungrateful return.

It must, however, be owned, that, generally speaking, the heathens were sunk into gross idolatry, and adopted many impure modes of worship, were utterly averse from obedience to the holiness of God, and, in short, exhibited the depravity of the human race in its most shocking forms. But from men thus depraved God appointed a people to shew forth his praise, to be his memorials of mercy, and to glorify his grace, through the Messiah, who, though of the Jewish nation by descent, yet was the Messiah, the anointed, the chosen, the consecrated, on the behalf of all mankind, heathens as well as Jews; for God will justify the heathens through Him, while the Jews shall be punished for their unbelief. Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

HEAVEN. Heaven and earth, (Gen. i. 1.) are used to denote all visible things. As the word shamayim is plural, we may rest assured that it denotes more than the atmosphere, to express which some have endeavoured to restrict its meaning. The word heaven must therefore denote the whole solar system. The planets are really globes of land and water, like our earth, but by reason of their distance from us, we perceive them only by their refulgence, and to ordinary observation they appear as so many stars among the firmamental stars.

HEAVEN is often used for the air. 'The fowls of heaven' are the birds which fly in the air. (Job xxxv. 1.) The dew of heaven, the clouds of heaven, the wind of heaven, are expressions in which heaven is put for the air.

The God of the Hebrews is named, not only by the Jews, but also by heathens and foreigners, the God of heaven: because the Jews adored nothing visible, but said their God was in heaven; there was his throne, and there the seat of his sovereign dominion.

The heaven of heavens is the highest heaven, and is considered as the place of God's residence, the dwelling of angels and blessed spirits. It is also frequently called in Scripture the kingdom of heaven, and by St. Paul the third heaven. (2 Cor. xii. 2.) Sometimes it is denominated Paradise, the New Jerusalem, &c. This heaven is considered as a place in some remote part of infinite space, in which the Deity is pleased to afford a nearer and more immediate view of himself, a more sensible manifestation of his glory, and a more adequate perception of his attributes, than in other parts of the universe.

It has been disputed, whether there are degrees of glory in heaven. It is, however, more than probable, that in the future state of existence some good men shall receive a brighter crown than others; and that the reward will be in very different degrees, according to the various degrees of piety and virtue in the probationary state. It is reasonable to believe, that the recompence will bear a just proportion to every man's zeal, labour, and attainments in grace; and that an uncommon exemplary piety will be distinguished by a peculiar lustre. The general doctrine with the inspired writers is, that 'all the dead shall rise again at the last day, to be judged according to their works, and receive the things done in the body, whether good or bad.' This is not only an assertion, that good men shall be rewarded and wicked men punished in a future state, but also implies a variety of rewards and punishments proportioned to the virtues and crimes of mankind. The mother of the two sons of Zebedee seems to have been of opinion, that there will be various degrees of glory in the heavenly kingdom, or she would not have desired our Lord to confer on them so peculiar an honour as to sit the one on his right hand, and the other on his left, (Matt. xx. Mark x.) unless, perhaps, she alluded to a temporal kingdom, and wished that her sons might be his first favourites, and enjoy the highest honours in it. When Peter asked our Saviour what he and the other apostles should have for forsaking all and following him, he was answered, that 'when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, they shall sit on twelve thrones,' (Matt. xix. 28.) on account of their extraordinary labours and suffering; and that others, whose trials and labours were not so eminent, should enjoy a state of glory in a less degree: unless by this was meant the dignity which the apostles should possess in the church, after our Saviour's departure, and ascension into heaven. 'If any man,' says Christ, 'hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and sup with him;' (Rev. iii. 20, 21.) that is, every one who receives my doctrine shall enjoy my favour, both in this world and the next: but 'to him that overcometh,' or attains to an high and excellent degree of perfection, 'will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as also I overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne.' To such Christ will grant a peculiar privilege; place them near himself, and confer on them a very high honour. The great apostle observes, in his admirable discourse on the resurrection, that the glories of the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, are very different, and that one star shines with much more splendour than another; and he asserts, that there will be the same variety of glories in the resurrection of bodies from the grave. (1 Cor. xv.) Though the difference between the animal and spiritual body, and the inconceivable improvement of the state of those who shall attain to the resurrection of the just, is chiefly intended in this passage, yet the apostle does not forget the several degrees of glory which spiritual bodies shall possess above one another. This doctrine is agreeable to the whole tenor of the Gospel, which assures us of a future state, and expressly declares, that the just Judge of mankind will distinguish us in the day of recompence, according to our behaviour in this state of probation. Besides, the natural notions we have of justice, and of the attributes of God, convince us of the truth of this doctrine. Is it not just and right, that in judgment the degrees of virtue and vice should be considered; and the reward or punishment should be greater or less in proportion? The Judge of all the earth will do right; and when he sits upon his throne to administer justice to men and angels, will he not proportion the recompence to the degree and perfection of grace? Is it likely that such bloody champions as Samson and Jephthah should be equal in glory with meek Moses, who renounced all the pleasures and honours of Pharaoh's court, and rather chose to suffer affliction with the servants of the living God, than be reputed of the blood royal among idolaters? Or that an infant, which is capable neither of acting nor thinking, should be adorned with as bright and dazzling a crown as the zealous and laborious apostle of the Gentiles?

Another question has sometimes been proposed, whether the saints shall know one another in heaven?—St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Colossians (i. 28.) says, 'that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus.' By this the apostle may be understood to express his hope and prayer, that at the general judgment of the world, he might present to Christ the fruits of his ministry, the converts whom he had made to his faith and religion, and might present them perfect in every good work. This affords a manifest and necessary inference, that the saints in a future life will meet and be known to each other; for, without knowing his converts in their new and glorified state, St. Paul could not expect to present them at the last day. The general tenor of Scripture seems to suppose, that those who know each other on earth will know each other in heaven. When St. Paul speaks 'of the spirits of just men made perfect,' and of their 'coming to the general assembly of saints,' these expressions must mean, that we shall be known to them, and to each other. When Christ declares, 'that the secrets of the heart shall be disclosed,' the expression imports, that they shall be disclosed to those who were before the witnesses of our actions. It is also agreeable to the dictates of reason itself to believe, that the same Almighty Being who restores men to life, will bring those together whom death has separated. When his power is exerted in this great dispensation, it is very probable that this should be a part of his gracious design. St. Paul, as we have seen, expected that he should know and be known to his converts; that their relation should subsist, and be retained beyond the grave; and with this hope he laboured and endeavoured, instantly and incessantly, that he might be able at last to present them, and to present them perfect in Christ Jesus. What St. Paul appeared to look for with respect to the general continuance, or rather revival, of our knowledge of each other after death, every man who strives, like St. Paul, to attain to the resurrection of the just, may expect as well as he. In every passage of Scripture, in which it is implied that mankind shall know one another in a future life, the implication appears to extend only to those who are received among the blessed. Whom was St. Paul to know? Even those whom he was to present perfect in Christ Jesus. With respect to the reprobate and rejected, the Scriptures give no assurance or intimation whatever, whether they will not be banished from the presence of God, and from all their former relations; and whether they will not be lost, as to all happiness of themselves, so to the knowledge of those whom they knew in this mortal state. It is probable, that if the wicked be known to each other, in a state of perdition, their knowledge will serve only to aggravate their misery. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. i. 1; Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. i.; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, Essay viii.; Dr. Paley's Sermons, Sermon. xxxiv.

HEBER, עֵבֶר, signifies one that passes, or a passage; otherwise, anger, wrath. HEBER, or EBER, the son of Salah, was born in the year of the world 1723. Several have been of opinion, that from Heber, Abraham and his descendants were called Hebrews. But it seems much more probable, that this name was given to Abraham and his family, because they came from beyond Euphrates into Canaan. Heber in Hebrew signifies beyond or passage, that is, of the river Euphrates. Why should Abraham, who was the sixth in generation from Heber, take his name from this patriarch, rather than from any other of his ancestors? Why not, for example, rather from Shem, who is styled by Moses 'the father of all the children of Heber,' or of the other side of the Euphrates; Heber is not in any circumstance extolled in Scripture. Abraham is first called a Hebrew about ten years after his arrival in the land of Canaan, on occasion of the war with Chedorlaomer. The Septuagint and Aquila translate the word Heberi, Perates, or Peraites, which signifies a passenger, one who came from beyond the river. (Gen. xiv. 13.)

The ancients and moderns are divided on the question, whether the Hebrew tongue derives its name from Heber, and whether, on the confusion of languages at Babel, it continued only in the family of Heber? As the confusion of the languages was considered as a punishment for the temerity of those who undertook to build this tower, it is reasonable to presume, that Heber's posterity, which seemed to be designed by God for the stock of the holy family, and the true religion, had no share in this undertaking, nor consequently in its punishment. To this it is answered as follows: 1. No proof exists, that Heber's family was not concerned in building the tower of Babel. 2. The Hebrew tongue was the language of other people, who were not related to Heber's family: the Phœnicians or Canaanites, the Syrians and Philistines, in the time of Abraham, spoke Hebrew, or a language little different from it. Why then was it called the Hebrew language? It would appear, that if Abraham was called a Hebrew, because he came from beyond the Euphrates, then the Hebrew should be so called for that reason. But if the Hebrew language was named from a paternal stock, then the descendants from that stock might also derive their appellation from the same source. Calmet's Dictionary.

HE'BREWS, EPISTLE TO THE, a canonical book of the New Testament. Though the genuineness of the Epistle to the Hebrews has been disputed both in ancient and modern times, yet its antiquity has never been questioned. Though the author is not mentioned, yet it is generally allowed that there are references to it in the remaining works of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and Justin Martyr; and that it contains, as first noticed by Chrysostom and Theodoret, internal evidence of having been written before the destruction of Jerusalem.

The earliest writer now extant that quotes this Epistle as the work of St. Paul, is Clement of Alexandria, who lived at the end of the second, and the beginning of the third centuries. Clement quotes the authocity of his master Pantænus, who ascribed the Epistle to St. Paul, and endeavoured to account for the omission of the apostle's name at the beginning of it. Origen, Dionysius, and Alexander, both bishops of Alexandria, Ambrose, Athanasius, Hilary of Poitiers, Jerome, Chrysostom, and Cyril, consider this Epistle as written by St. Paul. It is also ascribed to him in the ancient Syriac version supposed to have been made at the end of the first century. Eusebius says, 'Of Paul there are fourteen Epistles, manifest and well-known; but yet there are some who reject that to the Hebrews, urging for their opinion, that it is contradicted by the church of the Romans, as not being St. Paul's.' Dr. Lardner says, 'It is evident that this Epistle was generally received in ancient times by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman empire.' In another place he observes, 'It was received as an Epistle of Paul by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and following centuries.' The earlier Latin writers do not notice this Epistle, except Tertullian, who ascribes it to Barnabas. It appears, indeed, from Jerome, that this Epistle was not generally received as canonical Scripture by the Latin church in his time. Yet many individuals of the Latin church, as Jerome himself, Ambrose, Hilary, and Philaster, acknowledged it to be written by St. Paul. The persons who doubted its genuineness were those the least likely to have been acquainted with the Epistle at an early period, from the nature of its contents not being so interesting to the Latin churches, which consisted almost entirely of Gentile Christians, ignorant, probably, of the Mosaic law, and holding little intercourse with the Jews.

The moderns, who, on grounds of internal evidence, contend against the genuineness of this Epistle, rest principally on the two following arguments; the omission of the writer's name, and the superior elegance of the style in which it is written. 1. It is, indeed, certain, that all the acknowledged Epistles of St. Paul begin with a salutation in his own name, and that in the Epistle to the Hebrews there is nothing of this kind. This omission, however, can scarcely be considered as conclusive against positive testimony. For departing on this occasion from his usual mode of salutation, St. Paul might have reasons, which we at this distant period cannot discover. Clement of Alexandria intimates, that as Jesus Christ himself was the peculiar Apostle to the Hebrews, as acknowledged in this Epistle, (iii. 1.) Paul declined, through humility, to assume the title of an Apostle. Jerome says, that Paul might not put his name in the inscription, because the Hebrews were offended at him; and in another place he observes, that Paul did not style himself apostle at the beginning of the Epistle to the Hebrews, because he should afterwards call Christ the High Priest and Apostle of our profession. Theodoret adds, that Paul being peculiarly the apostle of the uncircumcision, as the rest were of the circumcision, (Gal. ii. 9; Rom. xi. 13.) he scrupled to assume any public character when writing to their department. It is, however, clear, that the persons to whom this Epistle was addressed knew from whence it came, as the writer refers to some acts of kindness which he had received from them, (x. 34.) and also expresses a hope of seeing them soon. (xiii. 18, 19. 23.) 2. There does not appear such superiority in the style of this Epistle, as should lead to the conclusion that it was not written by St. Paul. Those who have thought differently have mentioned Barnabas, Luke, and Clement, as authors, or translators of this Epistle. The opinion of Origen was, that 'the sentiments are the apostle's, but the language and composition of some one else, who committed to writing the apostle's sense, and, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master.' Dr. Lardner says, 'My conjecture is, that Paul dictated the Epistle in Hebrew, and another, who was a great master of the Greek language, immediately wrote down the apostle's sentiments in his own elegant Greek; but who this assistant was, is altogether unknown.' Michaelis also observes, 'that the Greek style of the Epistle to the Hebrews is so very different from the style of St. Paul, that he cannot possibly have been the author of the Greek text.' But surely the writings of St. Paul, like those of other authors, may not all have the same precise degree of merit. If, upon a careful perusal and comparison, it should be thought that the Epistle to the Hebrews is written with greater elegance than the acknowledged compositions of this apostle, it should also be remembered, that the apparent design and contents of this Epistle suggest the idea of more studied composition. Yet, this Epistle contains nothing which amounts to a marked difference of style. On the contrary, there is the same concise, abrupt, and elliptical mode of expression; and it contains many phrases and sentiments which are found in no part of Scripture, except in St. Paul's Epistles. It may be further observed, that the manner in which Timothy is mentioned in this Epistle renders it probable that it was written by St. Paul. Compare Heb. xiii. 23. with 2 Cor. i. 1. and Col. i. 1. It was certainly written by a person who had suffered imprisonment in the cause of Christianity: and this is known to have been the case of St. Paul, but of no other person to whom this Epistle has been attributed. It, therefore, appears that both the external and internal evidence greatly preponderate in favour that St. Paul was the author of this Epistle; but absolute certainty on this point is not to be attained.

'They of Italy salute you,' is the only expression in this Epistle which can assist us in determining from whence it was written. The Greek words are οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας, which should have been translated, 'Those from Italy salute you;' and the only inference drawn from them seems to be, that St. Paul, when he wrote this Epistle, was at a place where were some Italian converts. Hence Michaelis is of opinion, that it was written out of Italy, but where, he knows not. Bishop Tomline, however, thinks, that this inference is not incompatible with the common opinion, that this Epistle was written from Rome. It is supposed to have been written towards the end of St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, or immediately after it, because the apostle expresses an intention of visiting the Hebrews shortly. The date of this Epistle is therefore placed in the year 63.

Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Jerome, thought that this Epistle was originally written in the Hebrew language; but all the other ancient fathers, who have mentioned this subject, speak of the Greek as the original work. Michaelis has composed an elaborate dissertation, to prove that it was originally written in Hebrew. But, as no one pretends to have seen this Epistle in Hebrew; as there are in reality no internal marks of the Greek being a translation; and as we know that the Greek language was at this time very generally understood at Jerusalem, we may accede to the more common opinion, both among the ancients and moderns, and consider the present Greek as the original text. Those who have denied the genuineness or the originality of this Epistle, have always supposed it to have been written or translated by some fellow-labourer or assistant of St. Paul; and almost every one admits that it carries with it the sanction and authority of the inspired apostle.

Some little doubt has arisen, to whom this Epistle was addressed; but by far the most general and most probable opinion is, that it was written to those Christians of Judea, who had been converted to the Gospel from Judaism. That, notwithstanding its title, it was written to the Christians of one certain place and country, is evident from the following passages; 'I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.' (Heb. xiii. 19.) 'Know ye not that our brother Timothy is set at liberty, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.' (xiii. 23.) It appears from the following passage in the Acts, (vi. 1.) 'when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews,' that certain persons were at this time known at Jerusalem by the name of Hebrews. They seem to have been native Jews, inhabitants of Judea, the language of which country was Hebrew; and hence they were called Hebrews, in contradistinction to those Jews who, residing commonly in other countries, though they occasionally came to Jerusalem, used the Greek language, and were therefore called Grecians.

This Epistle is a masterly supplement to the Epistles to the Galatians and the Romans, which are so obscured and involved, and upon which it is a luminous commentary. It shows that the legal dispensation was originally designed to be superseded by the new and better covenant of the Christian, in a connected chain of argument, which evinces the profoundest knowledge of both. This work, indeed, has extorted the admiration of the most learned Rabbins, as worthy of a pupil of Gamaliel. It was addressed to the Jewish converts of Palestine, to keep them steadfast in the faith, that they might not swerve under the persecutions they had already incurred from their unbelieving brethren; nor under the still heavier which they were to expect in the impending Jewish war, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the desolation of Judea, by the Romans. (ii. 1.; x. 32—37.; xii. 4—29.; xiii. 14.) Like the rest of St. Paul's Epistles, it concludes with a practical exhortation, peculiarly applicable to the Jewish nation, to cultivate brotherly love, to avoid covetousness, to beware of diverse and strange doctrines or heresies, and to do good, &c. HE'BRON, חֶבְרוֹן, ἡγεβρων, signifies society; otherwise, participation, or adhesion; otherwise incantation, or paleness. Hebron, or Chebron, was one of the most ancient of cities, and was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt. (Numb. xiii. 22.) As the Egyptians gloried much in the antiquity of their cities, and their country was indeed among the first peopled after the dispersion from Babel, it may be concluded, that Hebron was extremely ancient. Some think, that it was founded by Arba, an ancient giant of Palestine, and therefore was called Kirjath-arba, the city of Arba, (Josh. xiv. 15.) which name was afterwards changed into Hebron. Arba was father of Anak, from whom the Anakim derive their name. These were still dwelling at Hebron, when Joshua conquered Canaan. (Josh. xv. 13.) Some think, that this city was not called Hebron till it had been conquered by Caleb, who denominated it Hebron from one of his sons of the same name. Calmet is of opinion, that the name Hebron is more ancient; and that Caleb gave to his son the name of this ancient and celebrated place, where, perhaps, he was born: or perhaps he was born about the time this city came into Caleb's possession. Dr. Wells says, that it perhaps took its name from Hebron, one of the sons of Kohath, and grandson of Levi.

Hebron was situated upon an eminence, twenty miles south of Jerusalem, and twenty north of Beersheba. Abraham, Sarah, and Isaac, were buried near Hebron, in the cave of Machpelah. (Gen. xxiii. 7, 8, 9.) Hebron was allotted to Judah. The Lord assigned it to Caleb for his inheritance. (Josh. xiv. 13.) Joshua first took Hebron, and killed its king, named Hoham. (Josh. x. 3. 23. 37.) Afterwards, it was re-conquered by Caleb, who was assisted by the troops of his tribe, and by the valour of Othniel. It was appointed for a dwelling of the priests, and a city of refuge. After the death of Saul, David fixed here the seat of his government. At Hebron, Absalom began his rebellion. During the captivity of Babylon, the Edomites invaded the south of Judah, and took Hebron; and hence in Josephus it is sometimes made a part of Edom. Here Zacharias and Elisabeth are supposed to have dwelt, and John the Baptist to have been born.

'The city of Hebron,' says D'Arvieux, 'is seven leagues from Jerusalem southward. It may boast of being one of the most ancient cities in the world. It formerly stood on a hill to the north, but has insensibly changed its site in the course of its various rebuildings. A castle now stands on its highest elevation; and this is its only defence. Its inhabitants are Mahometans, and lay heavy contributions on the few Jews whom they, not without difficulty, suffer to inhabit here. The Turks have so great a veneration for this city, that they admit into it neither wine nor brandy. Water only is drunk in it. They call it El Katil, the 'well-beloved,' which is one of the titles they give to Abraham. The situation of this city is very agreeable, and its district is very fertile and plentiful. It abounds in vineyards, whose produce is excellent. The grapes are carried to Jerusalem, and make good wine. The country people make raisins of them, which are as yellow as gold, and of exquisite flavour. Generally speaking, the fruits have all the perfection that can be desired. There are in Hebron some manufactories of glass, of all colours. They make cups, bottles, flower-vases, &c. The city and its environs appertain to the government of Jerusalem, which maintains a Soubachi and a few soldiers to enforce the payment of its duties; but the populace is so mutinous that they rarely pay without force, and commonly a reinforcement from Jerusalem is necessary. The people are brave, and when in revolt extend their incursions as far as Bethlehem, and make amends by their pillage for what is exacted from them. They are so well acquainted with the windings of the mountains, and know so well how to post themselves to advantage, that they close all the passages, and exclude every assistance from reaching the Soubachi.' Volney thus describes Hebron: 'Hebron is seven leagues south of Bethlehem. The Arabs have no other name for this village than El-hali, the well-beloved, which is the epithet they usually apply to Abraham, whose sepulchral grotto they still show. Hebron is seated at the foot of an eminence, on which are some wretched ruins, the misshapen remains of an ancient castle. The adjacent country is a sort of oblong hollow, five or six leagues in length, and not disagreeably varied by rocky hillocks, groves of fir-trees, stunted oaks, and a few plantations of vines and olive-trees.'

Hebron is described in 1823, as being a large town, with a Turkish mosque erected over the supposed burial-place of the patriarchs. Carne's Letters, p. 280; Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 324; Scripture Geography; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 587; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 152.

HEIFER, a young cow. As the words ox and bull, in their figurative sense, signify rich and powerful persons, the great who live in affluence, and who forget God and condemn the poor; so by heifers are meant women who are rich, delicate, and voluptuous, and make pleasure their god. 'Israel slideth back, as a backsliding heifer.' (Hos. iv. 16.) The prophets Isaiah, (xv. 5.) and Jeremiah, (xlviii. 34.) give the cities of Zoar and Horonaim the epithets of 'heifers of three years old.' This in the opinion of some denotes their vivacity and indocility, and signifies that they are cities not to be governed, nor to be brought under the yoke. Others infer, that the strength and vigour of Zoar and Horonaim are meant; as if these cities knew their strength, and would not be subdued. Calmet thinks, that the Hebrew words Agola and Shalisha, 'an heifer of three years old,' denote two cities, one named Bethagla, and the other Baal-shalisha: the first was on the Dead Sea, (Josh. xv. 6.; xviii. 19. 21.) and the other is mentioned in 1 Sam. ix. 4.; and in 2 Kings iv. 42. Bishop Lowth on Isaiah xv. 5. observes, that the opinions of interpreters are various in regard to the meaning.

In the prophetic language, the Gentile nations are sometimes compared to heifers. 'Egypt is like a very fair heifer, but destruction cometh; it cometh out of the north.' (Jerem. xlv. 20.) He means the Chaldeans who were to subdue Egypt. Hosea says, (x. 11.) 'Ephraim is an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed over upon her fair neck. I will make Ephraim to ride.' The meaning is, I will tame her, and force her to submit to be yoked.

Samson (Judg. xiv. 18.) accuses the young men, his bride-men, with abusing the easy disposition of his wife, to get his secret from her: 'if ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle.' Moses ordains, (Deut. xxi. 3.) that if a murdered body be found within the liberties of any city, and the murderer be not known, the elders and judges shall sacrifice a heifer in that place. See MURDER.

HEIFER, RED, Sacrifice of the. The order respecting this service is given in Numb. xix. 2, &c.

Spencer believes that this ceremony was instituted in opposition to Egyptian superstitions. The Egyptians never sacrificed heifers; and the Hebrews generally sacrificed male creatures only. The Egyptians abhorred red hair, and all red animals: the Hebrews made no distinction in the colour of victims except on this occasion. St. Jerome and others thought the red heifer was sacrificed yearly, and the ashes of it distributed among the towns and cities of Israel. But some of the rabbins maintain, that only one was burnt from Moses to Esdras; and from Esdras to the destruction of the temple by the Romans only six, or at most nine. St. Jerome informs us, that this ceremony was always performed on the mount of Olives, directly over against the temple, after the ark was fixed at Jerusalem; the Jews say, that after the building of the temple, the high-priest always sacrificed this victim.

Some authors suppose, that the sacrifice of the red heifer was one of those offered in the name of all the people. It was required to be without blemish or defect; the blood of it was sprinkled seven times towards the entrance of the tabernacle; the whole body of it was burnt entirely: the ashes which remained were used in purifying from pollutions contracted by touching any dead body, and to prevent their defiling the sanctuary, and the holy things.

Abraham says, that the red heifer was a sacrifice for the sins of the whole people of Israel. Calmet thinks, that it may be called a sacrifice for sin, but not an oblation, as this name is proper only to what was offered solemnly to God on the altar of burnt-offerings. The same judgment should be formed of that other heifer, the head of which was cut off for the expiation of murder by persons unknown. This sacrifice, says Calmet, cannot be called an oblation, because not made on the altar of burnt-offerings; yet it was a real sacrifice for sin, since by it an atonement was made for a crime.

Mr. Bruce gives a curious account of the substitution and execration of a camel, which, perhaps, may have some reference to the sacrifice of the red heifer, though Mr. B. observes in this act traces of the azazel, or scape-goat of the Jews. 'We found,' says this interesting traveller, 'that, upon some discussion, the garrison and townsmen had been fighting for several days, in which disorders the greatest part of the ammunition in the town had been expended; but it had since been agreed on by the old men of both parties, that nobody had been to blame on either side, but the whole wrong was the work of a camel. A camel, therefore, was seized, and brought without the town, and there a number on both sides having met, they upbraided the camel with every thing that had been either said or done. The camel had killed men; he had threatened to set the town on fire; the camel had threatened to burn the Aga's house, and the castle; he had cursed the Grand Seigneur, and the Sheriffe of Mecca (the sovereigns of the two parties); and, the only thing the poor animal was interested in, he had threatened to destroy the wheat that was going to Mecca. After having spent great part of the afternoon in upbraiding the camel, whose iniquity, it seems, was nearly full, each man thrust him through with a lance, devoting him, diis manibus et diris, by a kind of prayer, and with a thousand curses upon his head. After which every man retired, fully satisfied as to the wrongs he had received from the camel.'

The red heifer sacrificed without the camp was a figure of Jesus Christ, whose blood cleanses our consciences from all sins. (Heb. x. 13.) When the red heifer was burned without the camp, its ashes were gathered and preserved in a clean place without the camp. Part of them were occasionally put into water, with which every one who had contracted any legal defilement was to be sprinkled; or he was to be cut off from the congregation. It was a water of separation. It is no where said in Scripture, that that water was used on the great day of expiation, if we except what the apostle observes in the Epistle to the Hebrews, (ix. 13.) Since, however, it is called the water of purification, (Numb. xix. 9.) and was always used when any particular person stood in need of cleansing, several have thought that it was employed also on that solemn day when the great body of the people were cleansed. *Supplem. HELIOPO'OLIS, Ἡλιόπολις, signifies the city of the sun; and in Hebrew it is called On, or Aun, which denotes force, riches, iniquity. The father-in-law of Joseph was high-priest of On, (Gen. xli. 45.) which is rendered Heliopolis by the Septuagint version, and is also noticed by Herodotus, who says that 'the Heliopolitans were reckoned the wisest of the Egyptians.' According to Berosus, this was the city of Moses; and if so, it well accounts for his character in Scripture, 'that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians.' (Acts vii. 22.)

This city was situated not far from the present Cairo. It still retains the name of Heliah, though some think Mattarea, its neighbour, may be the true On. It is famous for a fine obelisk, still standing, of considerable size, and nearly seventy feet in height, covered with hieroglyphics, but not equal in execution to some remaining in the south of Egypt. Several others, which formerly stood here, have been carried to Rome, or to Constantinople. This city was also famous for a temple of the sun, in which was a looking glass, so disposed that it reflected the rays of that luminary all day long, and enlightened the whole temple with great splendour. Hence the name Heliopolis is said to have been given to this city. A fountain of excellent water contributes to the celebrity of Heliopolis. Niebuhr places Mattarea about two leagues from Cairo. He says it is famous among the Christians for a sycamore, the trunk of which is said to have afforded shelter to the holy family when in Egypt. This sycamore would seem to have the power of renewing itself; for of the crowds of superstitious persons who visit it, each usually cuts off and carries away a piece. This village was formerly famous for the cultivation of those trees which produced the Egyptian balsam. The last died in the beginning of the seventeenth century. Ibn Haukal says, 'Ain-al-Shems, or Fountain of the Sun, lies to the south of Fostat.' Dr. E. D. Clarke visited the 'remains of Heliopolis, one of the most ancient cities of the world, of which a vestige can now be traced. More than eighteen hundred years ago, its ruins attracted the regard of the most enlightened travellers of Greece and Rome. Nearly thirty years before the Christian era they were visited by Strabo; and his description of them proves that the condition of this once famous seat of science was almost as forlorn then as at the present period. The sphinxes which Pococke saw, were a part of the identical antiquities noticed by Strabo so many centuries before.' 'In our way,' says the same learned traveller, 'we halted at Mattarea, a village which is generally believed to occupy a part of the ancient city. We then went to visit the renowned pillar of On, or obelisk of Heliopolis, (the only great work of antiquity now remaining in all the Land of Goshen,) standing upon the spot where the Hebrews had their first settlement.' Upon this superb monument are hieroglyphics rudely sculptured; and 'from the coarseness of the sculpture, as well as the history of the city to which this obelisk belonged, there is reason to consider it as the oldest monument of the kind in Egypt. Each of the four sides exhibits the same hieroglyphic characters, and in the same order.' Clarke's Travels, vol. v. pp. 137—144, fourth edition; Sacred Geography; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 376.

HELL, in Hebrew, שְׁאוֹל, scheol. This word in Scripture frequently signifies the grave, a depth under the earth, where the bodies of the dead rest. Jacob says, that he shall go down to the grave, or into hell. (Gen. xxxvii. 35.) Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, were swallowed up by the earth, and descended quick into hell, that is, they were buried alive. (Numb. xvi. 30. 33.) 'Our old English word hell, which though scarcely used but for the place of torment, yet being a derivative from the Saxon hilian or helan, to hide, or from hell, a cavern, anciently denoted the concealed or unseen place, of the dead in general.'

HELL is often put for the place of Divine punishment after death. As all religions have supposed a future state of existence after this life, so all have their hell, or place of torment, in which the wicked are thought to be punished.

Isaiah, (xiv. 9.) speaking to the king of Babylon, says, 'Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth.' Ezekiel, (xxxi. 15.) speaks nearly in the same manner to the king of Egypt. Here the rich man was buried: (Luke xvi. 22.) 'The rebellious angels were cast down into hell, and delivered into chains of darkness.' (2 Pet. ii. 4.)

The learned are divided with respect to the origin, and authors of those descriptions of hell, tartarus, the elysian fields, &c. which we read in the Greek and Latin fathers, concerning the state of souls separated from the body. Some pretend that the ancient Jews acknowledged only temporal rewards and punishments for virtue and vice. The law seems to promise no other. It threatens untimely and ignominious death, cutting off or extermination, excommunication, extinction of families, barrenness in the land, captivity and slavery, a heaven of brass, and an earth of iron, &c. but not hell and eternal death. It promises long life, a numerous family, plentiful harvests, fruitful flocks, profound peace, victory, riches, plenty, honours, but not eternal life, glory, paradise, &c. Some of the learned are of opinion, that after the Jews became conversant with the Greeks, they inquired into the representations of Homer and other poets respecting hell, tartarus, and the elysian fields; and that their doctors were divided in their sentiments, some adopting the Greek notions, others adhering to the ancient opinions of their nation. This division produced, they say, those sects which afterwards appeared among the Jews: the Pharisees and Essenes favoured the opinions of the Greeks; the Sadducees maintained their ancient Jewish traditions. Others think, that the Jews received these opinions from the Persians and Egyptians, rather than from the Greeks; because they obtained among them also, and there is a general prepossession, that the religion of the Greeks was derived from Egypt. These authors agree in their judgment of the Jews borrowing from other people their representations of hell and paradise; which the Christians received from them.

But on examining the Hebrew writings, we shall find them coinciding with the ancient Greeks, Homer, Hesiod, and others, their most ancient poets. Job, the Psalmist, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, very clearly mention hell as a place where the wicked are detained. Moses himself takes notice of a fire which is kindled in God's anger, and shall burn into the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundation of the mountains. (Deut. xxxii. 22.) And in another place, (Deut. xxx. 15.) 'I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil.' It is evident, that good men are not always rewarded in this life, neither are the wicked adequately punished. Moses, therefore, intended to point out another life, and another death, other goods and other evils. And if the Hebrews expected nothing after death, why should Balaam desire that his end might resemble theirs? 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.' (Numb. xxiii. 10.) The author of the book of Job (xxvi. 6.) says, 'Hell is naked before God, and destruction hath no covering.' Solomon, speaking of a debauched woman says, 'Her feet go down to death, her steps take hold on hell.' (Prov. v. 5.) The author of the eighty-eighth Psalm says to God, 'shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?' Here hell, destruction, and forgetfulness, are synonymous terms. The Heathens placed the river Lethe, or of forgetfulness, in hell. The prophet Isaiah was nearly contemporary with Hesiod and Homer. Ezekiel lived some time after them. It may, however, be affirmed, on very good grounds, that neither Isaiah nor Ezekiel had any knowledge of either their persons or their writings; and that they speak of hell, and the state of the dead, at least as clearly as those poets do, and in expressions almost similar. Isaiah, (lxvi. 24.) mentions the fire of the damned, which is never to be quenched, the worm which gnaws them and dies not, and the insupportable stench which every way surrounds them. The same prophet (xxvi. 14. 19.) says, 'They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish.' Here, therefore, they are represented to be in hell, and in a state of oblivion. 'Thy dead men, (the Israelites) shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead.' The same Isaiah, (xiv. 9.) speaking of the king of Babylon's fall, says, 'Hell from beneath is moved for thee.' This is a prosopopœia very like those which occur in the poets and profane authors, who describe hell and the elysian fields.

The Jews placed hell in the centre of the earth. They called it the deep, and destruction; and they believed it to be situated under waters and mountains. They also frequently term it Gehennon or Gehenna; this signifies the valley of Hinnom, or of the sons of Hinnom, which was, as it were, the common sewer of Jerusalem, where children were sacrificed to Moloch. In like manner, the Heathens believed the place of torture to be in the deepest place of the earth.

Among Christians are two controverted points relative to hell: the one regards its locality, the other, the duration of its torments. The locality or place of hell, and the reality of its fire, were first controverted by Origen, who, interpreting the Scripture account metaphorically, considers hell as consisting, not in external punishments, but in a consciousness or sense of guilt, and a remembrance of past pleasures. The generality of Christians admitted a local hell; and conceiving the earth to be an extended plain, and the heavens an arch drawn over it, they were of opinion that hell is a place in the earth, and the farthest distant from heaven. Tertullian represents the Christians of his time as believing hell to be an abyss in the centre of the earth; and this opinion was founded chiefly on what is said of the descent of Christ into hades or hell. (Matt. xii. 40.) Among the moderns, Mr. Whiston has advanced a new hypothesis. He thinks, that the comets are so many hells, appointed in their orbits to carry the damned alternately into the confines of the sun, there to be scorched by the violent heat, and then to beyond the orb of Saturn, there to starve in those cold and dismal regions. Mr. Swinden, not satisfied with any hypothesis hitherto advanced, assigns the sun as the local hell. On this subject, however, as Dr. Doddridge observes, we must confess our ignorance; and we shall much better employ our time in studying by what means we may avoid this place of horror, than to discover its situation.

With respect to the duration of the torments of hell, Origen was the first that denied them to be eternal. It was his opinion, that not only men, but devils, shall be pardoned and restored to heaven, after a due course of punishment, suitable to their respective crimes. The chief principle on which Origen founded his opinion, was the nature of punishment, which he thought to be emendatory, and applied only as physic for the recovery of the patient's health. Among modern writers the chief objection to the eternity of the torments of hell, is the disproportion between temporary crimes and eternal punishments. It is also objected, that the word everlasting is not to be understood in its utmost extent, and that it signifies only a long time, or a time whose precise boundary is unknown. But to this it is answered, that though the words 'for ever' and 'everlasting' do not in Scripture always denote an endless duration, yet it cannot be denied that they are frequently used in the most unlimited sense: as, where eternity is attributed to God; and he is said to 'live for ever and ever,' and where eternal happiness in another world is promised to good men, and that 'they shall be for ever with the Lord.' The declaration of our Saviour seems decisive on this point, (Matth. xxv. 46.): 'These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.' In this passage, the same word αἰώνιος is used to denote the duration both of the joys of heaven, and the pains of hell. It is, therefore, argued, that if with respect to the former, it denotes what is universally granted, an eternal duration, it must also denote an eternal duration with respect to the latter. It is also argued, that the measure of penalties with respect to crimes is not, nor ought always to be taken from the quality and degree of the offence, much less from its duration and continuance, but from the ends and reasons of government, which requires such penalties as may be likely to secure the observance of the law. No government ever thought it a rule to be observed in punishing, according to equity and justice, that the pain and penalty inflicted should continue no longer than the time spent in committing the sin. Hence, some have been punished with death, others banished or imprisoned, for crimes which were committed in a short space of time. Would men seriously consider the vile and heinous nature of sin; the excellency of the person against whom it is committed, even God, a being of infinite perfection; the meanness of us who oppose and affront him by our wickedness; and the many obligations under which we lie to serve and obey him; they must acknowledge that eternal punishment ought justly to be inflicted for our sins and vile enormities. Tillotson's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 278, &c.; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iv. p. 394; Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. i. p. 476, &c.

HELL, Christ's Descent into. It is not expressly asserted by any of the Evangelists that Christ descended into hell; but they all relate that he had expired upon the cross, and that after three days he again appeared alive. It may, therefore, be inferred that in the intermediate time his soul went into the common receptacle for departed souls. But a more direct proof of this proposition may be found in St. Peter's Sermon, after the effusion of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 27.) in which he applies to the resurrection of our Saviour the following passage in the Psalms: 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.' (Ps. xvi. 10.) Christ's soul must have been in hell, since God is here represented as not finally leaving it there, but as re-uniting it to the body of Christ after a certain interval. It is to be observed, that the word rendered 'hell,' in the preceding passage, both in the Septuagint translation of the Psalms, and in the Acts, is Αἰδης Hades. Dr. Campbell has shown that this word, which occurs eleven times in the New Testament, and is very frequently used in the Septuagint translation of the Old, never signifies in Scripture the place of torment to which the wicked are to be consigned after the day of judgment, but always the place appropriated for the common reception of departed souls in the intermediate time between death and the general resurrection.

We ought, therefore, to remember, in repeating these words in the Apostles' Creed, that this is the whole of what we are bound to profess by them. In what part of space, or of what nature, that receptacle is, in which the souls of men continue from their death till they rise again, we scarcely know. We are sure, however, that it is divided into two extremely different regions: the one is the dwelling of the righteous, and is called in St. Luke, 'Abraham's bosom,' where Lazarus was; the other is that of the wicked, where was the rich man. We have no proof that our Saviour went into the latter place; but as he told the penitent thief, that he should be that day with him in paradise, we are certain he was in the former, where they which die in the Lord rest from their labours, and are blessed, and where they wait for a still more perfect happiness at the resurrection of the last day. How the soul of our Saviour was employed in this abode, or for what reasons he continued there during this time, farther than that he might 'be like unto his brethren,' we are not informed. It is probable, that this doctrine of Christ's descent into hell was first introduced into creeds for the purpose of declaring the actual separation of Christ's soul and body, in opposition to those heretics who asserted that the crucifixion produced only a trance or deliquium, and that Christ did not really suffer death. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 155, &c.; Secker's Lectures on the Catechism, p. 71; Pearson on the Creed, p. 250, &c.; Barrow on the Creed.

HELLENISTS, 'the Grecians.' (Acts vi. 1, &c.) Those were called Hellenistic Jews who lived in cities and provinces where the Greek tongue was common, and who, not being much accustomed to Hebrew or Syriac, generally used the Greek version of the Septuagint both in public and private. This was disapproved by Hebraizing Jews, who could not endure that the Scriptures should be read in any language besides their original Hebrew. This seems to have been the only difference between the Hellenistic and Hebraizing Jews, who reproached their brethren with reading the Scripture after the Egyptian manner, that is, from the left to the right; whereas the Rabbins say, that as the sun moves from east to west, so they should read from the right hand to the left. This difference, however, produced no schism or separation. Salmasius, indeed, endeavours to prove, that they never read the Bible in Greek; and he gives this reason for his assertion, namely, because they never read it in Arabic, a language which the Jews were much more generally acquainted with than Greek.

The Hellenists, Hebrews both by nation and language, are thus properly distinguished from the Hellenes, or Greeks, (John xii. 20.) who were Greeks by birth and nation, but proselytes to the Jewish religion. Salmas. Funus Linguae Hellenisticae; Morin. Exercitat. Biblic.; Voss. de LXX. Interpret.; Doddridge on John xii. 20.

HEMEROBAPTISTS, a sect among the ancient Jews, who derived their name from their washing and bathing every day in all seasons; and they performed the custom with the greatest solemnity, as a religious rite necessary to salvation. Epiphanius, who mentions this as the fourth heresy among the Jews, observes, that they held nearly the same opinions as the Scribes and Pharisees, but that, in common with the Sadducees, they denied the resurrection of the dead, and retained some other peculiarities of these last.

The sect who pass in the East under the denomination of Sabians, and call themselves Mendai. Ijahi, or the disciples of St. John, and whom Europeans entitle the Christians of St. John, because they still retain some knowledge of the Gospel, are thought by some to be of Jewish origin, and to have been derived from the ancient Hemerobaptists. Certain it is, that the John, whom they consider as the founder of their sect, bears no sort of similitude to John the Baptist, but rather resembles the person of that name whom the ancient writers represent as the chief of the Jewish Hemerobaptists. These ambiguous Christians dwell in Persia and Arabia, and principally at Bassora; and their religion consists in bodily washings performed frequently and with great solemnity, and attended with certain ceremonies which the priests mingle with this superstitious service. Broughton's Dictionary, vol. i. p. 483; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. p. 498.

HENOTICON, a decree or edict of the emperor Zeno, which was dated at Constantinople in the year 482, and by which he intended to reconcile all the parties in religion under one faith. For this reason the decree was called Henoticon, which signifies union or uniting. It is generally agreed, that it was published by the advice of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, who wished to reconcile the contending parties. This decree repeated and confirmed all that had been enacted in the councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, against the Arians, Nestorians, and Eutychians, without particularly mentioning the council of Chalcedon. The Henoticon was approved by all those of the two contending parties who were remarkable for their candour and moderation; but it was opposed by violent and obstinate bigots, who complained that it was injurious to the honour and authority of the most holy council of Chalcedon. Hence arose new contests and new divisions not less deplorable than those which this decree was intended to suppress. The Catholics opposed it with all their strength, and it was condemned in form by pope Felix II. Broughton's Dictionary, vol. i. p. 483; Mosheim, vol. i. pp. 417, 418.

HENRICANS, a sect in the twelfth century, that derived their name from Henry, a monk and hermit, who undertook to reform the superstitions and vices of the clergy. For this purpose he left Lausanne in Switzerland, and, removing from different places, at length settled at Thou-louse, in the year 1147. Here he exercised his ministerial function, and declaimed with the greatest vehemence against the vices of the clergy, and the superstitions they had introduced into the Christian church. He was opposed by St. Bernard, and attempted to save himself by flight. Being seized in his retreat, he was carried before pope Eugenius III., who presided in person at a council assembled at Rheims, and who, in the year 1143, committed Henry to a close prison, where he soon ended his days. Henry rejected the baptism of infants, severely censured the corrupt manners of the clergy, treated the festivals and ceremonies of the church with the greatest contempt, and held private assemblies for inculcating his peculiar doctrines. Mosheim, vol. ii. pp. 447, 448.

HERESY, αἵρεσις, signifies in general a sect, or choice. It is usually taken in a bad sense, for some fundamental error in religion, adhered to with obstinacy. Thus we say, the heresy of the Arians, Pelagians, Novatians, &c. St. Paul says, that there should be heresies in the church, that they who are tried may be made manifest. (1 Cor. xi. 19. He requires Titus to shun, and even to avoid the company of, a heretic, after the first and second admonition. (Tit. iii. 10.) In the Acts, St. Luke speaks of the heresy of the Sadducees, and that of the Pharisees. (Acts v. 17.; xv. 5.)

It is evident that among the Jews these sects or heresies, especially that of the Pharisees, were not odious; as St. Paul, even after his conversion, declares himself to be of the sect of the Pharisees. (Acts xxiii. 6.) The same apostle says, that Christianity was called a sect or heresy. (Acts xxiv. 14.) It is true, that in the beginning, the Christian religion was scarcely considered by strangers as anything more than a sect of Judaism; and the primitive fathers made no difficulty of sometimes calling it a divine sect. Tertullus, the advocate of the Jews, accuses St. Paul before Felix, of being the head of the Nazarenes. (Acts xxiv. 5.) St. Paul declares, that he had lived without reproach in the sect of the Pharisees, (Acts vxxi. 5.; Philip. iii. 5, 6.) which was the most in repute among the Jews. The Jews of Rome, who met St. Paul, told him that they were desirous of knowing his thoughts concerning Christianity; and that for their parts they knew nothing of this sect, except that it was every where opposed. (Acts xxviii. 22.)

From the very beginning of the Christian church were dangerous heresies, which attacked the most essential doctrines of our religion; as the divinity of Jesus Christ, his office of Messiah, the reality and truth of his incarnation, the resurrection of the dead, the liberty of Christians from legal ceremonies, and many other points. The most ancient of these heretics was Simon Magus, who desired to buy the gift of God with money, (Acts viii. 9, 10.) and who afterwards set himself up for the Messiah, God Almighty, the Creator. Cerinthus, and the false apostles, against whom St. Paul inveighs in his Epistles, determined that the faithful should receive circumcision, and subject themselves to all the legal observances. (Gal. iv. 12, 13, 17.; v. 11.; vi. 12. Philip. iii. 18.) It is said, that the Nicolaitans allowed a community of women, committed the most ignominious actions, and followed the superstitions of heathenism. They went over to the sect of the Cainists. St. John (Rev. ii. 6. 15.) speaks of the Nicolaitans as producing great disorders in the churches of Asia. At the same time were false Christs and false prophets. St. Paul speaks of Hymeneus and Alexander, (1 Tim. i. 20.) and of Hymeneus and Philetus, (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18.) who departed from the truth. He foretold, that in the last times some should forsake the truth, and give themselves up to the spirit of error, and to doctrines of devils. (1 Tim. iv. 1.) St. Peter and St. Jude foretell the same things, and in this only repeat what Jesus Christ himself had said, that there should come false Christs and false prophets, who should seduce the simple. See NICOLAITANS, SIMON, &c.

The principal sects of heretics, that disturbed the peace of the church, arose in the first six centuries; most of the heresies in succeeding ages were only the old ones revived.

In England is no express law, which determines what shall be called heresy. The statute, 1 Eliz. c. 1. directed the high commission-court to restrain the same to what had been adjudged to be heresy by the authority of Scripture, or by the first four general councils; or to what the parliament, with the assent of the convocation, should determine to be heresy. By the common law, the archbishop, or bishop of any diocese, has power to convict persons of heresy. Formerly, heresy was treason; and the punishment for it was burning, by virtue of the writ de heretico comburendo; but the heretic forfeited neither lands nor goods, because the proceedings against him were pro salute animæ. By the statute 29 Car. II. c. ix. the proceedings on such writ, and all punishments by death in pursuance of ecclesiastical censures, are taken away; but an obstinate heretic, being excommunicated, is liable to be imprisoned, by virtue of the writ de excommunicato capiendo. Denying the Christian religion, or the divine authority of the Scriptures, renders a person liable, for the second offence, to three years' imprisonment, and to different disabilities, by the statute 9 and 10 of W. III. c. xxxii. Broughton's Dictionary, vol. i. p. 489; Burn's Eccles. Law, vol. i. p. 589.

HERMAS, whom Paul mentions, (Rom. xvi. 14.) was, according to several of the ancients, and many learned modern interpreters, the same as the Hermas, whose works are still extant, and have been placed by some among the canonical Scriptures. 'The Pastor of Hermas,' says Dr. Gregory, 'is generally allowed to be genuine, and it is also probable that it was the work of that Hermas who is spoken of by St. Paul, though some have ascribed it to a certain Hermas, or Hermes, brother to Pius, bishop of Rome, who lived in the succeeding century. The work is entirely allegorical, consisting of visions and similitudes. Like all works of this nature, it is extremely unequal as a composition, and, I confess, but little satisfactory to my judgment. It was, however, in high estimation in the early ages, and is spoken of as Scripture both by Irenæus and Tertullian.' This work is supposed to have been written at Rome, or in the neighbourhood, about A.D. 92, before Domitian's persecution. Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. i. p. 64.

HERMOGENIANS, a denomination that arose in the second century, and derived their name from their leader, Hermogenes. He regarded matter as the fountain of all evil, and could not persuade himself that God had created it from nothing by an almighty act of his will. He, therefore, maintained that the world, with whatever it contains, and also the souls of men and other spirits, were formed by the Deity from an uncreated and eternal mass of corrupt matter. Mosheim, vol. i. p. 191.

HER'MON, הרמון, signifies destruction or execration; otherwise, a net, or net-work; otherwise, dedicated, or consecrated, that is, to God. Hermon is the name of a mount which was called by the Sidonians Sirion, and by the Amorites Shenir. (Deut. iii. 9.) St. Jerome says, that this mountain lies higher than Pancas, and that in summer-time snow was carried from thence to Tyre, that people might drink al fresco. The Chaldee and Samaritan interpreters on Deut. iv. 48. where Sion is spoken of as if it were a part of Hermon, call it the mountain of snow, because it is always covered with snow, on account of its height. The Scripture places Mount Hermon as the northern boundary of the land beyond Jordan, and the brook Arnon as the southern. (Deut. iii. 8.; iv. 48.) Mount Hermon belonged to king Og, and lay at the northern extremity of his dominions, before the Israelites conquered them. Baal-gad was situated in the plain of Libanus, at the foot of Mount Hermon; and the Hivites dwelt under the same mountain in the land of Mizpeh, from Baal-hermon unto the entering in of Hamath. (Judg. iii. 3.) Some have thought, that Mount Hermon is the same as that which is called Mount Hor, (Num. xxxiv. 7, 8.;) but, says Dr. Hales, Mount Hor, or as it should be translated 'the mountain of the mountain,' or 'the double mountain,' corresponded to all Lebanon, and included Mount Hermon.

Besides this Mount Hermon, which lies on the north border of the country beyond Jordan, there is said to be another mount of the same name, situated within the land of Canaan, on the west of the river Jordan, and not far from Mount Tabor. Of this mountain is understood what the Psalmist says: 'The north and the south, thou hast created them; Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.' (Ps. lxxxix. 12.) 'As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion.' (Ps. cxxxiii. 3.) Mr. Maundrell notices this Mount Hermon, and tells us, that in three hours and a half from the river Kishon, he came to a small brook, near which was an old village and a good kane called Legune; not far from this his company took up their quarters. From this place they had a large prospect of the plain of Esdraelon. At about six or seven hours' distance eastward stood within view Nazareth, and the two mountains, Tabor and Hermon. He adds, that they were sufficiently instructed by experience, what the holy Psalmist means by the dew of Hermon, as their tents were as wet with it as if it had rained all night. Maundrell's Travels p. 57; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 328; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 416.

HEROD, Ἡρώδης, signifies the glory of the skin; or rather, son of the hero; according to the Syriac, a dragon in the fire.

HEROD the GREAT, son of Antipater and Cypros. His brothers were Phasaël, Joseph, and Pheroras; and he had a sister named Salome. He married several wives: 1. Doris, by whom he had Antipater. 2. Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, son to Aristobulus, of the Asmonæan family; by whom he had Alexander, Aristobulus, Herod, Salampso, and Cypros. 3. Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest, by whom he had Herod, the husband of Herodias. 4. Malthace, by whom he had Archelaus, Philip, and Olympias. 5. Cleopatra, by whom he had Herod Antipas and Philip. 6. Pallas, by whom he had Phasaël. 7. Phædra, by whom he had Roxana. 8. Elpis, by whom he had Salome, who married one of the sons of Pheroras. He had also two other wives, whose names are not known.

Herod was born in the year of the world 3932, and before Christ 72. According to some, his father Antipater was by nation an Idumæan: others say, by extraction a Jew, deriving his birth from some of the Jews who returned from Babylon: others maintain, that Antipater was a heathen, and guardian of one of Apollo's temples at Askelon, and that having been taken prisoner by some Idumæan scouts, he was carried into Idumæa and brought up according to the manners of the Jews; for since the time of John Hyrcanus, the Idumæans had observed the laws of Moses.

Herod was only twenty-five years old when his father Antipater gave him the government of Galilee, with the approbation of Hyrcanus. He behaved with so much prudence and valour, that he restored the peace of this province, which had been disturbed by hordes of thieves, who committed great ravages. Among others, he took one Hezekiah, captain of these banditti; and by this means he procured the friendship and esteem of Sextus Cæsar, governor of Syria. But the chief people of the Jews, growing jealous of the authority which Antipater assumed, and of the power which he gave to his sons, complained of it to Hyrcanus, who cited Herod to justify his conduct at Jerusalem. Thither Herod came, but well armed, and attended with good troops. His countenance terrified the judges. Sameas was the only one who had the courage to lay the fault of Herod's misconduct on the judges themselves, and Hyrcanus, who had permitted him to assume too much authority. But Hyrcanus observing that the judges were more disposed to condemn him than to absolve him, deferred judgment till the next day, and gave advice privately to Herod, that he should escape in the night. He retired therefore to Sextus Cæsar, at Damascus, and by him was entrusted with the government of Cœle-Syria. Being desirous to revenge the insult offered him by citing him to Jerusalem, he marched toward that city with an army; but Antipater his father, and Phasaël his brother, persuaded him to return. After the death of Julius Cæsar, Herod was appointed governor of all Cœle-Syria, by Cassius and Marcus Brutus. They gave him troops, and promised him the kingdom of Judea, when the war between Mark Antony and young Cæsar should be ended. About the same time Antipater, Herod's father, was poisoned at Jerusalem by one Malichus; but Herod put Malichus to death at Tyre, in the year of the world 3961.

Mark Antony coming into Syria, and being at Daphne near Antioch, a hundred Jews of the best rank came to him, with accusations against Herod and his brother Phasaël. Hyrcanus, who had promised his grand-daughter Mariamne to Herod, was there. Mark Antony having heard what was alleged against Herod, asked Hyrcanus whether Herod and Phasaël, or their accusers were fittest to govern the state? Hyrcanus answered, the two brothers. Antony, therefore, made them tetrarchs, and entrusted the government of all Judea to them. He ordered letters to be dispatched forthwith to this purpose, and fifteen of the most mutinous of their enemies to be imprisoned, and would have put them to death, if Herod had not interceded for them.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, having undertaken to dispossess Hyrcanus, the prince and high-priest of the Jews, engaged the Parthians, by great promises, to march against Jerusalem. Phasaël defended the walls of the city, and Herod defended the palace. Pacorus, the king of Parthia's son, having persuaded Hyrcanus and Phasaël to meet Barzaphernes, who was in Galilee, in order to agree on some accommodation, he himself accompanied them thither. But Hyrcanus and Phasaël discovered very soon that they were betrayed. When they came to Ecdippa, a maritime town of Phœnicia, they were seized by the Parthians, and put in chains. Herod, informed of what had passed, departed from Jerusalem, with his mother Cypros, his sister Salome, Mariamne his bride, and Alexandra, her mother. These he lodged in the castle of Massada, and took the way to Petra, hoping for assistance from Malchus, king of the Arabians. But before he reached Petra, he received a message from Malchus, desiring him to depart, because he feared to offend the Parthians by receiving him.

Herod, therefore, went to Rhinocorura, where he was informed that his brother Phasaël had killed himself, to avoid the ill-treatment of the Parthians. From Rhinocorura he went to Damiatta, where, after some difficulty, he embarked, the season being already far advanced. At sea he was assailed by a violent storm, which obliged him to throw part of his effects overboard, and with much difficulty he arrived at Rhodes. Here he was assisted by two of his friends; and his necessity could not prevent him from doing good to this city, which had suffered extremely in Cassius's war. From Rhodes he went to Rome, where he opened his affairs to Mark Antony. Antony remembered the good offices which Antipater, Herod's father, had done him formerly in Syria: he was besides exasperated against Antigonus, whom he considered as a turbulent man, and an enemy to the Roman people; and he was moreover swayed by the promises which Herod made, of a large sum of money, if he would procure him to be declared king. Octavius Cæsar, afterwards Augustus, was equally desirous of obliging Herod. Antony and Cæsar used their interest so effectually, that the senate gave him the kingdom of Judea, and declared Antigonus an enemy to the commonwealth, in the year of the world 3964.

Seven days afterwards, he departed from Rome, and landing at Ptolemais, began to gather troops to march against Antigonus, who kept the castle of Massada besieged. He fortunately relieved this fortress, and thence marched against Jerusalem, with Silo, a captain of some Roman troops. But Antigonus shut the gates against him, and winter coming on, Herod and Silo put their troops into quarters. Yet he did not remain idle; but he seized several posts, and took several towns from Antigonus, as well in Judea as in Galilee. The next year there were skirmishes between Antigonus's party and Herod's, in which the latter generally had the advantage. In the beginning of his third year's reign, Herod came in earnest, and besieged Jerusalem: he attacked it on the same side as Pompey had done several years before. Whilst preparing for the siege, he went to Samaria, where he married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexandra. After his marriage, he returned to the siege with reinforcements; soon after also came Sosius, captain of the Roman troops, who brought powerful succours to him from Syria; so that after a siege of five months, the first inclosure of the city was taken by assault. Some time after, the second inclosure was also forced. Antigonus retired to the temple, but did not long resist. The city and temple were taken; and Antigonus came, and threw himself at the feet of Sosius, who insulted him, and called him Antigona, instead of Antigonus. Thus Herod acquired the kingdom of Judea.

Hitherto the high-priesthood had been possessed by kings of the Asmonæan race. Herod being neither of a family of the priests, nor qualified to exercise his ministry, and Hyrcanus being at that time in captivity among the Parthians, the king sent for one Ananel from Babylon to perform the office of high-priest. Ananel was of the family of Aaron; but all his merit was his acquaintance with Herod, who had long had a regard for him. Mariamne, Herod's wife, had a brother named Aristobulus, to whom the high-priesthood by right of birth belonged. The queen never ceased to solicit Herod till he had divested Ananel, and restored this dignity to Aristobulus, who was then only seventeen years of age, and who did not enjoy the high-priesthood longer than one year, being drowned by order of Herod. Alexandra, the mother of Aristobulus, complained very much of his death to Cleopatra, who incensed Antony against Herod. Antony sent for Herod, to justify himself; but he effectually persuaded Antony by his presents and his discourses.

War being declared between Augustus and Mark Antony, Herod espoused the party of his benefactor Antony. But Antony being overcome, Herod was obliged to solicit the clemency of Augustus, whom he met at Rhodes, and before whom he appeared with all the royal ornaments, except the diadem. He spoke to Augustus with admirable constancy and magnanimity: confessed he had favoured Antony's party, that he should have done more for him, had he not been hindered by the war in Arabia: that he was disposed to do as much for Augustus, and to serve him with the same fidelity as he had done Antony, if Augustus would restore him his kingdom, and admit him to his favour. Augustus, charmed with his behaviour, granted what he desired; and Herod made great presents to that prince and his friends. When Augustus afterwards passed through Palestine in his way to Egypt, Herod accompanied him, and furnished his army plentifully.

Herod seemed now to be in full possession of all he could wish. But his peace was soon disturbed by domestic divisions, and misfortunes of different kinds; which in the midst of the greatest prosperity, rendered him one of the most unhappy princes of his age. He had so great a passion for Mariamne, his wife, that he could not moderate it; but the affection of Mariamne was alienated from him, and she despised him. Herod's mother and sister, envying his wife Mariamne, forgot nothing that might irritate Herod against her; and, after several little quarrels had risen to animosity, in a transport of fury, he commanded Mariamne to be put to death. But when his fury had subsided, he was so afflicted at what he had done, that he fell dangerously ill, and was very near death. Some little time afterwards, he ordered the execution of Alexandra, who had too easily credited the news of his death.

He spent the following years in raising several public and private edifices in the province, and elsewhere, in exhibiting shows and games, and in building temples in honour of Augustus. He sent his two sons by Mariamne to Rome, to receive an education suitable to their birth. But his most important work, undertaken at this time, was the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem. The people, surprised, could scarcely be induced to consent to it at first; fearing, that after he had demolished the old temple, he might leave the new edifice imperfect. But Herod assured them, that he would not touch the old building, till he had provided every necessary for raising the new. He finished it in nine years, and dedicated it in the year of the world 3996. This, which by some is called the third temple, was properly Zerubbabel's renewed and enlarged; for such parts of it as Herod intended to make more lofty and magnificent, were pulled down by degrees, and the sacrifices and religious offices were never interrupted. Hence the prophet Haggai's prediction concerning the glory of the second house was verified; which would apparently be false, if this of Herod's were supposed to be a third temple.

Some time after beginning this work he went to Rome, designing to make his court to Augustus, and to see his two sons. Augustus received him very well, and Herod every where, both on his journey and at Rome, manifested his munificence.

He brought his two sons with him into Judea, where he married Aristobulus to Berenice, daughter of Salome, and Alexander to Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. About this time Agrippa coming into Asia, Herod invited him into his kingdom, and showed him the cities of Samaria, otherwise Sebaste, and Cæsarea, which he had built in honour of Augustus; and he received him with so much magnificence at Jerusalem, that Agrippa could not sufficiently express his satisfaction. Divisions again arising in Herod's family, he imbibed a jealousy of his two sons, Aristobulus and Alexander. To check their pride, Herod sent for Doris, and his son by her, Antipater, to court, and showed them much esteem and consideration. This preference exasperated the two princes, who expressed their discontent too openly. Herod carried them to Rome, designing to accuse them before Augustus: but Augustus reconciled them to their father, and Herod, on his return to Jerusalem, declared, before a great assembly of the people, that his intention was, that his three sons should reign after him; first Antipater, then Alexander and Aristobulus.

Herod was again disturbed by the malice of Antipater, and the artifices of Pheroras and Salome, Herod's brother and sister. Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, coming into Judea, in the year of the world 3996, once more reconciled the two brothers to Herod. But at last the calumnies of Antipater and Salome prevailed, and Herod, believing they had some designs on his life, ordered Alexander and Aristobulus to be strangled, in the year of the world 3999.

Antipater having thus got rid of his brothers, who gave him most umbrage, began to consider how he might dispose of Herod himself, whose resentment and inconstancy he continually feared. To conceal his intrigues, he procured the king's leave to visit Rome. But during his absence Herod discovered his conspiracy, and several months were employed in examining depositions against him.

In the mean time, the Saviour of the world was born at Bethlehem; and wise men from the East came to pay their homage to him. When arrived at Jerusalem, they asked, Where was the new-born king of the Jews? Their arrival occasioned a great and universal sensation. Herod, who was then at Jericho, under cure for a languishing illness, of which he died soon after, was also much concerned at it, and convened the priests and doctors of the law to know of them where the Messiah was to be born. They told him in Bethlehem of Judah, according to the prediction of the prophet Micah, (v. 2.) Herod, therefore, sending privately for the wise men, inquired of them very carefully the time when the star had appeared to them. He sent them to Bethlehem, and directed them to return to him when they had found the child. But the angel of the Lord discovered to them in a dream the wicked designs of Herod; and they returned into their own country by another way. Joseph also was warned by an angel to flee into Egypt, with the child and his mother. Herod, finding himself deceived by the Magi, was very angry; and sending to Bethlehem, he ordered all the male children of two years old and under, or rather, perhaps, those entered on the second year, to be killed, according to the time concerning which he had inquired exactly of the wise men.

In the beginning of this year, which is the first of Jesus Christ, Antipater, who was ignorant of what had passed against him, returned from Rome, and was admitted to his father's presence only to hear from his mouth those reproaches which he deserved. He was loaded with chains and imprisoned. Besides, Herod made a new will, in which he declared Herod Antipas, his youngest son, to be his heir.

It being reported that Herod was dead, some young people at noon-day beat down a golden eagle, which Herod had placed over the great portal of the temple, contrary to the law and customs of the Jews. The authors of this exploit, with forty of their followers, were seized by order of Herod, and burnt alive. Herod's diseases increased daily: his fever was not violent; but a slow internal heat wasted him. His hunger was so raging as to be insatiable. His bowels ulcerated; he had continual pains in his belly; his legs swelled like those of dropsical persons; certain parts were so rotten, that worms were seen to come out of them; and he had an insupportable itch over his whole body. A little before his death, he sent for all who were considerable persons in Judea to Jericho, threatening them with death, if they failed. When they were come, he ordered them to be confined in the circus, and with tears constrained his sister Salome, and Alexas, his brother-in-law, to promise him, that as soon as he was dead, they should massacre all these persons, that so the Jews throughout the land might, at least in appearance, shed tears at his death. But this order was not executed.

After this, he received letters from Rome, informing him that Augustus permitted him either to banish Antipater, or to kill him. This news revived him a little: but his pains returning with great violence, he wished to deliver himself from them by death. He called for a knife to pare an apple, as he had been used to do, but, instead of that service, he attempted to plunge it into his body; his cousin, Achiab, held his hands, and at the same time he made a loud exclamation, which disordered the whole palace, and every one supposed the king was dead. Antipater, hearing this report, thought Herod had expired, and endeavoured to persuade his guards to liberate him; but the officer that had the charge of him went and gave notice of it to Herod, who commanded him to be killed immediately. He survived his son only five days, during which interval he changed his will, and gave the kingdom to Archelaus; the Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Batanæa, to Philip, own brother to Archelaus; and Galilee and Peræa to Herod Antipas. Thus died Herod the Great, at near seventy years of age, after a reign of six or seven-and-thirty years, from the time of his being declared king by the senate, and thirty-four years from his being master of Judea by the death of Antigonus, in the year of the world 4001. *Joseph. HEROD, called Philip, (Mark vi. 17. Luke iii. 1.) son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high-priest, was at first named in Herod's will as heir to his kingdom, after the deaths of Alexander and Aristobulus, and the discovery of Antipater's conspiracy; but the king having discovered, that Mariamne, this Herod's mother, was concerned in that conspiracy, he erased Herod from his will, and substituted Archelaus. Herod Philip married Herodias, grand-daughter to Herod the Great, by whom he had Salome, who is mentioned in the Gospel as a graceful dancer. Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, brother to Philip, having been some time with him when on a journey to Rome, conceived a criminal passion for Herodias, and proposed to marry her. Herodias consented, on condition that Antipas would divorce the daughter of king Aretas, whom he had married long before.

Antipas, when returned from Rome, performed his promise, and married Herodias, his brother Herod Philip's wife. Against this incestuous marriage, John the Baptist inveighed vehemently; and this was the Herodias who procured that great man's head to be cut off. (Matt. xiv. Mark vi. 17.)

HER'ODIANS, a sect of the Jews in the time of our Saviour. This sect was not ancient, and could not have been earlier than the reign of the Herods. Neither Josephus nor Philo speaks of it under the name of Herodians; but the Gospel does. (Matt. xxii. 16. Mark iii. 6.; viii. 15.; xii. 13.)

The Herodians may, perhaps, be considered as a political rather than a religious sect; but we ought to remember, that among the Jews religious and civil opinions were almost necessarily blended. Tertullian, and some other ancient authors, thought that the Herodians were so called because they believed Herod to be the Messiah; but Jerome treats this opinion with a sort of contempt. Indeed, there seems to be no foundation for it in Scripture, unless we suppose that it is alluded to in our Lord's caution to his disciples against 'the leaven of Herod.' It seems more probable that the Herodians were only a set of men strongly attached to the family of Herod, and of particularly profligate principles. The opinion of Dr. Prideaux is, that they derived their name from Herod the Great, and were distinguished from the Pharisees and other Jews, by concurring in Herod's scheme of subjecting himself and his dominions to the Romans, and also by complying with many of the heathen customs of the Romans. In their zeal for the Roman authority, they were diametrically opposite to the Pharisees, who considered it unlawful to submit, or pay taxes, to the Roman emperor; an opinion founded on its being forbidden by the law to set over them a stranger, as their king, who was not one of their own nation. The conjunction of the Herodians with the Pharisees against Christ is, therefore, a memorable proof of the severity of their resentment and malice against him; especially when we consider that they united in proposing to him an ensnaring question, on a subject which was the ground of their mutual dissension, namely, Whether it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? If Christ had answered in the negative, the Herodians would have accused him of treason against the state: and if in the affirmative, the Pharisees were equally ready to excite the people against him, as an enemy to their civil liberties and privileges.

St. Mark (viii. 15.) tells us, that Christ charged his disciples to 'beware of the leaven of Herod,' and in the parallel passage of St. Matthew's Gospel, (xvi. 6.) Christ says, 'Beware of the leaven of the Sadducees.' Hence some commentators have supposed that the Herodians belonged to the sect of the Sadducees. Dr. Doddridge says, 'These men, from their high regard to Herod, would naturally be zealous for the authority of the Romans, by whose means Herod was made and continued king.' It is probable, as Dr. Prideaux conjectures, that 'they might incline to conform to Roman customs in some particulars, which the law would not allow, and especially in the admission of images, though not in the religious, or rather idolatrous use of them. Herod's attempt to set up a golden eagle over the east gate of the temple is well known. These complaisant courtiers would, no doubt, defend it, and the same temper might discover itself in other instances.' Hence some have thought, that this symbolizing with idolatry, or views of interest and worldly policy, was probably the leaven of Herod, against which our Lord cautioned his disciples. Jenning's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. xiii.; *Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. HERODIAS, daughter of Aristobulus and Berenice, sister to king Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Herod the Great. Her first husband was her uncle Herod Philip, by whom she had Salome. Herodias having accepted the proposals of Herod Antipas, her uncle, tetrarch of Galilee, of marrying her when he returned from Rome, she removed from Philip's house, into that of Antipas, together with her daughter Salome. As John the Baptist censured this incestuous marriage, (Matt. xiv. 3. Mark vi. 17.) Antipas ordered him to be imprisoned. Some time after, Herodias suggested to her dancing daughter, Salome, to ask the head of John the Baptist, who was accordingly beheaded.

Herodias, mortified to see her husband tetrarch only, while her brother Agrippa, whom she had known in a state of indigence and humiliation, was honoured with the title of king, persuaded her husband Antipas to visit Rome, and desire of the emperor Caius the royal title. But Agrippa, still more meanly jealous, sent his servant with letters to the emperor, importing that Herod in his arsenals had arms, with which to arm seventy thousand men. Antipas, unable to deny this fact, was banished to Lyons. Caius understanding that Herodias, who accompanied her husband, was sister to Agrippa, inclined to pardon her: but she chose rather to follow her husband in the calamity which she had brought upon him, than to owe any thing to her brother's fortune. HESH'BON, השבו, signifies a number, or thinking; otherwise, hastening to understand, or to build. Heshbon was a celebrated city beyond Jordan. It had been the capital of the Amorites, who conquered it from the Moabites. It was afterwards included in the tribe of Reuben, and was given to the Levites. Jerome says, that it was in his time a very considerable city, situated twenty miles beyond Jordan, in the mountains of Arabia. It was remarkable for excellent fish-pools. (Cant. vii. 4.) After the captivity of the ten tribes, it was repossessed by the Moabites; and hence in the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, (Isai. xv. xvi. Jer. xlviii. xlix.) against Moab, it is frequently mentioned.

Heshbon is supposed to be the same place as that now called Hubhzân. Numerous ruins attest its ancient splendour. This town is situated upon so commanding a position, that the view from it extends at least thirty miles in every direction; and to the southward, where the prospect is most extensive, the eye ranges, probably, a distance of sixty miles in a direct line. Buckingham's Travels among the Arab tribes, p. 106; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 588; Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 284.

HEXAPLA, the name of a Bible disposed in six columns, containing the text and different versions. It was compiled and published by the celebrated Origen, who was born in Egypt towards the end of the second century, and died at Tyre soon after the middle of the third century. The Hexapla contained the whole of the Old Testament, divided into columns like our modern Polyglot Bibles. The first column was occupied by the Hebrew. But, as very few of those persons, to whose immediate benefit the labours of Origen were directed, were acquainted even with the letters of that language, he added, in a second column, the Hebrew words in Greek letters, that his readers might have at least some notion of the form and sound of the Hebrew words. To express their meaning, he added, in a third column, a Greek translation from the Hebrew, which had been lately made by a Jew, of the name of Aquila, and which adheres so closely to the original, as frequently to violate the common rules of Greek construction. The fourth column was occupied by another Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, also lately made, but probably after the translation of Aquila. The author of this second Greek translation was Symmachus, whose object was to give not so much a literal translation of the Hebrew, as a translation expressive of the sense, and as free as possible from Hebraisms. Origen placed in the fifth column an amended text of the Septuagint; and in the sixth column another Greek translation, which had been lately made by Theodotion.

In revising the Septuagint, the first part of Origen's labour was to collate it throughout with the Hebrew. Wherever he found any word or words in the former, to which there was nothing correspondent in the latter, he inclosed such word or words within certain marks expressive of their absence from the Hebrew, namely, with an obelus or mark of minus prefixed, and a crotchet at the end to express how far the obelus or mark of minus was meant to extend. On the contrary, where the Hebrew had any word or words, to which there was nothing correspondent in the Septuagint, there he inserted such word or words as were necessary to supply the deficiency. That the reader might always know where such insertions were made, he prefixed to them an asterisk, or mark of plus, again denoting by a crotchet at the end, what words the asterisk was meant to include. As the version of Theodotion held a middle rank between the closeness of Aquila, and the freedom of Symmachus, the additions in question were chiefly made in the words used by Theodotion. Besides the style of Theodotion more nearly resembled the style of the Septuagint, than either of the other translations, and was therefore better adapted to the purpose to which Origen applied it. Hence also the translation of Theodotion very properly occupied the columns adjacent to the corrected version of the Septuagint. In some instances, either where Theodotion's translation was defective, or for other reasons at present unknown, Origen used the words of Aquila. However, in all cases he expressed by the initials A, Θ, Σ, the translations from which he copied. These were the sources from which Origen drew in every part of the Old Testament. But in some books he used two other Greek translations, of which the authors are unknown; and in certain passages even a seventh Greek version, of which the author is also unknown.

The name by which this work of Origen is commonly designated, is Biblia Hexapla, or Bible in six columns, which it contained throughout, namely the Hebrew, the Hebrew in Greek characters, the version of Aquila, the version of Symmachus, the Septuagint version, and that of Theodotion. In those books which contained two anonymous versions, and therefore filled eight columns, it was called Biblia Octapla; and in the passages, where the third anonymous version occupied a ninth column, it received the name of Enneapla. On the other hand, as out of the six columns which went through the whole work, only four were occupied with Greek translations, the same work, which most writers call Hexapla, has by others been denominated Tetrapla. They are only different names of the same work viewed in different lights, though some authors have fallen into the mistake of supposing, from the difference in the names, that they denoted different works.

Origen is said to have employed twenty-eight years in making preparations for this work, independently of the time employed in writing it. It was begun at Cæsarea, and probably finished at Tyre. The text of the Septuagint, as settled by Origen, is called the Hexaplarian text, to distinguish it from the text of the Septuagint, as it existed before the time of Origen, which is therefore called the Antehexaplarian. On the value of the Hexapla, modern writers are divided; and it has been considered by some recent writers rather as a mechanical than as a critical undertaking. It is true, that great as the labour was, much was still wanting to render it a perfect work. If, in the execution of this work, the rules which modern critics have learnt from longer experience are not discernible, it must be remembered that this was the first effort that was ever made to amend a corrupted text either of the Old or of the New Testament.

The Hexapla, in its entire state, has long ceased to exist; and we are indebted for our knowledge of it to Eusebius and Jerome, both of whom had seen it in the library of Cæsarea, whither the original itself was removed from Tyre, where Origen died, by Pamphylus the founder of the Cæsarean library. But as the magnitude of the work was such, that it could not be transcribed without a heavy expense, no copy, as far as is known, was ever taken of the whole; and the original perished in the flames, which consumed the library of Cæsarea, on the irruption of the Saracens. But that column of the Hexapla, which contained the corrected text of the Septuagint, with its critical remarks, was transcribed by Eusebius and Pamphilus, with occasional extracts from the other versions. This column, however, has descended to us only in fragments, which have been collected by the industry of the learned, particularly of Montfaucon, the author of the Palæographia Græca, who published them at Paris, in 1714, in two folio volumes, under the title of 'Hexaplorum Origenis quæ supersunt.' HEZEKIAH, חִזְקִיָּה, signifies, strength of the Lord; otherwise, taken and supported by the Lord. Hezekiah, king of Judah, son of Ahaz and Abi, was born in the year of the world 3251, when Ahaz his father was barely eleven years of age. This occasions some difficulty. As the Scripture asserts, that Ahaz was only twenty years old when he began to reign, and that he reigned only sixteen years, it follows that he did not live longer than thirty-six years. Yet the Scripture says, that Hezekiah was twenty-five years old, when he began to reign. We must, therefore, conclude, that Hezekiah was born when Ahaz was only eleven years old. This is very extraordinary. To obviate this difficulty, some have supposed, that Hezekiah was the first born son after Ahaz came to the crown, and consequently had a natural right of succession to the throne, after his father, agreeably to the custom of the East. Hence they think, that Hezekiah was nearly fifteen years of age when he came to the crown. See DIAL.

Hezekiah succeeded his father Ahaz in the year of the world 3277, or 3278, and before Christ 726. He did what was agreeable to God. He destroyed the high-places, cut down the groves, and broke the statues which the people had adored. He also broke the brazen serpent which Moses had made, because to it the children of Israel burned incense. He ordered the great doors of the Lord's house to be opened and repaired. He exhorted the priests and Levites to purify the temple, and to sacrifice in it as formerly; and these sacrifices were furnished by the king.

As the institution of the passover had been neglected, Hezekiah invited not only his own subjects, but also all Israel, to keep it. Some ridiculed his proposal, but many observed it; and this was a most solemn passover. Hezekiah took all necessary care to maintain the good regulations which he had established in the temple, and to provide for the priests and ministers.

Some years after, Hezekiah shook off the Assyrian yoke, and refused to pay tribute. He defeated the Philistines, and destroyed their country, in the year of the world 3290, or 3291. (2 Kings xviii. 7. 2 Chron. xxxii.) He repaired and fortified the walls of Jerusalem, laid in stores, appointed good commanders over his troops, stopped up the springs without the city, and put himself in a condition of making a vigorous defence.

Sennacherib, king of Assyria, invaded the territories of Judah, and subdued almost every town. Hezekiah observing that the kings of Egypt and Cush, with whom he had entered into an alliance, did not come to his assistance, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, and desired terms of peace. Sennacherib demanded three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold. To raise this sum, Hezekiah exhausted his treasures, and pulled off the gold plates with which he formerly overlaid the doors of the temple. But Sennacherib having received this money, instead of quitting Hezekiah, sent three of his principal officers from Lachish, which he was besieging, to Jerusalem, with a summons to Hezekiah to surrender. Hezekiah sent to hear their proposals Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah, to whom Rabshakeh spoke with extreme insolence. Hezekiah, being informed of his blasphemies, rent his clothes, put on sackcloth, went to the house of the Lord, and sent to the prophet Isaiah an account of Rabshakeh's speeches. But Isaiah gave him comfort. Sennacherib, sitting down before Libnah, was told that Tirhakah, king of Cush, was marching against him. He went, therefore, to meet Tirhakah, and sent to Hezekiah letters, in which he told him not to place his confidence in his God. Hezekiah, having received these letters, went up to the temple, and spread them before the Lord, whom he entreated to deliver him from this insolent enemy. The Lord heard his prayer, and sent the prophet Isaiah to inform him, that Sennacherib should not besiege Jerusalem. The very night after this prediction, an angel of the Lord destroyed in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand men of the army of Sennacherib, who was obliged to retire immediately to Nineveh. The instrument of vengeance was probably the blast, or hot pestilential south wind, which blows from the desert of Libya, and is called Samum or Simoom. See ANGEL.

Soon after, or as some think during the invasion of Sennacherib, Hezekiah fell dangerously sick. Isaiah came to him, and said, 'Thou shalt die, and not live.' Hezekiah, turning his face to the wall, prayed to God. Before Isaiah had gone out of the king's apartment into the middle court of the palace, he was commanded to return to Hezekiah, saying, I will heal thee, and will add unto thy days fifteen years. But Hezekiah said, By what sign shall I know that the Lord will heal me? Isaiah said, Would you have the shadow advance ten degrees, or retire ten degrees, on the dial of Ahaz? Hezekiah desired that the shadow might go back ten degrees, which seemed to him most difficult; and the prophet calling on the Lord, the shadow returned ten degrees. It is very probable, that this retrogradation, which was very sensible and real on the dial of Ahaz, was caused by some reflection, or refraction, of the sun's rays, without any real retrogradation of the luminary. After his recovery, Hezekiah composed a song of thanksgiving, which has been preserved by Isaiah, (xxxviii. 10, 11.) The date of Hezekiah's sickness and recovery is fixed to the fourteenth year of his reign.

After this, Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present to Hezekiah, to congratulate him on his recovery, and 'to enquire about the wonder,' of the regression of the sun's shadow, which proves that it was only a partial phenomenon, confined probably to Jerusalem. (2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) Hezekiah, flattered with this embassy, in the pride of his heart showed the envoys all his treasures, spices, rich vessels, &c. and concealed nothing from them. Isaiah afterwards told the king, that a time would come, when all he had shown would be removed to Babylon, and when his sons would be made eunuchs in the palace of that king. Hezekiah received the message with due submission to the will of the Lord, thankful that the evil was not to be inflicted in his own days. This prince passed the latter years of his life in tranquillity, laid up great riches, and conveyed water into Jerusalem. He died in the year of the world 3306, and before Christ 698, or, according to Dr. Hales, 696. The sacred writings praise his piety and merit; and the author of Ecclesiasticus hath an encomium on him. (Ecclus. xlviii.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 465—468. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary.

HIGH PLACES. The prophets reproach the Israelites for nothing with more zeal, than for worshipping upon the high places. The destroying of these high places is a commendation given only to few princes in Scripture; and many, though zealous for the observance of the law, had not courage to prevent the people from sacrificing upon these eminences. Before the temple was built, the high places were not absolutely contrary to the law, provided God only was there adored, and not idols. They seem to have been tolerated under the judges; and Samuel offered sacrifices in several places, where the ark was not present. Even in David's time, they sacrificed to the Lord at Shiloh, Jerusalem, and Gibeon. But after the temple was built at Jerusalem, and the ark had a fixed settlement, it was no longer allowed to sacrifice out of Jerusalem.

The high places were much frequented in the kingdom of Israel. The people sometimes went upon those mountains which had been sanctified by the presence of patriarchs and prophets, and by appearances of God, to worship the true God there. This worship was lawful, except as to its being exercised where the Lord had not chosen. But they frequently adored idols upon these hills, and committed a thousand abominations in groves, and caves, and tents; and hence arose the zeal of pious kings and prophets, to suppress the high places.

Dr. Prideaux thinks it probable, that the proseuchæ, open courts, built like those in which the people prayed at the tabernacle and the temple, and in one of which our Saviour is said to have continued at his devotion all night, (Luke vi. 2.) were the same as those called high places in the Old Testament. He thinks himself confirmed in this opinion, because the proseuchæ had groves in or near them, in the same manner as the high places. Prideaux's Connection, part i. book vi. pp. 556, 557.

HIN, הין, a liquid measure; as of oil, (Exod. xxx. ; xiv. 46.) or of wine. (Exod. xxix. Levit. xxiii.) According to Josephus, it contained two Attic congii, and was therefore the sixth part of an ephah. Josephus says, that they offered with an ox half a hin of oil; in English measure, according to Josephus, six pints, 25,598 solid inches, but according to the tables, five pints, 1,267 solid inches. With a ram they offered the third part of a hin, or three pints, 10,469 solid inches; with a lamb, the fourth part of a hin, or two pints, 15,071 solid inches. The prophet Ezekiel was commanded to drink an allowance of water to the quantity of the sixth part of a hin, that is one pint, 19,672 solid inches. Arbuthnot's Tables, &c. p. 99.

HINNOM, הנום, signifies there they are; otherwise, their riches. The valley of Hinnom branched off from the valley of the brook Kidron at Jerusalem. Hinnom is remarkable on account of the inhuman and barbarous, as well as idolatrous, worship here paid to Moloch; 'parents making their children to pass through the fire,' or 'burning them in the fire,' as a sacrifice to that idol. It is sometimes also called the valley of Tophet. From the burning of persons in this place, it was denominated Gehinnom, which in Hebrew signifies the valley of Hinnom, and which was changed by the Greeks into Gehenna, and is used in Scripture to denote hell or hell-fire. This valley is only strait or narrow, as Mr. Sandys informs us; and on the south side of it, near where it joins the valley of Jehoshaphat, is shewn the spot of ground formerly called the potter's field, but afterwards aceldama, or the field of blood. Wells's Geography, vol. ii. p. 39.

HIR'AM, הירם, Χειράμ, signifies, according to the Hebrew, elevation or exaltation of life; otherwise, their whiteness; otherwise, their hole, or their liberty; otherwise he that destroys or anathematizes. Hiram, king of Tyre, and son of Abibal, is mentioned by profane authors as distinguished for his magnificence, and for adorning the city of Tyre. When David was acknowledged king by all Israel, Hiram sent ambassadors with artificers, and cedar to build his palace. Hiram also sent ambassadors to Solomon, to congratulate him on his accession to the crown. Solomon desired of him timber and stones for building the temple, with labourers. These Hiram promised, provided Solomon would furnish him with corn and oil.

These two princes lived on the best understanding with each other. Darius, who wrote the annals of Tyre, relates, that they corresponded; and in the time of Josephus Hiram's letters, with Solomon's answers, were said to be extant. Menander of Ephesus, and the same Darius, speak of certain riddles which these two princes proposed to each other. Darius says, that Solomon first sent some to Hiram, which the latter was not able to solve, and therefore paid a great sum of money to Solomon. But afterwards, Hiram, with the assistance of one Abdemon, explained them; and then proposing others to Solomon, which he could not solve, Hiram received a much larger sum of money than he himself had paid on the like occasion. Joseph. Antiq. lib. viii. cap. 2.

After Solomon had finished all his works, he presented to Hiram twenty towns in Galilee. When Hiram had viewed these places, he was not pleased with them, and called them the land of Cabul, saying, Are these, my brother, the towns which you have given me? The Scripture remarks, that Hiram lent Solomon an hundred and twenty talents of gold, (657,000*l.*) whilst he was employed in building. (1 Kings ix. 14.)

HIRELING, in the writings of Moses, is taken sometimes for a labourer, or foreign servant, who was not a Jew: for example, he forbids the stranger to eat the passover. (Exod. xii. 45.) In another place, (Levit. xxii. 10.) by this word is meant a hired Jew, who is not a priest: he is forbidden to eat of meat that is sanctified and sacrificed to the Lord. In the Gospel, (John x. 12, 13.) the hireling is set in opposition to the true shepherd; the first neglects the sheep, the other loves and guides them carefully.

The hirelings, whom the Father of the family (God) sends into his vineyard, are the prophets and apostles, Jews and Christians: the second succeed the first, and all receive their reward when their work is finished. (Matt. xx. 8.)

'The labourer, or the hireling, is worthy of his hire,' or wages, is used as a proverb. (Matt. x. 10. 1 Tim. v. 18.)

HISS. To hiss is an expression of insult and contempt. 'And at this house, which is high, every one that passeth by it shall be astonished, and shall hiss; and they shall say, 'Why hath the Lord done thus unto this and, land to this house?' (1 Kings ix. 8.) Job (xxvii. 23.) speaking of the wicked, says, that 'they shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place.' I will make this city the subject of ridicule and scorn. (Jer. xix. 8.) 'I will make it desolate and an hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished and hiss, because of all the plagues thereof.' See also Jer. xlix. 17.; i. 13. Lam. ii. 15, 16. Ezek. xxvii. 36. Zeph. ii. 15.

To hiss, or to call any one with hissing, is a mark of power and authority. The Lord says, that in his anger he shall hiss, and call the enemy against Jerusalem: 'He will hiss unto them from the end of the earth.' (Isai. v. 26.) He will bring them with a hiss from the very extremities of the earth. Isaiah (vii. 18.) says, 'The Lord shall hiss for the fly, and shall bring it to him that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.' Zechariah (x. 8.) speaking of the return from the Babylonish captivity, says, that the Lord will gather the house of Judah, as it were, with a hiss, and bring them back into their own country; this shows the ease and authority with which he would perform this great work.

HITTITES, חִתִּים, Chetim, signifies who is broken, or fears; or, according to the Syriac, who descends. 'A man of Bethel went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz.' (Judg. i. 26.) Calmet is of opinion, that this man retired into the land of the Hittites, south of the tribe of Judah, and built Lusa, Elysa, or Lussa, of which geographers speak. Josephus says, that the Jews took the city of Lussa from the Arabians. In memory of his native place, this man of Bethel called his new city by the name of Lussa. The Hittites were the descendants of Heth.

Dr. Wells observes, that Sidon seated himself in the north of the land of Canaan, and Heth in the southern parts, near Hebron. We read, that when Sarah was dead at Hebron, 'Abraham spake to the sons of Heth,' respecting the purchase of a burying-place; to which when they readily agreed, it is said, that 'Abraham stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth.' (Gen. xxiii. 3. 7.) We also read, (Gen. xxvi.) that during Isaac's dwelling at Beersheba, another city in the south of the land of Canaan, his son Esau took to him two Hittite women for wives. Hence it may be reasonably inferred, that the family of Heth settled in the parts about Hebron, between this and Beersheba, that is, in the southern parts of the land of Canaan, and especially in the mountainous part, or hill-country, as it is called. (Luke i. 39.) Agreeably to this, the Hittite is mentioned as dwelling in the mountains. (Josh. xi. 3.) Wells's Geography, vol. i. pp. 129, 130.

HIVITES, חִוִּים, Chivim, signifies those who live, or speak, or give notice: from the Syriac, adders. The Hivites were a people descended from Canaan. They dwelt first in the country afterwards possessed by the Capthorim, or Philistines. The Capthorim expelled the Hivites, who dwelt from Hazerim unto Azzah. (Deut. ii. 23.) There were Hivites also at Shechem, and Gibeon, (Josh. xiii. 14.) in the centre of the promised land; for the inhabitants of Shechem, and the Gibeonites, were Hivites. (Josh. xi. 19.) Lastly, there were some beyond Jordan, at the foot of Mount Hermon. (Gen. xxxiv. 2.)

The name Hivites, in the Chaldee, imports serpents; and we find people so called in many places. Whether, as some supposed, the Hivites were Troglodytes, and dwelt in caves, and from that circumstance derived their name by comparison with serpents; or whether they were countrymen, highlanders, mountaineers, especially in Mount Lebanon, as is indicated, (Josh. xiii. 3.) writers are not agreed. They might be the widely-spread serpent family and nation, yet might dwell in Mount Lebanon as their abode. (Gen. x. 17.; xxxiv. 2.; xxxvi. 2.) In Gen. xv. 21. the Samaritan and Septuagint insert Hivite after Canaanite, apparently with propriety. Sacred Geography

HOFFMANISTS, those who espoused the sentiments of Daniel Hoffman, professor in the university of Helmstadt. In the year 1598, Hoffman taught that the light of reason, even as it appears in the writings of Plato and Aristotle, is adverse to religion; and that the more the human understanding is cultivated by philosophical study, the more perfectly is the enemy supplied with weapons of defence. Enfield's Hist. of Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 506. Adams's View of Religions, p. 168.

HOLINESS, freedom from sin, or the conformity of the heart to God. When the faculties and powers of our nature had been corrupted and impaired by the transgressions of our first parents, God sent his only son Jesus Christ to lay down his life to save ours; and by the inestimable merit of his death and passion, to procure the pardon of God for our sins, and restore us to the divine favour. Having, therefore, been rescued from the guilt, the dominion, and punishment of our sins, by the effusion of the blood of Christ, we are under the highest obligations to pay obedience to the Author of our being, and to the Redeemer of our forfeited lives. Hence, if we are true members of this holy state, the love and fear of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, will be the governing principle of our hearts, and have a powerful influence over all our actions. The necessary conditions of a holy life are, that we diligently and carefully instruct ourselves in all its duties, and faithfully and sincerely practise what we find to be our duty. If sin has dominion over us, our souls cannot be a suitable dwelling for God's Holy Spirit to inhabit. Yet, God requires no more of us than he enables us to perform. If we heartily pray for the divine assistance, if we carefully watch to avoid all occasions of sin, sincerely and resolutely oppose all temptations, we shall be able to mortify and subdue our fleshly lusts and vile affections. There is no ground to encourage men, who customarily allow themselves in any one heinous sin, to think that their condition is good and acceptable to God. There are many sins of so malignant a nature, that God has declared he will exclude those, who habitually practise them, from the kingdom of heaven. We ought humbly and earnestly to beg of God the pardon of our sins, who alone can forgive them; and that he, who has the power of life and death in his hands, would enable us to live innocently and to die peaceably. We should testify the sincere gratitude of our souls, by magnifying the power, admiring the wisdom, and adoring the goodness of God, our best friend, our greatest benefactor, and our most compassionate father. We should do all the good, and show all the mercy we can to our neighbours; preserve purity, patience, and contentment in our souls, and holiness in our whole conversation. When a custom of holy living has vanquished the difficulties which attended its commencement, the heavenly virtues which a man has acquired will be so many preservatives against his falling into sin. His humility will secure him from presuming too much on his own strength. His experience of God's help and favour in former troubles will induce him to resist the allurements of unlawful pleasures, and patiently to endure any afflictions, rather than comply with what is evil. The sense of religion and humanity deeply rooted in his mind will oblige him, in his whole conduct, to have a regard to truth, justice, equity, and compassion. It is objected by some, that they despair of arriving at such a pitch of virtue, as is related of some good men. To this it may be answered, that though they may never reach such a height of virtue as many have done, yet there is no reason to despond. In the celestial mansions will be different degrees of honour; 'one star will shine above another star in glory.' They who shall not sit on the right hand of God, may nevertheless be admitted to a less degree of honour. The failings of Noah, David, Hezekiah, St. Peter, and other eminent saints, are recorded in Scripture, as a caution to the best men not to be too secure; and as encouragement to the weak and feeble, but sincere worshippers of God, not to despair. In order to promote our improvement and growth in grace, we should endeavour to obtain a meek and humble frame of spirit. We should consider our wants and imperfections, the weaknesses of which we are guilty, the graces we want, and how much we stand in need of the divine assistance. We should constantly attend the offices of religion, both public and private, for these are the means appointed by God, to convey grace to men. We ought frequently to look into the state and condition of our souls. We should set apart some certain portion of our time, daily or weekly, to examine ourselves, and observe what advances we make in the ways of religion and holiness, and the sins of which we have been guilty. We should entertain and cherish the motions of God's

Holy Spirit; and when we find any good thoughts arise in our minds, we should impress them on our memories, improve them by meditation, and transcribe them into our actions. We have daily new vices to mortify, virtuous dispositions to exercise and cultivate, temptations to resist, and afflictions to encounter; and all these require the assistance of God's grace, which is never wanting to those who ask it with faith, and employ it with diligence.

God is holy in a transcendent and infinitely perfect manner. He is the fountain of holiness, purity, and innocence. He sanctifies his saints, his people, his priests. He requires perfect holiness in those who approach him, and to be honoured by his servants. He rejects all worship which is not pure and holy, whether internal or external.

The prophets called the Lord the Holy One of Israel, as if holy were synonymous with God. The Messiah is called the holy one: 'Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.' (Ps. xvi. 10.) 'Thy redeemer is the Holy One of Israel.' (Isa. xli. 14.) In the Gospel, 'I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God.' (Luke iv. 34., Again, 'The Holy Thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God.' (Luke i. 35.) Jesus Christ is called simply the Holy One: 'Ye denied the Holy One and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted to you.' (Acts iii. 14.) Holy is the common epithet given to the third person of the Trinity, the Holy Ghost.

In Scripture, the Israelites are generally called holy, because they are the Lord's; they profess the true religion, are called to holiness, &c. 'Ye shall be an holy nation. Ye shall be holy unto me.' (Exod. xix. 6.) 'All the congregation are holy, every one of them.' (Lev. xi. 44, 45. Num. xvi. 3.)

From the infinite holiness of God, every thing belonging to him should be styled holy; his temples, his ministers, his solemnities, &c.

Christians are more particularly declared holy, as being called to, and designed for, a more excellent holiness, and having received earnest of the Holy Spirit in a more plentiful and perfect manner. St. Luke in the Acts, and St. Paul in his Epistles, generally describe Christians under the name of saints, that is, holy. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iv. pp. 73—82.

HOLY GHOST, HOLY SPIRIT, or SPRIT, the name given to the third person in the Trinity. Tertullian says, 'In the mean time he poured forth the Holy Ghost, a gift which he had received from the Father, the third person in the Godhead, and the third name of Majesty.' The Old Testament frequently mentions the Spirit of God; as at the creation of the world the Spirit is said to have 'moved upon the face of the waters.' (Gen. i. 2.) When the prophets received any supernatural power or knowledge, or any impression was made upon their minds for a particular purpose, it is generally ascribed to the Spirit of God.

It is recorded by St. John, that Christ, not long before his crucifixion, said to his disciples, 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you, even the Spirit of Truth.' (John xiv. 16, 17.) In the following passage, our Saviour speaks of the office of the Holy Spirit, as having a close and intimate connexion with his own personal ministry, and as being of the highest importance to the complete execution and accomplishment of the great scheme of human redemption: 'I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you; and he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you.' (John xvi. 7.; xiv. 26.) Agreeably to this promise and declaration, on the day of Pentecost, and a few days after the ascension of our Saviour into heaven, the Holy Ghost descended visibly on the apostles, and instantaneously communicated to them the power of speaking a great variety of languages, enabled them to work miracles in confirmation of the doctrines which they were to preach, and furnished them with zeal and resolution, and with every other qualification necessary to the effectual discharge of their ministry. The Holy Ghost also 'abode with them,' as our Saviour promised; for we find them constantly acting under his immediate and directing influence; and the success which attended the first preaching of the Gospel is always ascribed to 'the power of the Spirit of God.' (Rom. xv. 19.) Besides these great gifts communicated to the apostles and others, and these particular interpositions for important purposes at the first promulgation of Christianity; and which are called by modern divines the extraordinary operations of the Spirit, there are other communications of a more general nature, which are called the ordinary operations of the Spirit. These consist in causing a change and renewal of men's minds, and in affording them inward and secret assistance to become good and virtuous. Christ said to Nicodemus, 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' (John iii. 5.) 'The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.' (Gal. v. 22, 23.) St. Peter, in his sermon on the day of Pentecost, said, 'repent, and be baptized every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.' (Acts ii. 38, 39.) In these and some other passages, the influence of the Spirit spoken of must be common to all Christians, and cannot mean the extraordinary and miraculous communications, which were the portion of very few, and continued only for a short time; and hence we derive this comfortable and important assurance, that the Spirit of God co-operates with our sincere endeavours after righteousness, and assists us in all our virtuous exertions.

That the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father we learn from the express authority of St. John, (xv. 26.) who says, 'the Spirit of Truth which proceedeth from the Father.' As Christ in the same verse says, 'I will send the Spirit,' and St. Paul tells the Galatians that God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into their hearts,' (Gal. iv. 6.) we infer, that the Spirit proceeds from the Son also. Indeed, the union between the Father and the Son is such, that we cannot conceive how the Spirit can proceed from the one without at the same time proceeding from the other. But we must acknowledge that the procession of the Holy Ghost, though to be believed as being asserted in Scripture, is far beyond our comprehension; and in subjects of this kind we cannot be too cautious and diffident in what we say and think.

The following passages prove the divinity of the Holy Ghost. St. Peter, in punishing Ananias and Sapphira, uses the expressions, 'lying to the Holy Ghost,' and 'lying to God,' (Acts v. 3, 4.) as synonymous; the Holy Ghost is said to be eternal; (Heb. ix. 14.) to teach all things; (John xiv. 26.) to guide into all truth; (John xvi. 13.) to shew things to come; (John xvi. 13.) to search all things, even the deep things of God; (1 Cor. ii. 10.) to make intercession for the saints; (Rom. viii. 27.) to change us into the same image with Christ; (2 Cor. iii. 18.) to bring all things to remembrance; (John xiv. 26.) to reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; (John xvi. 8.) and to have raised Christ from the dead. (1 Pet. iii. 18.) Christ himself calls the Holy Ghost 'another Comforter,' (John xiv. 16.) to be sent in his stead, or to supply his absence. St. Paul attributes to the Holy Ghost the communication of a great variety of qualities and powers: 'now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit; to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom, to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues; but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.' (1 Cor. xii. 4, 8, &c.) In all these passages the Holy Ghost is plainly spoken of, not merely as a quality or operation, but as a person; and the powers attributed to him are such, that they can belong only to a divine person.

"Those who deny the personality of the Holy Ghost, contend that it is ordinary in the Scriptures to find the like expressions, which are proper unto persons, given unto those things which are no persons; as when the apostle saith, 'charity suffereth long, and is kind, charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things; believeth all things; hopeth all things; endureth all things.' (1 Cor. xiii. 4, &c.) All which personal actions are attributed to charity, which is no person, as in other cases it is usual, but belong to that person which is charitable; because that person which is so qualified doth perform these actions according to, and by virtue of, that charity which is in him. In the same manner say they, personal actions are attributed to the Holy Ghost, which is no person, but the virtue, power, and efficacy of God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; because that God the Father is a person, and doth perform those personal actions attributed to the Holy Ghost by that virtue, power, and efficacy in himself, which is the Holy Ghost: as when we read, 'the Spirit said unto Peter, Behold, three men seek thee; arise, therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing, for I have sent them;' we must understand that God the Father was the person who spake these words, who had called Barnabas and Saul, and to whom they were to be separated. But because God did all this by that power within him which is his Spirit, therefore those words and actions are attributed to the Holy Ghost. This is the sum of their answer, and more than this, I conceive, cannot be said in answer to that argument which we urge from those personal expressions attributed to the Spirit of God, and, as we believe, as to a person. But this answer is most apparently insufficient, as giving no satisfaction to the argument; for if all the personal actions attributed in the Scriptures to the Spirit, might proceed from the person of God the Father, according to the power which is in him, then might this answer seem satisfactory: but if these actions be personal, as they are acknowledged and cannot be denied; if the same cannot be attributed to the person of God the Father, whose Spirit it is; if he cannot be said to do that by the power within him, which is said to be done by the Holy Ghost, then is that defence not to be defended; then must the Holy Ghost be acknowledged a person: but I shall clearly prove that there are several personal attributes given in the sacred Scriptures expressly to the Holy Ghost, which cannot be ascribed to God the Father; which God the Father, by that power which is in him, cannot be said to do; and consequently, there cannot be any ground why those attributes should be given to the Spirit, if it be not a person. To make intercession is a personal action, and this action is attributed to the Spirit of God, because he maketh intercession for the saints, according to the will of God; but to make intercession is not an act which can be attributed to God the Father, neither can he be said to intercede for us according to that power which is in him; and therefore this can be no prosopopeia, or feigning of a person: the Holy Ghost cannot be said to exercise the personal action of intercession for that reason, because it is the Spirit of the person which intercedeth for us. To come unto men, as being sent unto them, is, as I have said before, a personal action; but to come unto men, as being sent, cannot be ascribed to God the Father, who sendeth, but is never sent, especially in this particular, in which he is said expressly to send, and that in the name of the Son; for our Saviour's words are, 'whom the Father will send in my name.' When, therefore, the Holy Ghost cometh to the sons of men, as sent by the Father in the name of the Son, and sent by the Son himself, this personal action cannot be attributed to the Father, as working by the power within him, and consequently cannot ground a prosopopeia, by which the virtue or power of God the Father shall be said to do it. To speak and hear are personal actions, and both together attributed to the Spirit in such a manner, as they cannot be ascribed to God the Father; 'when he,' saith Christ, 'the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak.' (John xvi. 13.) Now to speak, and not of himself, cannot be attributed to God the Father, who doth all things of himself; to speak what he heareth, and that of the Son, to deliver what he receiveth from another, and to glorify him from whom he receiveth, by receiving from him as Christ speaketh of the Holy Ghost, 'he shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you,' (John xvi. 14.) is by no means applicable to the Father, and, consequently, it cannot be true that the Holy Ghost is therefore said to do these personal actions, because that Person whose Spirit the Holy Ghost is, doth these actions by, and according to, his own power, which is the Holy Ghost. It remaineth, therefore, that the answer given by the adversaries of this truth is apparently insufficient; and, consequently, that our argument, drawn from the personal actions attributed in the Scriptures to the Spirit, is sound and valid. I thought this discourse had fully destroyed the Socinian prosopopeia; and indeed as they ordinarily propound their answer, it is abundantly refuted; but I find the subtlety of Socinus prepared another explication of the prosopopeia, to supply the room, when he foresaw the other would not serve; which double figure he grounded upon this distinction; the Spirit, that is, the power of God, says he, may be considered either as a propriety and power in God, or as the things on which it worketh are affected with it: if it be considered in the first notion, then, if any personal attribute be given to the Spirit, the Spirit is there taken for God, and by the Spirit God is signified. If it be considered in the second notion, then, if any personal attribute be given to the Spirit, the Spirit is there taken for that man in which it worketh; and that man affected with it, is called the Spirit of God. So that now we must not only show, that such things as are attributed to the Holy Ghost cannot be spoken of the Father, but we must also prove, that they cannot be attributed unto man, in whom the Spirit worketh from the Father. And this also will be very easily and evidently proved. The Holy Ghost is said to come unto the Apostles, as sent by the Father and the Son; and to come as so sent, is a personal action, which we have already showed cannot be the action of the Father who sent the Spirit; and it is as certain, that it cannot be the action of the apostle who was affected with the Spirit which was sent, except we can say, that the Father and the Son did come unto St. Peter; and St. Peter, being sent by the Father and the Son did come unto St. Peter. Again, our Saviour, speaking of the Holy Ghost, saith, 'he shall receive of mine,' therefore the Holy Ghost in that place is not taken for the Father; 'and show it unto you,' therefore he is not taken for an apostle: in that he 'receiveth,' the first Socinian prosopopeia is improper; in that he 'showeth' to the apostle, the second is absurd. The Holy Ghost then is described as a person distinct from the person of the Father, whose power he is; and distinct from the person of the apostle, in whom he worketh; and, consequently, neither of the Socinian figures can evacuate or enervate the doctrine of his proper and peculiar personality. Secondly, for those attributes or expressions used of the Holy Ghost in the sacred Scriptures, and pretended to be repugnant to the nature of a person; either they are not so repugnant, or if they be, they belong unto the Spirit, as it signifieth not the person, but the gifts or effects of the Spirit. They tell us that the Spirit is given, and that, sometimes in measure, sometimes without measure; that the Spirit is poured out, and that men drink of it, and are filled with it; that it is doubled and distributed, and something is taken from it, and that sometimes it is extinguished; and from hence they gather, that the Holy Ghost is not a person, because these expressions are inconsistent with personality. But a satisfactory answer is easily returned to this objection. It is true, that God is said to have given the 'Holy Ghost to them that obey him;' (Acts v. 32.) but it is as true that a person may be given. So we read 'unto us a Son is given;' (Is. ix. 6.) and we are assured that 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son; (John iii. 16.) and certainly the Son of God is a person. And if all the rest of the expressions be such as they pretend, that is, not proper to a person, yet do they no way prejudice the truth of our assertion, because we acknowledge the effects and operations of the Spirit to have in the Scriptures the name of the Spirit, who is the cause of those operations. And since to that Spirit, as the cause, we have already shown those attributes to be given, which can agree to nothing but a person, we therefore conclude, against the Socinians and the Jews, that the Holy Ghost is not an energy, operation, quality, or power, but a person, a spiritual and intellectual subsistence." Veneer, Expos. of the Fifth Art.; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 171, &c.

HONEY. Bees are some of the smallest creatures that fly; but the produce of them is the sweetest thing in the world. The Scripture, describing a troop of enemies pursuing with obstinacy and warmth, uses the similitude of bees: 'The Amorites chased you as bees do.' (Deut. i. 44.) 'They compassed me about like bees.' (Ps. cxviii. 12.)

God did not permit honey to be offered on his altar: 'ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire.' (Levit. ii. 11.) Many reasons are given for this law: as, that honey does not agree well with other things, as with roast meat, which was offered in sacrifice, and that it makes bread sour; or because bees are unclean insects; or because honey is the symbol of carnal pleasures; or because the Heathens offered honey in their sacrifices. As the god of flies is considered the same as the god of bees, this might be one reason why honey was forbidden to be offered on the altar of the Lord. Some think, that the reason of this prohibition was, because honey is apt to gripe and prove purgative; and hence the College of Physicians have totally left it out of all medicinal preparations.

Though God forbids honey to be offered in sacrifice, yet he commands the first-fruits of it to be presented to him; these first fruits and offerings being designed for the support of the priests, and not to be offered on the altar. By the word honey, שֶׁבַע דְּבַשׁ, the rabbins and authors of Hebrew dictionaries understand not only the honey of bees, but also the honey of dates, of the fruits of the palm-tree, or the dates themselves, from which honey is extracted: and when God enjoins the first-fruits of honey to be offered to him, the first-fruits of dates seem to be meant: for we know that generally the produce only of fruits was offered.

Honey was formerly very common in Palestine. The frequent expressions of Scripture, which import that this country was a land flowing with milk and honey, are proofs of this. Moses says, that the 'Lord made his people to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock.' (Deut. xxxii. 13.) Honey ran upon the ground in the forest, where Jonathan dipped the end of his staff in a honey-comb, and sucked it. (1 Sam. xiv. 25, 26, 27.) Hence it appears, that the country abounded in wild bees, which hiving in the rocks, furnished honey. Travellers observe that honey is at this day very plentiful in Palestine; and that the inhabitants mix it in all their sauces. Hasselquist says, that between Acra and Nazareth 'great numbers of wild bees breed, to the advantage of the inhabitants.' Maundrell observes of the great salt plain near Jericho, 'that he perceived in it in many places, a smell of honey and wax, as strong as if he had been in an apiary.' John the Baptist fed on wild honey found in the rocks or in hollow trees. (Matt. iii. 4.) Children were fed with milk, cream, and honey. 'Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know how to refuse the evil, and choose the good.' (Isai. vii. 15.) Scripture Illustrated; Dr. Adam Clarke on Leviticus ii. 11; Maundrell's Travels, pp. 66. 86.

HONOUR is taken not only for the inward or outward respect paid to superiors, those to whom we owe particular deference and distinction; but for real services; 'honour thy father and mother,' (Exod. xx. 12.); that is, not only show respect and deference, but assist them, and perform such services to them as they need. By honour is also understood that adoration which is due to God only: 'give unto the Lord the honour due unto his name.' (Psal. xxix. 2.)

By the true honour of man is to be understood, not what commands merely external respect, but what commands the respect of the heart : what raises one to acknowledged eminence above others ; what always creates esteem, and in its highest degree produces veneration. Honour does not arise from riches. These may belong to the vilest of mankind ; and daily experience proves that the possession of them is consistent with the greatest contempt. Honour does not arise from mere dignity of rank or office. If such distinctions were always, or even generally, obtained in consequence of uncommon merit, they would, indeed, confer honour on the character. But, in the present state of society, it is too well known that this is not the case. They are frequently the consequence of birth alone. They are sometimes the fruit of mere dependence and assiduity ; and they may be the recompence of flattery, versatility, and intrigue. The proper honour of man does not arise from some of those splendid actions and abilities which excite great admiration. Courage and prowess, military renown, signal victories and conquests, may render the name of a man famous, without rendering his character truly honourable. The laurels of the warrior must at all times be dyed in blood, and bedewed with the tears of the widow and the orphan. But if they have been stained by rapine and inhumanity ; if sordid avarice has marked his character, or low and gross sensuality degraded his life ; the great hero degenerates into a mean and little man. The refined politics of the statesman, or the literary efforts of genius and erudition, bestow, and within certain bounds ought to bestow, eminence and distinction on men. Hence they frequently give rise to fame. But we must distinguish between fame and honour. The former is a loud and noisy applause ; the latter is a more silent and internal homage. Fame floats on the breath of the multitude ; honour rests on the judgment of the considerate. In order, therefore, to discern where true honour lies, we must not look to any adventitious circumstance, nor to any single sparkling quality, but to the whole of what forms a man ; in a word we must look to the soul. It will discover itself by a mind superior to fear, to selfish interest and corruption ; by an ardent love to the Supreme Being, and by the principles of uniform rectitude and integrity. It will make us neither afraid nor ashamed of discharging our duty, true to the God whom we worship, and to the faith in which we profess to believe, and full of affection to our brethren of mankind. It will influence us to be magnanimous, without being proud ; humble, without being mean ; just, without being harsh ; simple in our manners, but manly in our feelings. The honour thus formed by religion, or the love of God, is more independent and complete, than what can be acquired by any other means. It is independent of any thing foreign or external ; it does not procure partial, but entire, respect. Where fortune is concerned, it is the station or rank which commands our deference. Where some shining quality attracts admiration, it is only to a part of the character that we pay homage. But when a person is distinguished for eminent worth and goodness, it is the man, the whole man, whom we respect. The honour which he possesses is intrinsic. If he be placed in an obscure situation, he will be revered as a private citizen, or as the father of a family. If in higher life he appear more illustrious, it is because a nobler sphere of action is opened to him ; and, placed in such conspicuous view, he seems to grace and adorn the station which he fills. The universal consent of mankind in honouring real virtue, sufficiently shows what the genuine sense of human nature is on this subject. All other claims of honour are changeable. The honour acquired by religion is honour divine and immortal. It is honour, not in the estimation of men only, but in the sight of God, whose judgment is the standard of truth and right. All the honour we can gain among men is limited and confined. Its circle is narrow, its duration short and transitory. But the honour founded on religion accompanies us through the whole progress of our existence. It enters with man into a future state, and continues to brighten throughout eternal ages. The honour which proceeds from God is unmixed and pure. It is a lustre which is derived from heaven. On the contrary, the honours which proceed from any other source, resemble the feeble and twinkling flame of a taper, which is often clouded by the smoke it sends forth, and is always wasting, and soon dies totally away. Blair's Sermons, Serm. xxxi.

HOPE, is the desire of some good attended with at least the possibility of obtaining it, and is enlivened with joy, greater or less, according to the probability of possessing the objects of our hope. Whatever may be the sufferings in this life to which we are exposed, hope is the balm that heals our present woes. Hope, of which those who trust in God can never experience the privation, is, in itself, a most pleasurable feeling. The anticipation of future good cannot but serve to blunt the edge of present suffering. We often voluntarily submit to present loss of fortune, or of ease, in order to obtain some distant and future benefit ; and it is the prospect of the benefit which reconciles the mind to the endurance of the loss. And will not the certain assurance of an eternal recompence in a better life invigorate our fortitude, exhilarate our hopes, and make us deem our burthen easy, and our affliction light ? We have before us the example of the blessed Jesus, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame. We have the examples of the holy apostles, who cheerfully sustained accumulated woes. We know from Christianity, that this life is a state of probation; that its troubles are trials of our faith; that no believer shall be tempted above what he is able to bear; that he shall have support from Heaven; and that his afflictions, which endure comparatively but for a moment, shall be rewarded with an eternal and exceeding weight of glory.

Under the pressure of adversity, the true Christian looks up to God as to a friend and father, with hope and confidence, and sees, amidst the gloominess which surrounds him, a bright effulgence bursting from the lowering horizon; a serene sky, which forbodes that the clouds immediately surrounding him will soon be dispelled. Though he travel with weary steps in the vale of sorrow and darkness, and his feet be ready to slip in the dangerous and rugged road, yet shall God be his support and guide. Though he stumble, yet shall he not fall; the arm of the Almighty shall be stretched out to raise him up, and, through hope in the aid of his God, he shall persevere with alacrity, and finally conquer, and be crowned with immortality. In every calamity to which man is heir, he, whose hope is placed in the Almighty, will find comforts springing up like flowers under his feet in a desert. He will experience, that God is the Father of the fatherless, the husband of the widow, the friend of the friendless, and the sure guardian of all those who have none to help them. An inward strength is supplied to him, who, in the midst of misery, abounds in faith, and indulges hope. True religion possesses a power resembling that of oil poured on the troubled sea, which smoothes the waves to a glassy expanse of limpid water. True religion is the panacea, the anodyne of woe, the universal medicine of mental disease. Little does the man of the world know of that health of mind, that serene cheerfulness, that divine complacency, which soothes the resigned Christian, who, whenever his soul has a tendency to be disquieted within him, resolves to hope in God. In consequence of this firm reliance, he finds the light of God's countenance beaming upon him with the most animating warmth, and the brightest illumination; like the day-spring from on high chasing away the shades of night. He stands as a rock in the sea; the waves beat on its base, but eternal sunshine settles upon its head.

Hope in God will sweeten every enjoyment in a successful season, and alleviate the burden of every evil in the day of our calamities. Happy situation! to have the all-powerful and most merciful Lord of heaven and earth our friend and protector against the assaults of adversity. He shall defend us, under the shadow of his wing, from every evil which the devil or man worketh against us. Though we appear unfortunate in the eyes of the world; though we be poor and despised, who were once rich and honoured; though we may suffer in our reputation; though we be tormented with pain and the languor of ill health; though death tear from us the objects of our love; yet will we hope in God, who will infuse a balsam into our hearts, which will assuage every anguish, and heal every sore. The fear of death, which torments the sinful, shall have no painful effects on the man who really hopes, and freely trusts, in Him who hath subdued death, and brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel. Knox's Sermons, pp. 25, 26, &c.; Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 433.

HOPHNI, הופני, signifies he that covers, otherwise, my fist. Hophni and Phinehas, sons of Eli, the high-priest, were, says the Scripture, sons of Belial, wicked and dissolute. (1 Sam. ii. 12, 13, &c.) They knew not the Lord, nor performed the functions of their ministry in the tabernacle as they ought; for when any Israelite had sacrificed a peace-offering, the son or servant of the priest came whilst they were dressing the flesh of it, and holding a fork with three teeth in his hand, he put it into the pot, and what he could take up with it was the priest's portion. In like manner also, before the fat was burnt, the priest's servant came and said to him who sacrificed, Give me flesh to roast, for I will have the flesh raw. Let us first burn the fat, according to custom, said he who sacrificed. To this the servant replied, No; you shall give it me instantly, or I will take it by force. Rightly to understand this place, it must be observed, that the text regards not burnt-offerings or sacrifices for sin, but only peace-offerings, or those presented out of voluntary devotion; the blood of which, the fat, the kidneys, and the caul which covers the intestines, were offered to the Lord; all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to him who offered it, and who was to give the priest for his fee the right shoulder and the breast. Moses does not say, (Levit. vii. 31, 32.) whether this should be given dressed or raw. It appears, however, from this place, 1. that it was not given to the priest till it was dressed; and 2. that the priest had no right to demand it, till the fat was offered on the fire of the altar.

To the irregularities of his sons, the high-priest Eli was no stranger. He reproveth them, but so faintly, that they did not change their behaviour. The Lord, therefore, sent a threatening message to Eli, foretelling the destruction of his house. Some years after, the Lord caused Eli and his sons to be threatened by the young prophet Samuel. Accordingly, the Philistines having declared war against Israel, Israel lost about 4000 men. The elders of Israel said, Bring hither the ark of the Lord, that it may save us from our enemies; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, brought the ark into the camp. But God permitted the Philistines to obtain another victory; and they killed 30,000 men, among whom were Hophni and Phinehas, and carried away the ark of the covenant.

HOPKINSIANS, so called from the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D.D., an American divine, who in his sermons and tracts has made several additions to the sentiments first advanced by the celebrated Jonathan Edwards, late president of New Jersey college.

The following is a summary of the distinguishing tenets of the Hopkinsians, together with a few of the reasons they bring forward in support of their sentiments.

1. That all true virtue, or real holiness, consists in disinterested benevolence. The object of benevolence is universal being, including God and all intelligent creatures. It wishes and seeks the good of every individual, so far as is consistent with the greatest good of the whole, which is comprised in the glory of God, and the perfection and happiness of his kingdom. The law of God is the standard of all moral rectitude or holiness. This is reduced into love to God and our neighbour as ourselves; and universal good-will comprehends all the love to God, our neighbour, and ourselves, required in the divine law, and, therefore, must be the whole of holy obedience. Let any serious person think what are the particular branches of true piety; when he has viewed each one by itself, he will find that disinterested friendly affections is its distinguishing characteristic. For instance, all the holiness in pious fear, which distinguishes it from the fear of the wicked, consists in love. Again, holy gratitude is nothing but good-will to God and our neighbour, in which we ourselves are included; and correspondent affection, excited by a view of the kindness and good-will of God. Universal good-will also implies the whole of the duty we owe to our neighbour; for justice, truth, and faithfulness, are comprised in universal benevolence; so are temperance and chastity. For an undue indulgence of our appetites and passions is contrary to benevolence, as tending to hurt ourselves or others; and so opposite to the general good, and the divine command, in which all the crime of such indulgence consists. In short, all virtue is nothing but benevolence acted out in its proper nature or perfection; or love to God and our neighbour, made perfect in all its genuine exercises and expressions.

2. That all sin consists in selfishness. By this is meant an interested selfish affection, by which a person sets himself up as supreme, and the only object of regard; and nothing is good or lovely in his view, unless suited to promote his own private interest. This self-love is in its whole nature, and every degree of it, enmity against God; it is not subject to the law of God, and is the only affection that can oppose it. It is the foundation of all spiritual blindness, and, therefore, the source of all the open idolatry in the heathen world, and false religion under the light of the Gospel; all this is agreeable to that self-love which opposes God's true character. Under the influence of this principle, men depart from truth; it being itself the greatest practical lie in nature, as it sets up that which is comparatively nothing above universal existence. Self-love is the source of all profaneness and impiety in the world, and of all pride and ambition among men, which is nothing but selfishness, acted out in this particular way. This is the foundation of all covetousness and sensuality, as it blinds people's eyes, contracts their hearts, and sinks them down, so that they look upon earthly enjoyments as the greatest good. This is the source of all falsehood, injustice, and oppression, as it excites mankind by undue methods to invade the property of others. Self-love produces all the violent passions; envy, wrath, clamour, and evil-speaking; and every thing contrary to the divine law, is briefly comprehended in this fruitful source of all iniquity, self-love.

3. That there are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate. For as far as men act from self-love, they act from a bad end: for those who have no true love to God, really do no duty when they attend on the externals of religion. And as the unregenerate act from a selfish principle, they do nothing which is commanded: their impenitent doings are wholly opposed to repentance and conversion; therefore, not implied in the command to repent, &c.; so far from this, they are altogether disobedient to the command. Hence it appears, that there are no promises of salvation to the doings of the unregenerate.

4. That the impotency of sinners, with respect to believing in Christ, is not natural, but moral; for it is a plain dictate of common sense, that natural impossibility excludes all blame. But an unwilling mind is universally considered as a crime, and not as an excuse, and is the very thing in which our wickedness consists. That the impotence of the sinner is owing to a disaffection of heart, is evident from the promises of the Gospel. When any object of good is proposed and promised to us upon asking, it clearly evinces that there can be no impotence in us with respect to obtaining it, besides the disapprobation of the will; and that inability which consists in disinclination, never renders any thing improperly the subject of precept or command.

5. That in order to faith in Christ, a sinner must approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though God should cast him off for ever; which, however, neither implies love to misery, nor hatred of happiness. For if the law is good, death is due to those who have broken it. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do right. It would bring everlasting reproach upon his government to spare us, considered merely as in ourselves. When this is felt in our hearts, and not till then, we shall be prepared to look to the free grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ, and to exercise faith in his blood, who is set forth to be a propitiation to declare God's righteousness, that he might be just, and yet be the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

6. That the infinitely wise and holy God has exerted his omnipotent power in such a manner as he purposed should be followed with the existence and entrance of moral evil into the system. For it must be admitted on all hands, that God has a perfect knowledge, foresight, and view of all possible existences and events. If that system and scene of operation, in which moral evil should never have existence, was actually preferred in the divine mind, certainly the Deity is infinitely disappointed in the issue of his own operations. Nothing can be more dishonourable to God than to imagine, that the system which is actually formed by the divine hand, and which was made for his pleasure and glory, is yet not the fruit of wise contrivance and design.

7. That the introduction of sin is, upon the whole, for the general good. For the wisdom and power of the Deity are displayed in carrying on designs of the greatest good; and the existence of moral evil has, undoubtedly, occasioned a more full, perfect, and glorious discovery of the infinite perfections of the divine nature, than could otherwise have been made to the view of creatures. If the extensive manifestations of the pure and holy nature of God, and his infinite aversion to sin, and all his inherent perfections, in their genuine fruits and effects, is either itself the greatest good, or necessarily contains it; it must necessarily follow, that the introduction of sin is for the general good.

8. That repentance is before faith in Christ. By this is not intended that repentance is before a speculative belief of the being and perfections of God, and of the person and character of Christ; but only, that true repentance is previous to a saving faith in Christ, in which the believer is united to Christ, and entitled to the benefits of his mediation and atonement. That repentance is before faith in this sense, appears from several considerations. (1.) As repentance and faith respect different objects, so they are distinct exercises of the heart; and, therefore, one not only may, but must be prior to the other. (2.) There may be genuine repentance of sin, without faith in Christ; but there cannot be true faith in Christ, without repentance of sin; and since repentance is necessary in order to faith in Christ, it must necessarily be prior to faith in Christ. (3.) John the Baptist, Christ, and his Apostles, taught that repentance is before faith. John cried, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; intimating that true repentance was necessary in order to embrace the Gospel of the kingdom. Christ commanded, Repent ye, and believe the Gospel. And Paul preached repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ.

9. That though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have, and are accountable for no sins but personal: for, (1.) Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the act of his posterity; therefore they did not sin at the same time he did. (2.) The sinfulness of that act could not be transferred to them afterwards; because the sinfulness of an act can no more be transferred from one person to another, than an act itself. 3. Therefore Adam's act, in eating the forbidden fruit, was not the cause, but only the occasion, of his posterity's being sinners. God was pleased to make a constitution, that if Adam remained holy through his state of trial, his posterity should, in consequence, be holy also; but if he sinned, his posterity should be sinners likewise. Adam sinned, and now God brings his posterity into the world sinners. By Adam's sin we are become sinners, not for it; his sin being only the occasion, not the cause of our committing sins.

10. That though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them. For (1.) personal righteousness can no more be transferred from one person to another than personal sin. (2.) If Christ's personal righteousness were transferred to believers, they would be as perfectly holy as Christ; and so stand in no need of forgiveness. (3.) But believers are not conscious of having Christ's personal righteousness; but feel and bewail much indwelling sin and corruption. (4.) The Scripture represents believers as receiving only the benefits of Christ's righteousness in justification, or their being pardoned and accepted for Christ's righteousness' sake: and this is the proper Scripture notion of imputation. Jonathan's righteousness was imputed to Mephibosheth, when David showed kindness to him for his father Jonathan's sake.

The Hopkinsians warmly advocate the doctrine of the divine decrees, that of particular election, total depravity, the special influence of the Spirit of God in regeneration, justification by faith alone, the final perseverance of the saints, and the consistency between entire freedom and absolute dependence; and therefore claim it as their just due, since the world will make distinctions, to be called Hopkinsian Calvinists. Adams's View of Religions, p. 163, &c.; Hopkins on Holiness, p. 7—202; Edwards on the Will, pp. 234—289; Edwards on Virtue; West's Essays on Moral Agency, pp. 170—181; Spring's Nature of Duty, p. 23; Moral Disquisitions, p. 40

HO'REB, הָרֵב, Ὠρηβ, signifies desert, solitude, destruction, dryness, the sword. Horeb is a mountain in Arabia Petræa, so near Mount Sinai, that Horeb and Sinai appear to be two hills of the same mountain. Sinai is on the east, and Horeb on the west: and hence, when the sun rises, the latter is covered with the shadow of Sinai. There are springs and fruit-trees upon Horeb, but only rain-water upon Sinai. At Horeb, God appeared to Moses in a burning bush. (Exod. iii. 1, 2, 3.) At the foot of this mountain Moses struck the rock, and drew water from it. (Exod. xvii. 6.) Elijah retired hither to avoid the persecution of Jezebel. (1 Kings xix. 8.) It is frequently said, that God gave the law at Horeb, though other places expressly name Sinai; because Horeb and Sinai in some sort form but one mountain.

HO'RITES, הֹרִי, Ὠρηῖται, signifies princes, heroes, or free-men; otherwise, who are in a passion. The Horites were an ancient people, who dwelt in the mountains of Seir beyond Jordan. (Gen. xiv. 6.) They had princes, and were powerful before Esau conquered their country. Afterwards, the Horites and the Edomites seem to have composed but one people. They dwelt in Arabia Petræa, and Arabia Deserta, south-east of Judea. (Deut. ii. 1; xxxiii. 2. Judg. v. 4.)

The Hebrew Chori, or Chorim, translated Horites in Genesis, is used in an appellative sense in other passages of Scripture, and signifies heroes, great and powerful men. Hence, says Calmet, the Greeks probably derived their heroes, as they derived Anax, a king, from Anak, the giant, and his sons, (1 Kings xxi. 8. 11. Nehem. ii. 16; iv. 14; v. 7; vi. 17; vii. 5; xiii. 17; Eccles. x. 17. Isa. xxxiv. 12.)

HOR/MAH, חֹרְמָה, signifies destruction, or destructive curse; otherwise, net-work, or a small net; otherwise, dedicated, or consecrated to God. The original name of this city was Zephath, a mirror, which was changed by the Hebrews to Hormah. What occasioned this denomination was as follows: the king of Arad, a Canaanite, who dwelt south of the Land of Promise, having attacked the Hebrews, put them to flight, and took a very rich booty. The Israelites, therefore, engaged themselves by vow to devote every thing belonging to the king of Arad, and entirely destroy it. It is very probable, that this vow was not executed till after Joshua entered the Land of Promise. (Josh. xv. 30.) Hormah afterwards belonged to the tribe of Simeon.

It is certain, that things irrevocably consecrated to God were not, therefore, destroyed, but that the use of those things was continued in the divine service. In like manner, it has been asked, What forbids our supposing that the property of a town was vested in the national institutions for worship? that its revenues, &c. were wholly appropriated, in perpetuity, to the tabernacle, or the temple, so that they were irrevocable on the part of the nation, without including the idea of utter destruction of the thing, or place, &c. vowed to the Lord? Sacred Geography.

HORN. By horns the Hebrews sometimes understood an eminence, or angle, a corner, or a rising. By horns of the altar of burnt-offerings many understand the angles of that altar; but there were also horns, or eminences, at the corners of that altar. (Exod. xxvii. 2. xxx. 2.)

Horn also signifies glory, brightness, rays. God's 'brightness was as the light, he had horns coming out of his hand,' that is, refulgent beams issuing from the hollow of it. (Hab. iii. 4.)

As the ancients frequently used horns to hold liquors, vessels containing oil, and perfumes, are often called horns, whether made of horn or not. Fill thine horn with oil, says the Lord to Samuel, and anoint David. (1 Sam. xvi. 1.) Zadok took an horn of oil out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon. (1 Kings i. 39.) Job called one of his daughters, Kerenhappuch, Horn of Antimony, or horn to put antimony (stibium) in, which the women of the East still use at this day. (Job xlii. 14.)

The principal defence and strength of horned beasts consist in their horns; and hence the Scripture mentions the horn as a symbol of strength. The Lord exalteth the horn of David; the horn of his people; he breaketh the horn of the ungodly; he cutteth off the horn of Moab, he cutteth off the horn of Israel; he promiseth to make the horn of Israel to bud forth; to re-establish the honour of it, and restore its former vigour. Moses compares Joseph to a young bull, and says, that he has horns like those of a unicorn. The sacred authors frequently express victory in words like the following: Thou shalt toss them into the air with horns, &c.

Kingdoms with great powers are often described by the symbol of horns. (Ecclus. xlvii. 7.) In Dan. vii. viii. horns represent the power of the Persians, of the Greeks, of Syria, of Egypt, or of pagan and papal Rome. The prophet represents three animals as having many horns, one of which grew from the other. This should not surprise us, since in the East are rams which have many horns.

HORNET, a kind of large wasp, which has a powerful sting. We learn, (Deut. vii. 20. Josh. xxiv. 12.) that the Lord drove out the Canaanites before Israel by means of this insect. It has been suggested, that possibly this hornet was the zimb of Ethiopia, before which neither man nor beast can subsist. If the zimb was one of the plagues of Egypt, as has been supposed, it might be also in the hand of Providence a very effectual plague on the Canaanites; and it is worthy of observation, that the Israelites in the sandy wilderness would escape the violence of this creature. Supplementary Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

HORSE, a beast well known, but not so common among the Hebrews till Solomon's time, as afterwards. Before that time we find no horsemen mentioned in the armies of Israel. God forbade their kings to keep many horses. (Deut. xvii. 16.) The judges and princes of Israel generally rode on mules. After David's time, horses were more used in Judah, &c. than before. Solomon is the first king of Judah who had many horses; but we do not read that he undertook any military expeditions. He received his horses from Egypt, and every set cost him more than six hundred shekels, about ninety pounds.

We read, (2 Kings xxiii. 11.) that Josiah took away the horses which the kings of Judah, his predecessors, had consecrated to the sun. The sun was worshipped over all the East, and the horse was consecrated to this deity, who was represented as riding in a chariot drawn by the most beautiful and swiftest horses in the world, and performing every day his journey from East to West, to enlighten mankind. It has been disputed whether the people of Judah sacrificed these horses to the sun, as the Persians, Armenians, and others did, or only led them out in state every morning, to meet and salute the sun at its rising. Bochart supposes, that these horses were designed to draw the chariots, containing the king and his great officers, who were idolaters, out at the east gate of the city, every morning, to salute and adore the sun on his appearing above the horizon. Bochart's Hieroz. part i. lib. xi. c. 10.

HOSAN'NA, or rather HOSA-NA, is an Hebrew word which signifies, save, I beseech you. It is a form of blessing, or wishing well. At our Saviour's entrance into Jerusalem, when the people cried, Hosanna, their meaning was, Lord, preserve this son of David; heap favours and blessings on him.

Mr. David Levi gives the following information, extracted from the Talmud: 'The willow (used in the Feast of Tabernacles) is of the foundation of the prophets: that is, the prophets instructed the people in the proper form and manner thereof, as it was delivered by tradition; and which, having been forgot, was restored by the prophets. Hence we meet in Rabbinical Hebrew, with the phrase, 'the precept of the willow, on HOSANNA THE GREAT.' This is the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles, when each person carries a branch of willow, and, in the prayer of the day, frequently makes use of the word HOSHANA! that is, save, we beseech thee, from whence the willows used at that time are called the Hoshanuth'—hosannas.

If this be correct, we see that the people applied to our Lord a custom with which they were well acquainted, and which, indeed, formed an annual ceremony. We may observe, that the evangelists, (Matt. xxi. 8. Mark xi. 8.) do not say what kind of trees were cut down by the people, but 'they cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way.' We may supply willow trees, if then in season; or, perhaps, they were branches from such trees as were nearest at hand. Perhaps, they were palm leaves, or branches.

The people, therefore, as they were wont to do on Hosanna the Great, formed a procession; and those who composed the leading division of it, cried, Hosanna! blessed is the king of Israel, who cometh in the name of the Lord. Peace in heaven! Glory in the highest! To this, those who brought up the rear of the procession, answered, Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest! That is, the great Hosanna, as we have been used to shout at our Feast of Tabernacles.

Under this elucidation, this history has a clearer reference of the Feast of Tabernacles to the Messiah; and a reference that was, in some degree, wanted. The shouts of the multitude are strong indications of what they so earnestly looked for—a king to deliver them from their present bondage. Did the prophets hint at such a king, to be expected, when they appointed the willows of the great Hosanna? Is this the covert meaning of the rulers of the synagogue, 'hearest thou what these children say? in allusion to a king whom we expect; which they refer to thee.' Is this the import of our Lord's answer, 'Yea; did you never hear the remark, that children will tell the truth when men will not; that when men are afraid, or incredulous, the mouths of babes and sucklings may strongly proclaim due and proper praise?' Was our Lord's act in driving the intruding dealers out of the temple an act of royalty, coincident with these acclamations, and with these ideas, which, on this occasion, he thought proper to exert, and to which those concerned thought proper at this time to submit? Supplementary Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

HOSE'A, חֹשֶׁעַ, Ὁσείᾱ, signifies Saviour, or safety. HOSEA, son of Beeri, the first of the Minor Prophets. He is generally considered as a native and inhabitant of the kingdom of Israel, and is supposed to have begun to prophesy about 800 years before Christ. He exercised his office sixty years; but it is not known at what periods his different prophecies, now remaining, were delivered. Most of them are directed against the people of Israel, whom he reproves and threatens for their idolatry and wickedness, and exhorts to repentance, with the greatest earnestness, as the only means of averting the evils impending over their country. The principal predictions contained in this book, are the captivity and dispersion of the kingdom of Israel; the deliverance of Judah from Sennacherib; the present state of the Jews; their future restoration, and union with the Gentiles in the kingdom of the Messiah; the call of our Saviour out of Egypt, and his resurrection on the third day.

The style of Hosea is peculiarly obscure: it is sententious, concise, and abrupt; the transitions of person are sudden; and the connexive and adversative particles are frequently omitted. The prophecies are in one continued series, without any distinction as to the times when they were delivered, or the different subjects to which they relate. They are not so clear and detailed, as the predictions of those prophets who lived in succeeding ages. When, however, we have surmounted those difficulties, we shall see abundant reason to admire the force and energy with which this prophet writes, and the boldness of the figures and similitudes which he uses. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 119, 120.

HOSEA, or HOSHEA, son of Elah, was the last king of Israel. Having conspired against Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, he killed him, in the year of the world 3265, and before Jesus Christ 739. However, the elders of the land seem to have taken the government into their hands; for Hoshea was not in possession of the kingdom till nine years after. (2 Kings xv. 30.; xvii. 1.) Hoshea did evil in the sight of the Lord, but not equal to the kings of Israel who preceded him; that is, say the Jewish doctors, he did not restrain his subjects from going to Jerusalem to worship, if they would; whereas the kings of Israel, his predecessors, had forbidden it, and had placed guards on the road to prevent it.

Salmaneser, king of Assyria, being informed that Hoshea meditated a revolt, and had concerted measures with So, king of Egypt, to shake off the Assyrian yoke, marched against him, and besieged Samaria. After a siege of three years, in the ninth year of Hoshea's reign, the city was taken, and was reduced to a heap of ruins, in the year of the world 3282. The king of Assyria removed the Israelites of the ten tribes to countries beyond the Euphrates. Prideaux's Connection, part i. book i.

HOURS. The ancient Hebrews did not divide the day by hours, but into four parts; morning, noon, the first evening, and the last evening. The night was divided into three parts; night, midnight, and the morning watch. Hours, in the Septuagint, signify the seasons, as in Homer and Hesiod.

The word hour is used with very great latitude in Scripture. It seems sometimes to imply the space of time occupied by a whole watch: (Matth. xxvi. 40. Mark xiv. 37.) 'What, could ye not watch one hour?' one space of time allotted to that duty. 'If thou shalt not watch, thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.' (Rev. iii. 3.) 'Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh.' (Matth. xxv. 13.) These instances seem to prove, that there was a connexion between the word hour, and the period of a watch. The same may be observed in some of the following passages: Peter having denied his knowledge of Jesus to the guard, a new set of guards came to relieve the former; and among them was one who challenged Peter, about the space of one hour—one watch—after his former denial. (Luke xxii. 59.) Felix ordered Paul to be sent away at the third hour—perhaps a military watch of the night. (Acts xxiii. 23.)

The hours of prayer are alluded to in 2 Esdras ix. 44.: 'Day and night and every hour I prayed.' Hour is used in a very extensive sense. 'But of that day, and that hour, knoweth no man.' (Matth. xxiv. 36.) 'I will keep thee from the hour of trial, which is to try all the world.' (Rev. iii. 10.; xvii. 12.)

It appears that in India are dials on which every hour is divided into three parts, which, varying with the season, contain from twenty to twenty-four of our minutes each. These divisions are called ghuri. The word hour may be sometimes used to express a much smaller portion of time. 'Daniel was astonished one hour,' one schaate,—turn, pause, or interval. Was this one ghuree, or division of time, that is, about one-third of an hour? In Chaldee this word signifies to declare, to tell, one notice, or declaration; and, perhaps, such is its import throughout this prophet. It is, indeed, observable, that the ghurees denote also the number of bells which are to be struck, or the number of strokes which are to be made, on a bell, during the course of a watch. We learn, that Tobit continued prostrate about two hours; but the Chaldee reads three hours, perhaps three ghurees, or rather more than one of our hours. This shorter period is implied in Gal. ii. 5.

In the New Testament, the day is frequently divided into twelve equal hours, after the manner of the Greeks and Romans. (Matth. xx. 3, 4, 5.) These hours were equal to each other, but unequal with respect to the different seasons of the year. The twelve hours of the longest day in summer were much longer than those of the shortest day in winter. The first hour was that which followed sun-rising, or our six o'clock in the morning, at the equinox; the third hour corresponded with our nine o'clock of the morning, at the equinox; the sixth, at all times to noon, &c. In the New Testament we observe also, that the night is divided into four watches, which custom the Jews received from the Romans. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cii. cclxiii.

HUMILITY. Humility is the virtue of Christ and of Christians. It consists in low thought of ourselves, founded on the knowledge of our unworthiness, and our dependence on God for aid. 'Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart,' says our Saviour. (Matt. xi. 29.) 'God giveth grace to the humble,' says St. Peter. (1 Epist. v. 5.)

Though humility is not too much in favour among men, yet many excellent things are said of it in Scripture: 'Before honour is humility.' (Prov. xv. 33.) 'By humility, and the fear of the Lord, are riches, and honour, and life.' (Prov. xxii. 4.) Humility is a virtue seated in the mind; and it is, in fact, a settled and permanent disposition of the mind. Perhaps it may often be best distinguished by contrast with its opposite, pride and haughtiness. But though humility is an internal quality, yet it shows itself in external actions, and is very expressively alluded to by the apostle Peter: (1 Epist. v. 5.) 'Be clothed with humility,' as with an outer ornamental garment, tied closely upon the wearer. This implies, that the humility of Christians should constantly be manifested in their deportment and behaviour; should constantly envelope every other grace, or excellence, or amiable quality, which they may possess or practise, as an outer robe envelopes inner garments:—an outer robe bound around them, and attached to them by the firmest connexions,—by connexions proof against temptation, calamities, or prosperities.

It may be doubted, whether the 'low estate' of the Virgin, (Luke i. 48.) refers to her disposition of mind, or to her situation in life. The word ταπεινωσις occurs also in Acts viii. 33. 'In his humiliation his judgment was taken away:' in Philip. iii. 21, 'who shall change the body of our abasement—(vile body)—to the likeness of his glorious body:' and in Jam. i. 9, 10. 'Let the humbled, abased brother, glory in his exaltation; but the rich brother in that he is abased,—humbled, made low.' In this last passage, it would seem clearly to refer to a disposition of mind; for no man is called to rejoice in loss of wealth, or of property: but he may well and wisely rejoice in receiving an humble disposition of mind, as a divine grace—or which is imparted by divine grace—and which will lead him to think less vainly, less superciliously of his riches, and to value them less than before. Besides, if the poor brother is to rejoice in attaining that state which this person is to rejoice at quitting, there appears to be a contradiction in the spirit of the precepts: but as one brother may possess a mind exalted by divine grace, yet continue poor in the world, so another brother may possess a mind humbled by divine grace, notwithstanding the temptation to which his worldly riches subject him. This, indeed, is impracticable to man, but practicable to God. If this sense of the word be admitted, it does not follow from the use of it in the Virgin's song, that her station in life is described by it, determinately and exclusively, whatever Erasmus might urge to the contrary.

That there may be a vicious or spurious kind of humility, or that humility may exceed in degree, or in object, would appear from the apostle's caution, (Col. ii. 18.) against an over-weening, wilful humility, which might refer to the agents of God what should be referred only to God himself. This kind of supposed humility originates in real pride, 'being vainly puffed up of a fleshly mind.' Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

HUR, חור, 'זק, signifies liberty; otherwise, whiteness, hole, cavern. Hur, son of Caleb, son of Esron, different from Caleb, the son of Jephunneh. According to Josephus, Hur was husband to Miriam, the sister of Moses; but others say, that he was his son. When Moses had sent Joshua against the Amalekites, he went up the mountain with Hur and Aaron; (Exod. xvii. 10.) and whilst he lifted up his hands in prayer, Aaron and Hur supported his arms, to prevent their growing weary.

When Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive the law, he referred the elders, if any difficulty should arise, to Aaron and Hur. (Exod. xxiv. 14.)

HU'SHAI, חושי, Χουσι, signifies their haste, or their sensuality; otherwise their silence. Hushai, the Archite, David's friend, being informed of Absalom's rebellion, and that David was obliged to flee from Jerusalem, met his king and his friend upon an eminence without the city, with his clothes rent, and his head covered with earth. David told him, that if he went with him, he would be a burden to him; but that he might render him important service, if he remained, and pretended to be in Absalom's interest, in order to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel.

Hushai, therefore, returned to Jerusalem, and saluted Absalom as king. Absalom said, Do you use your friend in this manner? Why are you not with David? Hushai answered, I will be with him whom the Lord has chosen; whom this people, even all Israel, have acknowledged. After this Hushai, by opposing the counsel of Ahithophel, and gaining time for David, to whom he sent advice, was the cause of Ahithophel's suicide, and of Absalom's miscarriage.

HUSKS. Shells or husks of pease or beans. The prodigal son, oppressed with want, and pinched by hunger, desired to feed on the husks provided for the hogs. (Luke xv. 16.) The most learned interpreters are of opinion that the Greek, κεράτια signifies Carob-beans, the fruit of a tree growing in Egypt, of the same name. This fruit is common in Palestine, Greece, Italy, Provence, and Barbary. It is suffered to ripen and grow dry on the tree; the poor eat it, and cattle are fattened with it.

HUSSITES. A party of reformers, the followers of John Huss, who derived his name from Hussinetz in Bohemia, the place of his nativity. In the university of Prague, where he studied, Huss was early distinguished; and after taking his degree, he continued to reside at Prague, and enjoyed a very high reputation, both on account of the sanctity of his manners and the purity of his doctrine. He was distinguished by his uncommon erudition and eloquence, and was chosen to fill the important functions of professor of divinity in the university, as well as those of pastor in the church of that city. This eminent ecclesiastic declaimed with vehemence against the vices which had corrupted all the different ranks and orders of the clergy; he even went farther; and, from the year 1408, he used his most assiduous endeavours to withdraw the university of Prague from the jurisdiction of Gregory XII., whom the kingdom of Bohemia had hitherto acknowledged as lawful head of the church.

The archbishop of Prague, and the clergy in general, who were warmly attached to the interests of Gregory, became naturally exasperated at these proceedings. A violent dispute arose between the incensed prelate and the zealous reformer, which the latter greatly inflamed and augmented by his pathetic exclamations against the court of Rome, and the corruptions prevalent among the sacerdotal orders; he even proceeded to recommend openly the writings and opinions of Wickliff. Hence an accusation was brought against him, in the year 1410, before the tribunal of John XXIII., by whom he was solemnly expelled from the communion of the church. He treated, it is true, this excommunication with contempt; and the fortitude and zeal which he discovered on this occasion were almost universally applauded.

This eminent man, whose piety was truly fervent and sincere, though his zeal was, perhaps, rather too violent, and his prudence not always equally circumspect, was summoned to appear before the council of Constance. He was obedient to this order, and thought himself secured from the rage of his enemies, by the safe-conduct which had been granted him by the emperor Sigismund, for his journey to Constance, his residence in that place, and his return to his own country. Huss was accompanied on this occasion by his faithful and intimate friend Jerome of Prague, who voluntarily came to the council with the generous design of supporting and seconding his fellow-labourer. Jerome had early imbibed in England the doctrines of Wickliff, and had brought home to his native country the books of that reformer. When Huss appeared before the council, he declaimed, with extraordinary vehemence, against the abuses of the church; but this freedom was not considered as unlawful in the council of Constance, where the tyranny of the court of Rome, and the corruption of the sacerdotal and monastic orders, were censured with unreserved severity. Personal enmity, however, was supposed to co-operate with ecclesiastical tyranny, in the persecution of the Bohemian reformer. His active and malignant adversaries coloured the accusation brought against him with such artifice and success, that he was cast into prison, declared a heretic, because he refused to obey the order of the council, commanding him to plead guilty against the dictates of his conscience, and was burnt alive, the 6th of July, 1415. The courage which he had manifested in the pulpit, did not forsake him at the stake. He endured with unparalleled magnanimity and resignation the dreadful punishment, expressing in his last moments the noblest sentiments of love to God, and the most triumphant hope of the accomplishment of those promises with which the Gospel arms the true Christian at the approach of eternity.

The same unhappy fate was endured by Jerome. Terrified, however, by the near prospect of a cruel death, Jerome at first appeared willing to submit to the orders of the council, and to abandon the tenets and opinions which he had affirmed in his writings. But this submission was not attended with the advantages he expected from it, nor did it deliver him from the close and severe confinement in which he was retained. He, therefore, resumed his fortitude, professed anew, with an heroic constancy, the opinions which the sudden impression of fear had caused him to desert, and maintained them in the flames, in which he expired on the 30th of May, 1416. Before sentence was pronounced against John Huss, and Jerome of Prague, the famous Wickliff, whose opinions they were supposed to adopt, and who had been long since dead, was called from his rest by this tribunal, and his memory was solemnly branded with infamy by a decree of the council. On the 4th of May, 1415, a long list of propositions selected from his writings, was examined and condemned; and an order was issued to commit all his works, together with his bones, to the flames. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 234, &c.; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist., vol. iii. pp. 227, &c.

HUTCHINSONIANS, a denomination of Christians, the followers of John Hutchinson, Esq., a learned and respectable layman, who was born at Spennythorn, in Yorkshire, in 1674. Mr. H. received a private education, which, however, was liberal and excellent; and at the age of 19, he became steward to a gentleman, in which capacity he afterwards served the duke of Somerset. Having a great taste for natural history and mineralogy, he improved the opportunities which his station in life afforded him, and made a large collection of fossils, which he put into the hands of Dr. Woodward, the physician, with observations, for him to digest and publish. This large and noble collection was afterwards bequeathed by Dr. Woodward to the University of Cambridge. The doctor is said to have deceived Mr. H. with fair promises, and never to have begun the work. In 1724, Mr. H. published the first part of that curious work, his 'Moses's Principia,' in which he ridiculed Dr. Woodward's Natural History of the Earth, and exploded the doctrine of gravitation established in Sir Isaac Newton's Principia. In the second part of this work, published in 1727, he maintained, in opposition to the Newtonian system, that a plenum is the principle of the Scripture philosophy. In this work he also intimated, that the idea of the Trinity is to be taken from the grand agents in the natural system, fire, light, and spirit. From this time he continued to publish a volume every year or two, till his death; and a correct and elegant edition of his works, including the MSS. which he left, was published in 1748, in 12 vols. 8vo., intitled, 'The Philosophical and Theological Works of the late truly learned John Hutchinson, Esq.' On the Monday before his death, Dr. Mead urged Mr. H. to be bled, saying pleasantly, 'I will soon send you to Moses,' meaning his studies. This Mr. H. understood in the literal sense, and answered in a muttering tone, 'I believe, doctor, you will;' and he was so much displeased, that he dismissed him for another physician, but died a few days after, August 28, 1737.

Mr. H. thought that the Hebrew Scriptures comprise a perfect system of natural philosophy, theology, and religion. He entertained so high an opinion of the Hebrew language, that he thought the Almighty must have employed it to communicate every species of knowledge, human and divine; and that, accordingly, every species of knowledge is to be found in the Old Testament. Both he and his followers laid a great stress on the evidence of Hebrew etymology. After Origen, and other eminent commentators, he asserted, that the Scriptures are not to be understood and interpreted in a literal, but in a typical sense, and according to the radical import of the Hebrew expressions:—that even the historical parts, and particularly those relating to the Jewish ceremonies, and levitical law, are to be considered in this light: and he also asserted, that, agreeably to this mode of interpretation, the Hebrew Scriptures would be found amply to testify concerning the nature and offices of Jesus Christ. His plan was to find Natural Philosophy in the Bible, where hitherto it had been thought no such thing was to be met with, or ever intended. His editors tell us, he found, upon examination, 'That the Hebrew Scriptures nowhere ascribe motion to the body of the sun, nor fixedness to the earth; that they describe the created system to be a plenum without any vacuum at all, and reject the assistance of gravitation, attraction, or any such occult qualities, for performing the stated operations of nature, which are carried on by the mechanism of the heavens, in their three-fold condition of fire, light, and spirit, or air, the material agents set to work at the beginning:—that the heavens, thus framed by Almighty wisdom, are an instituted emblem and visible substitute of Jehovah Aleim, the eternal three, the co-equal, and co-adorable Trinity in Unity:—that the unity of substance in the heavens points out the unity of essence, and the distinction of conditions, the personality in Deity, without confounding the persons, or dividing the substance. And that from their being made emblems, they are called in Hebrew Shemim, the names, representatives, or substitutes; expressing by their names, that they are emblems, and by their conditions or offices, what it is they are emblems of' Mr. H. also found, that the Hebrew Scriptures have some capital words, which he has proved, or endeavoured to prove, contain in their radical meaning the greatest and most comfortable truth. Thus, the word Eloim, which we call God, he reads Aleim, and refers it to the oath or conditional execration, by which the eternal covenant of grace among the persons in Jehovah, was and is confirmed. The word Berith, which our translation renders Covenant, and upon which is built the favourite doctrine of mutual covenants between God and man, between Creator and creature, yea, as matters now stand, between king and rebel, he construes to signify, 'he or that which purifies,' and so the Purifier or purification for, not with, man. The Cherubim, which have been made 'Angels placed as a guard to frighten Adam from breaking into Eden again,' he explains to have been an hieroglyphic of divine construction, or a sacred image, to describe, as far as figures could go, the Aleim and man taken in, or Humanity united to Deity. In like manner, he treats several other words of similar, though not quite so solemn, import. Hence he drew this conclusion, 'that all the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish dispensation were so many delineations of Christ, in what he was to be, to do, and to suffer, and that the early Jews knew them to be types of his actions and sufferings, and by performing them as such, were in so far Christians, both in faith and practice.' His followers maintain, that the Cherubim, and the glory around them, with the divine presence in them, were not only emblematical figures, representing the persons of the ever-blessed Trinity, as engaged in covenant for the redemption of man, but also that they were intended 'to keep or preserve the way of the tree of life,—to show the man the way to life eternal, and keep him from losing or departing from it.' That Melchizedec was an eminent type of Christ, there can be little doubt; but that he was actually the second person of the Trinity, in a human form, is a tenet of the Hutchinsonians, though not entirely peculiar to them. Mr. H. supposes "the air exists in three conditions, fire, light, and spirit; the two latter are the finer and grosser parts of the air in motion: from the earth to the sun, the air is finer and finer till it becomes pure light near the confines of the sun, and fire in the orb of the sun or solar focus. From the earth towards the circumference of this system, in which he includes the fixed stars, the air becomes grosser and grosser, till it becomes stagnant, in which condition it is at the utmost verge of this system; from whence (in his opinion) the expression of 'outer darkness, and blackness of darkness,' used in the New Testament, seems to be taken." These are some of the principal outlines of this author's doctrines, which have been patronized by several eminent divines, both of the church and among the dissenters.

The followers of Mr. Hutchinson have not erected themselves into a sect or separate community, though they have suffered much obloquy from their brethren, and have been accounted by the world little better than madmen. They are of all men the most averse from schism,—are, perhaps, amongst the best and truest churchmen of these modern times, and not far behind the most learned in the church. Among them may still be reckoned some eminent and respectable divines, both in England and Scotland; but their numbers seem at present to be rather on the decrease. Of those who, in their day, were ranked in the list of Hutchinsonians, perhaps the most eminent were the following: Mr. Julius Bate, and Mr. Parkhurst, the lexicographers; Mr. Holloway, author of 'Originals,' and 'Letter and Spirit;' Dr. Hodges, provost of Oriel College, Oxford; Mr. Henry Lee, author of Sophron, or 'Nature's Characteristics of the Truth;' Dr. Wetherell, late master of University College, Oxford; Mr. Romaine; bishop Horne; and Mr. William Jones, the bishop's learned friend and biographer.

It was in the etymological quarter, that the Hutchinsonians seemed most vulnerable, or that they might, at least, be annoyed with most appearance of advantage. Even some of Mr. Hutchinson's friends acknowledge, that he laid too great a stress, in many instances, on the evidence of Hebrew etymology, and admit, that some of his followers adopted a mode of speaking, which had a nearer resemblance to cant and jargon, than to sound and sober learning. Adams's Religious World, vol. iii. pp. 350—360; Skinner's Eccles. Hist. of Scotland, vol. ii. p. 673, &c.: Evans's Sketch, p. 206.

HYMENÆUS, Ὑμέναιος, signifies, nuptial, or marriage, or the god of marriage. Hymenæus is supposed to have been a citizen of Ephesus, converted by St. Paul. He afterwards fell into the heresy of those who denied the resurrection of the body, or, rather, who maintained that the term was to be understood figuratively in reference to conversion, as being a resurrection from their former death in trespasses and sins, and that no other resurrection was to be expected. (2 Tim. ii. 17.) Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, viii. p. 313; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 589.

HYPOCRITE, from the Greek, signifies one who feigns to be what he is not; who puts on a false person, like actors in tragedies and comedies. It is generally applied to those who assume appearances of a virtue, without possessing it in reality. Our Saviour accused the Pharisees of hypocrisy. In the Old Testament, the Hebrew word caneph, which is rendered hypocrite, counterfeit, signifies, also, a profane wicked man, a man polluted, corrupted, a man of impiety, a deceiver.

Hypocrisy is vain and foolish, and, though intended to cheat others, is, in truth, deceiving ourselves. No man would flatter or dissemble, if he thought that he was seen and discovered. All his hypocrisy, however, is open to the eye of God, from whom nothing can be hid. The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he seeth all his doings; there is no darkness nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. Whoever dissembles and seems to be what he is not, thinks that he ought to possess such a quality as he pretends to; for to counterfeit and dissemble, is to assume the appearance of some real excellence. But it is best for a man to be in reality what he would seem to be. It is difficult to personate and act a false part long; because where truth does not exist, nature will endeavour to return, and make a discovery. Truth carries its own light and evidence with it, and not only commands us to every man's conscience, but to God, the searcher of our hearts. Hence sincerity is the truest wisdom; for integrity has many advantages over all the artful ways of dissimulation and deceit. It is a more plain and easy, a more safe and secure way of dealing. It has less of trouble and difficulty, of danger and hazard; it is the shortest and nearest way to our end, and will carry us thither in a straight line. By integrity a man confirms his re-

On the contrary, a dissembler must be always upon his guard, lest he contradict his own pretences. He acts an unnatural part, and puts a continual force and restraint upon himself. Truth always lies uppermost, and will be apt to make its appearance; but he who acts sincerely has an easy task, and needs not invent pretences before, or excuses after, for what he says or does. Insincerity is difficult to manage; for a liar will be apt to contradict at one time what he said at another. Truth is always consistent with itself, needs nothing to assist it, and is always near at hand; but a lie is troublesome, it sets a man's invention upon the rack, and is frequently the occasion of many more. Truth and sincerity in our words and actions will carry us through the world, when all the arts of cunning and deceit shall fail and deceive us.

In the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, plainness and sincerity will appear the most perfect beauty; the craftiness of men, who lie in wait to deceive, will be stripped of all its colours; all specious pretences, all the methods of deceit, will then be disclosed before men and angels; and no artifice to conceal the deformity of iniquity can there take place. Then the ill-designing men of this world shall with shame be convinced, that the upright simplicity, which they despised, was the truest wisdom; and that those dissembling and dishonest arts, which they so highly esteemed, were in reality the greatest folly. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. p. 323, &c.

JAB

JAB'AL, יַבֵּל, I'abhal, signifies which glides away; or, that brings; or, that produces; or, the trumpet of the jubilee. Jabal, son of Lamech and Adah, was father of those who lodge under tents, and of shepherds, (Gen. iv. 20.); that is, he was institutor of those, who, like the Arab Bedouins, live under tents, and are shepherds. See FATHER.

JAB'BOK, יַבֹּק, signifies evacuation, or dissipation; otherwise, lamentation. Jab-bok is a brook on the other side of the Jordan, whose spring is in the mountains of

JAB

Gilead. It runs into the river Jordan, south of the sea of Galilee. Near this brook the patriarch Jacob met the angel, who wrestled with him. (Gen. xxxii. 1—23.) It separated the land of the Ammonites from the Gaulanitis, and that of Og, king of Bashan. It is a rapid stream, flowing over a rocky bed: its waters are clear, and agreeable to the taste; and its banks are very thickly wooded with oleander and plane trees, wild olives, wild almonds, and numerous other trees. By the Arabs it is now termed Narh-el-Zerkah, or the river of Zerkah, from a neighbour station or village of that name. Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, p. 325; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 182; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 38.

JA'BESH, יַבֶּשֶׁת, signifies dryness, or confusion of the heap of the testimony. JABESH, or JABESH-GILEAD, was the name of a city in the half-tribe of Manasseh towards Jordan. It was generally called Jabesh-Gilead, because it was situated in Gilead, at the foot of the mountains so named. Eusebius places it six miles from Pella towards Gerasa; and, consequently, it must have been east of the sea of Tiberias. Jabesh-Gilead was sacked by the Israelites, because it refused to join in the war against Benjamin. (Judg. xxi. 8.) Nabal, king of the Ammonites, laid siege to Jabesh, and proposed hard conditions to the inhabitants, from which Saul relieved them. They ever after showed great gratitude to Saul and his family. They carried off the bodies of Saul and his son Jonathan, which the Philistines had hung upon the walls of Bethshan, and buried them honourably in a wood near their city. (1 Sam. xxxi. 11, 12, &c.)

JA'BIN, יַבִּין, signifies he that understands, he that builds. Jabin was a king of Hazor, in the northern part of Canaan. (Josh. xi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Amazed at the conquests of Joshua, who had already subdued the south of Canaan, Jabin engaged the other kings in the northern part along the Jordan and on the Mediterranean, and in the mountains, in a league offensive and defensive. These kings and their troops rendezvoused at the waters of Merom. Joshua marched against them, attacked them suddenly, defeated them, and pursued them to Great Zidon and the valley of Mispheh. He lamed their horses, and burnt their chariots. He took Hazor, and killed king Jabin.

JABIN was the name of another king of Hazor, who oppressed the Israelites twenty years, from the year of the world 2699 to 2719. (Judg. iv. 1, &c.) Sisera, his general, was defeated by Barak at the foot of Mount Tabor.

JA'COB, יַעֲקֹב, signifies he that supplants, or undermines; otherwise, the heel. Jacob, son of Isaac and Rebekah, was born in the year of the world 2168, and before Jesus Christ 1836. At his birth, he held his brother Esau's heel; for this reason he was called Jacob, as if the heeler, one who supplants, or strikes up, his adversary. (Gen. xxv. 26.) This was a kind of prognostic of his future conduct in life. While Rebekah was with child, Isaac consulted the Lord concerning the struggling of these twins in their mother's womb; and God declared that Rebekah should have two sons, who should become two great people, but that the elder should be subject to the younger. Jacob was meek and peaceable, and lived at home; but Esau was more turbulent, fierce, and passionately fond of hunting. Isaac was fond of Esau, and Rebekah of Jacob. One day, Jacob having prepared a mess of pottage, Esau returned weary from hunting, and desired his brother to give him some. Jacob, however, refused, unless Esau would resign his right of seniority to him, which he did.

Long after this, when the two brothers were seventy-seven years of age, and Isaac their father one hundred and thirty-seven, Isaac fell into a languishing indisposition. Believing his death to be near, he called Esau, whom he considered as his eldest son, bade him hunt for some venison, and dress it as he knew he liked, and then he would give him his last blessing. At this time, Isaac's sight was dim with age, and his wife Rebekah, who had heard his commands to Esau, substituted Jacob, who by such guile procured the prophetic blessing intended for his brother. Isaac had scarcely finished bestowing his blessing, when Esau came, and brought his venison to him. Isaac, surprised and vexed, could now give only an inferior blessing to him, and foretell inferior advantages to his posterity.

From this time Esau bore a secret hatred to Jacob, and said in his heart, The time of mourning for my father is near, and then I will get rid of my brother Jacob. Rebekah being informed of Esau's design, sent Jacob to his uncle Laban, at Haran, till Esau's passion should be cooled. Isaac, therefore, gave Jacob his blessing, and directed him to go into Mesopotamia, and marry one of his uncle Laban's daughters. Jacob departed privately, and coming after sun-set to a certain place, he took one of the stones which he found there, and which he used for a pillow, and fell asleep. In a dream, he saw a ladder resting on the earth, but reaching to heaven; he saw likewise angels of God ascending and descending by it. The Lord, standing above it, said to him, 'I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' Jacob awaking, said, 'Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not.' Rising early, he took the stone upon which he had rested his head, set it up as a monument, poured oil upon it, and called the place Bethel, the House of God, begging God's protection in his journey.

Proceeding into Mesopotamia, near the city of Haran, where his uncle Laban lived, he met with Laban's daughter, Rachel, coming to the well to water her flock. Jacob removed the stone which covered the well, assisted her in watering her sheep, and informed her that he was her cousin, the son of Rebekah, Laban's sister.

Laban had two daughters, the elder named Leah, and the younger Rachel. Jacob agreed with Laban to serve him seven years, as 'a dowry or purchase for Rachel as his wife; but in the evening, Laban cunningly gave Leah to Jacob instead of Rachel. The next morning, Jacob complained violently to Laban of this deception; but he agreed to serve Laban another seven years for Rachel, whom he preferred to Leah. Whether Jacob married at the beginning or end of his first seven years of stipulated service for Rachel, is a question which has divided and embarrassed chronologists. Demetrius and Josephus, followed by Petavius, Jackson, Kennicott, &c. suppose the latter. On the other hand, Usher, Lloyd, Clayton, Hales, &c. contend that his marriage with Leah took place about a month after his arrival at Charran, at the beginning of the seven years; and his marriage with Rachel the week following. In favour of this latter opinion, Dr. Hales has offered some sensible and very plausible arguments.

1. Jacob's demand, 'Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled,' (Gen. xxix. 21.) seems rather to relate to the expiration of the days of courtship, which, by a decorous usage, were a month, during which a bride, though betrothed, might put off the consummation of her marriage. This privilege was afterwards extended by the Mosaic law even to a female captive, who was granted this respite before her marriage 'to bewail her father and mother.' (Deut. xxi. 13.) The words, 'Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her,' are plainly parenthetical, and state by anticipation the performance of the agreement.—2. It is admitted, that the second seven years were subsequent to his marriage with Rachel; and why not the first seven years subsequent to his marriage with Leah, which was only a week earlier than Rachel's?—3. Is it to be imagined, that Jacob, at the advanced age of seventy-seven, when he went to Charran, would have patiently waited seven years before he married? And would not the policy of the selfish Laban have rather wished to secure his attachment and his services, by a speedy connexion with his family?—4. That he married at the beginning of the first seven years is demonstrated by the birth of his third son, Levi, in his eighty-second year, as rightly stated by Abulfaragi, or in the fifth year of his service.

Rachel was barren, but Leah had four sons by Jacob; Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah. Rachel, seeing that she had no children, gave her servant Bilhah to Jacob her husband. Bilhah had Dan and Naphtali, whom Rachel considered as her own. Leah gave also her servant Zilpah to her husband, who brought Gad and Asher. After this, Leah had Issachar and Zebulon, and Dinah, a daughter. At length, the Lord remembered Rachel, and gave her a son, whom she called Joseph.

As Jacob's family was pretty numerous, and his term of service to Laban had expired, he desired to return to his own country with his wives and children. But Laban, who had experienced the advantages of Jacob's services, requested him to continue. Jacob offered to serve Laban six years longer, provided he might receive the increase of his flocks, that should be of different colours, or speckled, perhaps pye-balled, and the brown sheep also. By this means, Jacob reserved to himself the least part of the fleece. Laban willingly accepted these conditions, and that very day separated the flocks, according to the plan proposed. The flocks of Laban and those of Jacob were placed at a distance of three days' journey from each other. Jacob took branches of green wood, with the bark in some parts peeled, and laid them in the watering places, where the flocks came to drink; and the sheep, having their eyes struck with these variegated branches, brought young ones of different colours. Some think, that this thought was suggested to him miraculously; others, that it was the offspring of his own reflection. Perhaps, many thoughts may be suggested to us which we do not distinguish from our own reflections. The application of these rods or branches is perfectly natural; and their influence on the sheep is analogous to some of the principles of our own breeders of animals. Several ancient commentators are of opinion, that Jacob laid these speckled rods before the flock in the spring of the year only, being desirous to have many young ones of the autumn falling. But as this is not certain, modern commentators think, that he placed the rods only before the young and strong sheep and goats; by which means the best lambs and kids fell to him, and the worst to Laban.

Jacob acquired so much property, that Laban and his sons became jealous of him; and the Lord in a dream advised Jacob to return into his own country, and assured him of his protection. Jacob, therefore, resolved to return to Canaan; and having informed his wives, he found them disposed to accompany him. He took his wives, his children, and his cattle, and had accomplished three days' journey before Laban had notice of his departure. Laban immediately pursued him, and overtook him on the seventh day of his pursuit upon the mountains of Gilead. He complained in rough terms to Jacob of his thus fleeing away, without taking leave of him; and he added, 'Why have you robbed me of my gods?' for Rachel had taken Laban's Teraphim, without Jacob's knowledge. See TERAPHIM.

Jacob replied, I was afraid lest you should forcibly detain your daughters. With respect to the robbery, upon whom you find your gods, he shall be put to death. Rachel, by concealing the images, disappointed all the search of her father. Then Jacob, in his turn, complained to Laban of the treatment he had received from him during his abode in Mesopotamia, and of the strict search he had now made. However, all ended in swearing an eternal alliance between them and their families; and they set up an heap of stones upon the mountains of Gilead, as a monument of their friendship. Jacob going on toward the land of Canaan, arrived at the brook Jabbok, east of Jordan.

During Jacob's absence, his brother Esau had settled in the mountains of Seir, south of where Jacob now was. Jacob fearing lest his brother might retain his former resentment, thought it convenient to win him by presents and submission. He therefore sent him notice of his arrival, and desired his favour. As soon as Esau was informed of his coming, he advanced with four hundred men to meet him. Jacob, fearing that he had some evil design, to appease him, sent forward to meet him, as presents, goats, sheep, camels, cows, she asses and their foals. After all his people had passed the brook Jabbok, Jacob remained alone on the other side, and behold an angel, in the form of a man, wrestled with him till the morning, when, seeing he could not prevail against Jacob, he touched the hollow of his thigh, which immediately withered, and Jacob became lame. The angel said, Let me go, for the day begins to dawn: but Jacob answered, I will not let thee go, unless thou givest me thy blessing. The angel asked him what was his name? He replied, Jacob. The angel said, Hereafter thou shalt no more be called Jacob, but Israel. When Jacob also inquired of him his name, he said, Why dost thou ask my name? And he blessed him there. Jacob, therefore, called this place Peniel, saying, I have seen God face to face, yet my life is preserved.

Jacob, perceiving Esau advancing towards him, went forward, and threw himself seven times on the earth before him. Leah and Rachel did the same with their children. The two brothers tenderly embraced each other; and Jacob begged of Esau to accept his presents, which Esau at length received, but with difficulty. Esau returned home; and Jacob came to Succoth, beyond Jordan, where he dwelt some time. Afterwards, he passed the river Jordan, and came to Shalem, a city of the Shechemites, where he set up his tents, having purchased part of a field for the sum of an hundred pieces of money, of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father.

While Jacob abode at Shalem, his daughter Dinah was ravished by Shechem. Her brothers, Levi and Simeon, sons of Jacob, took a very severe revenge, by killing the Shechemites, and pillaging their city. Jacob, dreading the resentment of the neighbouring people, retired to Bethel, where God appointed him to stay and erect an altar. In preparing for the sacrifice which he was to offer there, he commanded the people to purify themselves, to change their clothes, and to throw away all strange gods, which they might have brought out of Mesopotamia. Jacob took all their idols, and hid them under an oak near Shechem. He came happily to Bethel, sacrificed there, and the Lord, appearing to him, renewed his promises of protecting him, and of multiplying his family.

After he had performed his devotions at Bethel, he took the way to Hebron, to visit his father Isaac, who dwelt hard by in the valley of Mamre. In the journey, Rachel died in labour of Benjamin, and was buried near Bethlehem. Jacob erected a monument for her, (Gen. xxxv. 16—20.) and proceeding to Hebron, pitched his tents at the tower of Edar. He had the satisfaction to find his father Isaac living, and that good patriarch lived twenty-two years with Jacob. Jacob and Esau paid the last duties to him. (Gen. xxxv. 29.) About ten years before the death of Isaac, Joseph was sold by his brethren. Jacob, believing he had been devoured by wild beasts, was afflicted in proportion to his tenderness for him. He passed about twenty-two years mourning for him, till Joseph revealed himself to his brethren. (Gen. xliii. xlv. xlv.) Jacob being informed that his son Joseph, whom he had so long lamented, was living, awaked, as it were, out of a dream, and said, It is enough, Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die. He and his family left, therefore, the valley of Mamre, and came to Beersheba, where was an altar consecrated to the Lord. Here he offered sacrifices. God appeared to him in the night, and permitted him to go down into Egypt, where Joseph would close his eyes.

On his arrival in Egypt, he sent Judah to inform Joseph, and desire him to come to the land of Goshen, as had been agreed. Joseph hastened thither; and they embraced with tears. Joseph presented him to Pharaoh. Jacob having wished this prince all happiness, Pharaoh asked him his age. He answered, The time of my pilgrimage is an hundred and thirty years: few and evil have my years been in comparison of the age of my fathers.

Jacob lived seventeen years in Egypt, from the year of the world 2298 to 2315. About that time, falling sick, Joseph, with his two sons Ephraim and Manasseh, visited him. Jacob heaped blessings on him, adopted Ephraim and Manasseh to be his sons as much as Reuben and Simeon, and directed that they should divide with them the land of Canaan, which God had promised him at Bethel. Calling the two sons of Joseph to his bed-side, he embraced and blessed them. Joseph placed them on each side of him, Ephraim on the left, and Manasseh on the right hand of Jacob. But Jacob directed by the spirit of prophecy, laid his right hand on Ephraim's head, and his left on Manasseh's, and thus crossed his hands to bless them. Joseph, thinking that he was mistaken, would have changed the disposition of his hands; but Jacob answered, I know what I do, my son. Thus he gave Ephraim the preference to Manasseh. In fact, the tribe of Ephraim was always more powerful than Manasseh; and after Judah, it was the most considerable tribe in Israel. Afterwards, Jacob foretold to Joseph, that God would bring his posterity back into the land of Canaan, which was promised to their fathers; and he added, I leave thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorites with my sword and my bow.

Some time after this, Jacob called all his sons together to give them his last prophetic blessing. He requested his sons to bury him in the cave over against Mamre, where Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah, were buried. He then laid himself down, and died. Joseph embalmed him after the manner of the Egyptians; and there was a general lamentation for him in Egypt seventy days. After that time, Joseph and his brethren, with the principal men of Egypt, carried him to the burying-place of his fathers, near Hebron, where his wife Leah had been interred.

The author of Ecclesiasticus has given us in few words the encomium of Jacob. (Eccclus. xlv. 23.) In Scripture, Jacob is frequently put for his posterity, that is, for the Israelitish nation. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 151—153. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 29.

JACOB'S WELL, or Fountain, is situated at a small distance from Sichem or Shechem, also called Sychar, and at present Napolose. Sichem was the residence of Jacob before his sons slew the Shechemites. 'The principal object of veneration, among the present inhabitants,' says Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'is Jacob's Well, over which a church was formerly erected. This is situated at a small distance from the town, in the road to Jerusalem; and has been visited by pilgrims of all ages; but particularly since the Christian era, as the place where our Saviour revealed himself to the woman of Samaria. The spot is so distinctly marked by the evangelist, (John, chap. iv.) and so little liable to uncertainty, from the circumstance of the well itself, and the features of the country, that, if no tradition existed for its identity, the site of it could hardly be mistaken.' Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 278, 279.

JACOBITES, a denomination of Eastern Christians, who first made their appearance in the fifth century, and were called Monophysites. Jacob Albardai, or Baradaeus, who flourished about A. D. 530, restored the sect, then almost expiring, to its former vigour, and modelled it anew, and hence from him they obtained the name of Jacobites. This denomination is commonly used in an extensive sense, as comprehending all the Monophysites, except the Armenians; it, however, more strictly and properly belongs only to the Asiatic Monophysites, of whom Jacob Albardai was the restorer and chief, and to whom, therefore, this article shall be limited.

The Monophysites had at first gained over to their doctrine a considerable part of the eastern provinces of the empire, and were warmly supported by the emperor Anastasius. This emperor raised to the patriarchate of Antioch, Severus, a learned monk of Palestine, from whom they were for some time called Severians. On the death of the emperor, in 518, Severus was expelled from that see, and the sect was every where opposed and depressed by Justin and the following emperors, in such a manner that it seemed to be on the very brink of ruin, and almost all hopes of its recovery vanished. However, Jacob Syrus, or Zanzalus, for so he is also surnamed, an obscure monk, by his zeal and prudence revived the drooping spirits of the Monophysites, and produced an astonishing change in their affairs by the power of his eloquence, and by his incredible activity and diligence. He died bishop of Edessa, in 588, and left his sect in a most flourishing state in Syria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and other countries, where they have subsisted and flourished, more or less, to the present time. It is said, however, that they are not in all more than forty or forty-five thousand families.

The head of the Jacobites is the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch, who, since the fifteenth century, has always assumed the name of Ignatius, to show that he is the lineal successor of St. Ignatius, who was bishop of Antioch in the first century, and consequently, the lawful patriarch of Antioch. He resides generally in the monastery of St. Ananias, which is situated near the city of Merdin, in Mesopotamia, and sometimes at Merdin, his episcopal seat, and also at Amida, otherwise called Caramit, Aleppo, and other Syrian towns.

Before the death of Jacob, the government of this prelate was too extensive, and the churches over which he presided too numerous, to admit of his performing himself all the duties of his high office. Jacob, therefore, gave a part of the administration of the pontificate to a colleague, who is called the Maphrian, or Primate of the East, and whose doctrine and discipline are said to be adopted by the Jacobite Christians beyond the Tigris. This primate formerly resided at Tauris, or Tagritis, on the borders of Armenia; but his present habitation is the monastery of St. Matthew, which is in the neighbourhood of Mousul, a city of Mesopotamia.

In the seventeenth century, a small body of the Jacobites abandoned, for some time, the doctrines and institutions of their ancestors, and embraced the communion of the church of Rome. This was owing to the suggestions and intrigues of Andrew Achigian, who had been educated at Rome, where he imbibed the principles of popery; and, having obtained the title and dignity of patriarch from the Roman pontiff, he assumed the appellation of Ignatius XXIV. After the death of this pretended patriarch, another usurper, whose name was Peter, aspired to the same dignity, and taking the title of Ignatius XXV. placed himself in the patriarchal chair. However, the lawful patriarch of the sect had sufficient credit with the Turks to procure the deposition and banishment of this pretender; and thus the small congregation which acknowledged his jurisdiction was dispersed. Since that time, the Jacobites have constantly persevered in their refusal to enter into the communion of the church of Rome, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties and alluring offers of the pope's legates. We are also told that they propagate their doctrine in Asia with zeal and assiduity, and that, not long ago, they gained over to their communion a part of the Nestorians who inhabit the maritime parts of India. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 469; iii. p. 490; Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 387, &c.

JA'EL, יָאֵל, or JAHEL, signifies he that ascends; otherwise kid. Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite, killed Sisera, general of the Canaanitish army. Sisera having fled to her tent, and sleeping there, Jael seized her opportunity, and drove a large nail through his temples with a hammer, in the year of the world 2719, and before Jesus Christ 1285. (Judg. iv. 17. 21.)

For what cause this woman violated the sacred rights of hospitality, by murdering her sleeping guest, does not appear. The Scripture hints at the relation of this family to Moses by Hobab; and, without doubt, Hobab and this family had received many advantages by means of Israel, for so Moses promised, 'We will surely do thee good.' Yet we must consider the secluded and sacred nature of the women's tent, and that the victor would not have there intruded. We must also consider the implied pledge of security in the food she had given to Sisera, which, in the East, is a pledge of considerable solemnity. The rights of hospitality are held so sacred among the Arabs, that a bread and salt traitor, who violates them, is the bitterest reproach that can be applied to any person in their language. The action of Jael, therefore, seems to need an apology, or at least an explanation. By way of such apology, the Rabbins tell us, that the words, 'at her feet he bowed, he fell,' (v. 27.); &c., imply that he attempted rudeness to her, and that, to resist such violation, she had recourse to the workman's hammer. But this appears improbable; and besides, it is clear that fatigue and sleep had overpowered Sisera. It seems likely, 1. that Jael had herself felt the severity of the late oppression of Israel by Sisera; 2. that she was actuated by motives of patriotism, and of gratitude towards Israel; 3. the general character of Sisera might be so atrocious, that at any rate his death might be desirable. Some think that Jael acted by a divine impulse, and thus became the instrument of divine vengeance. We have an instance of a conduct nearly similar in its principles to that of Jael, in the case of Judith, whose anxiety for the deliverance of her people led to the employment of artifice to accomplish her purposes. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 304.

JA'IR, יָאִיר, Iair, signifies my light; otherwise, who diffuses light, or is enlightened. Jair, of Manasseh, possessed beyond Jordan the whole country of Argob to the borders of Geshur and Maachathi. (Judg. x. 3.) He succeeded Tola in the government of Israel, and was succeeded by Jephthah. His government continued twenty-two years, from the year of the world 2795 to 2817; or, according to Dr. Hales, whose system of chronology is founded on that of Josephus, from 1293 to 1271 years before Christ.

JAIRUS, Ἰαίρους, has the same signification as Jair. Jairus was a ruler or presiding officer of the synagogue, (ἀρχισυναγωγός) whose daughter Jesus Christ restored to life by a miracle. Prostrating himself at the feet of Jesus, in the midst of a great multitude of people, Jairus besought him to come to his house and heal his daughter, who was at the last extremity. Jesus listened to his request, and on his way was followed by the multitude. At that moment, a miracle of a different kind was performed, by the instantaneous cure of an inveterate disease, in a person who only secretly touched the hem of our Saviour's garment; a circumstance which rendered the miracle so much the more a subject of observation to the multitude, when the person who was healed was publicly questioned on what she had done.

At the same instant, Jairus was informed by his servants that his daughter was dead, in order to prevent him from farther importuning our Lord, whose visit to his house they then considered as completely unnecessary and useless. From the narrative of St. Matthew, we might be led to suppose, that his daughter was dead when Jairus first addressed our Lord; but it is obvious, that Matthew, omitting several previous circumstances mentioned by the other evangelists, begins his relation at the time when the father knew that she was dead. Aware of the message which Jairus had received, our Lord encouraged him notwithstanding to rely on him, and went steadily on towards his house, with the multitude attending him. All the customary and noisy lamentations for the dead were already begun; and our Lord found it necessary, for the quiet of the family, to remove the mourners, who went forth fully prepared to attest to the people without the certainty of the death, after having heard with scorn what they considered as a doubt on the subject, and what our Lord intended as an intimation of the maid's immediate restoration to life. Putting them forth among the multitude, he retained with him the father and mother of the dead young woman, and three of his disciples: a sufficient number to witness and relate the circumstances of her restoration. In their presence, 'her spirit came again,' at our Lord's command. The effect was instantly produced by his almighty word, and was verified to the conviction of every individual, who saw her immediately receiving food, as a person in the full possession of life and health. The event was understood by the whole multitude; and 'the fame thereof went abroad throughout all the land.' (Matth. ix. 18—26. Mark v. 22—43. Luke viii. 41—56.) Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 259; Sir H. M. Wellwood's Discourses on the Jewish and Christian Revelations, pp. 416—418.

JAMES, Ἰάκωβος, of the same import as Jacob. JAMES, surnamed the GREATER, or the ELDER, to distinguish him from James the Younger, was brother to John the Evangelist, and son to Zebedee and Salome. (Matth. iv. 21.) He was of Bethsaida, in Galilee, and left all to follow Christ. Salome requested our Saviour, that her two sons, James and John, might sit at his right hand, when he should be in possession of his kingdom. Our Saviour answered, that it belonged to his heavenly Father alone to dispose of these places of honour. (Matth. xx. 21.) Before their vocation, James and John followed the trade of fishermen with their father Zebedee; and they did not quit their profession till our Saviour called them. (Mark i. 18, 19.) They were witnesses of our Lord's transfiguration. (Matth. xvii. 2.) When certain Samaritans refused to admit Jesus Christ, James and John wished for fire from heaven to consume them, (Luke ix. 54.); and for this reason, it is thought, the name of Boanerges, or sons of thunder, was given them.

Some days after the resurrection of our Saviour, James and John went to fish in the sea of Tiberias, where they saw Jesus. They were present at the ascension of our Lord. St. James is said to have preached to all the dispersed tribes of Israel; but for this there is only report. His martyrdom is related Acts xii. 1, 2, about the year of our Lord 42 or 44, for the date is not well ascertained. Herod Agrippa, king of the Jews, and grandson of Herod the Great, caused him to be seized, and executed at Jerusalem. Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, that he who brought St. James before the judges, was so much affected with his constancy in confessing Jesus Christ, that he also declared himself a Christian, and was condemned, as well as the apostle, to be beheaded.

JAMES the LESS, surnamed the brother of our Lord, (Gal. i. 19.); and bishop of Jerusalem, was the son of Cleophas, otherwise called Alpheus, and Mary, sister to the Blessed Virgin; consequently, he was cousin-german to Jesus Christ. He was surnamed the Just, on account of the admirable holiness and purity of his life. He is said to have been a priest, and to have observed the laws of the Nazarites from his birth.

Our Saviour appeared to James the Less eight days after his resurrection. (1 Cor. xv. 7.) He was appointed Bishop of Jerusalem; but he performed none of the duties of that station till the apostles, either by election, or from esteem for him, had conferred on him this office. We are assured by Eusebius and Epiphanius, that he wore a plate of gold upon his forehead, as a mark of episcopacy, with the name of God, in all probability, inscribed upon it, in imitation of the Jewish high-priests. St. James was at Jerusalem, and was considered as a pillar of the church, when St. Paul first came thither, after his conversion, (Gal. i. 19.) in the year of our Lord 37. In the council of Jerusalem, held in the year 51, St. James gave his vote last; and the result of the council was principally formed from what St. James said, who, though he observed the ceremonies of the law, and was careful that others should observe them in his church, was of opinion, that such a yoke was not to be imposed on the faithful converted from among the Heathens. (Acts xv. 13, &c.) The progress which the Gospel made alarmed the chief persons among the Jews; and Ananus, the son of Annas, the high-priest, mentioned in the New Testament, caused James to be put to death. By this act Ananus and his partisans injured their credit among the people. James was put to death in the year 62.

The ancient heretics forged writings, which they ascribed to St. James, the brother of our Lord; but only his Epistle is acknowledged as authentic. This Epistle is alluded to by Clement of Rome, and Hermas, and it is quoted by Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, and many other fathers. Though the antiquity of this Epistle has never been disputed, yet some few formerly doubted its right to be admitted into the canon. Eusebius says, that in his time it was generally, though not universally, received as canonical; and that it was publicly read in most, but not in all, churches. Estius, a Dutch divine of great eminence, who died in the beginning of the last century, affirms, that after the fourth century, no church or ecclesiastical writer is found, who ever doubted its authenticity; but that, on the contrary, it is included in all subsequent catalogues of canonical Scripture, whether published by councils, churches, or individuals. Indeed, it had been the uniform tradition of the church, that this Epistle was written by James the Just, bishop of Jerusalem; but it was not universally admitted, till after the fourth century, that James the Just was the same person as James the Less, one of the twelve apostles. When that point was ascertained, the canonical authority of this Epistle was no longer disputed. It is evident that this Epistle could not have been written by James the Great, who was beheaded by Herod Agrippa about the year 42 or 44, as the errors and vices reproved in this Epistle show that it is of a much later date; and the destruction of Jerusalem is also here spoken of as being very near at hand. It has always been considered as a circumstance very much in favour of this Epistle, that it is found in the Syriac version, which was made as early as the first century, and for the particular use of converted Jews, the very description of persons to whom it was originally addressed. Hence we infer that from the first it was acknowledged by those for whom it was written. 'I think,' says Dr. Doddridge, 'it can hardly be doubted but they were better judges of the question of its authenticity than the Gentiles, to whom it was not written; among whom, therefore, it was not propagated so early; and who at first might be prejudiced against it, because it was inscribed to the Jews.' Michaelis ascribes to this Epistle an early date, and thinks it probable, that it was written long before the Epistle to the Romans, and even before St. Peter had preached the Gospel to the Gentiles. It is, however, generally believed that it was written a short time before the death of James; and Lardner places the date of this Epistle in 61, or in the beginning of 62. Many writers, among whom is Lardner, have thought that this Epistle was written to unbelieving as well as believing Jews, and have quoted the beginning of the fourth and fifth chapters, as applicable to unbelievers only. But this is not probable. Though the inscription, 'To the twelve tribes that are scattered abroad,' might comprehend both believing and unbelieving Jews, yet it would appear, that this Epistle was intended for believing Jews only. Neither St. James, nor any other apostle, ever thought of writing to any except Christian converts. Besides, the sense of the inscription seems to be limited to the believing Jews, by what follows almost immediately, 'The trial of your faith worketh patience,' (i. 3.) Again, 'My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ the Lord of Glory, with respect of persons,' (ii. 1.) These passages could not be addressed to unbelievers. The design of this Epistle seems to have been to animate the Jewish Christians to support, with fortitude and patience, any sufferings to which they might be exposed, and to enforce the genuine doctrine and practice of the Gospel, in opposition to the errors and vices which then prevailed among them. The principal source of these errors and vices was a misinterpretation of St. Paul's doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, that is, as the Apostle meant it, without the observance of the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic dispensation. Hence, some had most unwarrantably inferred, that moral duties were not essential to salvation, and had, therefore, abandoned themselves to every species of licentiousness and profligacy. This Epistle is written with great perspicuity and energy, and contains an excellent summary of those practical duties, and moral virtues, which are required of Christians. *Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. JANNES and JAMBRES were two of the principal Egyptian magicians, who withstood Moses and Aaron, by attempting to imitate the miracles which they actually performed. (Exod. vii. 11, 12; viii. 7, 18, 19.) As these names do not occur in the Old Testament, St. Paul probably derived them from the Rabbinical writings, (2 Tim. iii. 8.) in which they are often mentioned. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 591; Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. viii. pp. 323, 324.

JANSENISTS, a denomination of Roman Catholics in France, which was formed in 1640, and excited considerable attention. The founder of this sect was Cornelius Jansen, originally professor of divinity in the University of Louvain, and afterwards Bishop of Ypres, in Flanders. This eminent and learned person became early attached to the writings of St. Augustine, and had imbibed all that father's opinions concerning the nature of human liberty and divine grace. The chief labour of his life was exhausted in digesting these opinions into a regular treatise, which, in honour of his master, he intitled Augustinus. He left the work complete at his death, in 1638, and submitted it, by his last will, to the holy see. The publication might, possibly, have passed with little notice, or, at most, like many other speculations, have enjoyed only a temporary celebrity, if the imprudence of the Jesuits, who were alarmed by an imaginary attack on their infallibility, had not selected it as an object on which they might display their unbounded influence. The famous Cardinal Richelieu was not favourably disposed to the memory of its author, who, in a former work, had condemned the politics of France; and, therefore, uniting with the Jesuits, he procured the condemnation of the work of Jansen, by successive bulls. Persecution generally produces opposition, and, perhaps, the unpopularity of the Jesuits might tend considerably to increase the disciples of Jansen. His doctrines were embraced by a considerable party, both in France and the Netherlands, and had the honour to rank among their defenders James Boonen, archbishop of Malines, Libertus Fromond, Anthony Arnould, Blaise Pascal, Peter Nicholas, Pasquier du Quesnel, and many others of scarcely inferior reputation. The utmost vigilance of the church could not exclude the spirit of Jansenism from penetrating the convents themselves; but none was so distinguished as the female convent of Port Royal, in the neighbourhood of Paris. These nuns observed the strict rules of the Cisterrians; the vale in which the convent was situated soon became the retreat of the Jansenist penitents, and a number of little huts were presently erected within its precincts. After various vicissitudes of persecution, in 1709, the nuns refusing to subscribe the declaration of Alexander VII., the weak and intolerant Louis XIV. ordered the whole building to be utterly demolished.

The principal tenets of the Jansenists are as follow: 1. That there are divine precepts, which good men, notwithstanding their desire to observe them, are, nevertheless, absolutely unable to obey: nor has God given them that measure of grace which is essentially necessary to render them capable of such obedience. 2. That no person, in this corrupt state of nature, can resist the influence of divine grace, when it operates upon the mind. 3. That, in order to render human actions meritorious, it is not requisite that they be exempt from necessity, but that they be free from constraint. 4. That the Semi-Pelagians err greatly in maintaining that the human will is endowed with the power of either receiving or resisting the aids and influences of preventing grace. 5. That whoever affirms, that Jesus Christ made expiation, by his sufferings and death, for the sins of all mankind, is a Semi-Pelagian. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 373. 379; Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. ii. pp. 488, 489.

JAPHETH, יָפֶֿתֿ, signifies he that persuades, or extends; otherwise, handsome. Japheth, son of Noah, is commonly named the third in order of Noah's sons, but improperly, for he was born in the five hundredth year of Noah; and Moses says expressly, that Japheth was the eldest of Noah's sons, according to the Septuagint and Symmachus. Moses also says, that Ham was the youngest, (Gen. ix. 24.) 'When Noah knew what his younger son had done.' Lastly, Moses observes, (Gen. xi. 10.) that Shem, two years after the deluge, was only 100 years old, and, therefore, was not born till the 502d year of Noah. Hence it appears, that Japheth was the eldest.

'Japheth,' says Dr. Hales, 'signifies enlargement; and how wonderfully did Providence enlarge the boundaries of Japheth! His posterity diverged eastward and westward throughout the whole extent of Asia, north of the great range of Taurus, as far as the eastern ocean; whence they probably crossed over to America by Behring's Straits, from Kamtschatka; and in the opposite direction throughout Europe, to the Mediterranean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, from whence also they might have crossed over to America by Newfoundland, where traces of early settlements remain in parts now desert. Thus did they gradually enlarge themselves till they literally encompassed the earth, within the precincts of the northern temperate zone; to which their roving hunter's life contributed not a little. Their progress northwards was checked by the much greater extent of the Black Sea in ancient times, and the increasing rigour of the climates: but their hardy race, and enterprising warlike genius, made them frequently encroach southwards on the settlements of Shem, whose pastoral and agricultural occupations rendered them more inactive, peaceable, and unwarlike: and so they dwelt in the tents of Shem, when the Scythians invaded Media, and subdued western Asia southwards, as far as Egypt, in the days of Cyaxares; when the Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, overran and subdued the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians, in the east, and the Syrians and Jews in the south, as foretold by the Syrian prophet Balaam, (Numb. xxiv. 24.)

'Ships shall come from Chittim,
And shall afflict the Assyrians, and afflict the Hebrews:

But he [the invader] shall perish himself at last.'

And by Moses, (Deut. xxviii. 68.): 'and the Lord shall bring thee [the Jews] into Egypt [or bondage] again with ships,' &c. And by Daniel, (xi. 30. 40.):—'For the ships of Chittim shall come against him,' namely, Antiochus, king of Syria. In these passages, Chittim denotes the southern coasts of Europe, bounding the Mediterranean, called the Isles of the Gentiles or nations, (Gen. x. 5.) And the Isles of Chittim are mentioned by Jeremiah, (ii. 10.) And in aftertimes the Tartars, in the east, have repeatedly invaded and subdued the Hindoos and the Chinese; while the warlike and enterprising genius of the greatest of the Isles of the Gentiles, GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, have spread their colonies, their arms, their language, their arts, and, in some measure, their religion, from the rising to the setting sun.'

The sons of Japheth were Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. The Scripture says, that they peopled the Isles of the Gentiles, and settled in different countries, each according to his language, family, and people. (Gen. x. 5.) It is supposed that Gomer peopled Galatia, and that from him the Cimmerians, or Cimbrians, and also the Phrygians, derived their origin; that Magog was the father of the Scythians, and Tartars, or Tatars; that Madai was the progenitor of the Medes, though some make him the founder of a people in Macedonia, called Mædi; that from Javan sprung the Ionians and Greeks; that Tubal was the father of the Iberians, and that at least a part of Spain was peopled by him and his descendants; that Meshech was the founder of the Cappadocians, from whom proceeded the Moscovites, or Russians; and that from Tiras the Thracians derived their origin.

Japheth was known by profane authors under the name of Japetus. The poets make him father of heaven and earth. The Greeks believed that Japheth was the father of their race, and acknowledged nothing more ancient than him. Besides the seven sons above-mentioned, the Septuagint, Eusebius, the Alexandrian Chronicle, and Austin, give him an eighth, called Eliza, who is not named either in the Hebrew, or in the Chaldee. The eastern people affirm, that Japheth had eleven children. Calmet's Dictionary; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 354, &c.

JASH'ER, Book of. See BIBLE.

JA'ZER, יֵזֶר, signifies assistance, or he that helps, and was the name of a city beyond the Jordan, given to the tribe of Gad: it afterwards became one of the Levitical cities. (Josh. xxi. 36.; xii. 25.) The SEA of JAZER (Jer. xlviii. 32.) is thought by Dr. Blayney to be the Dead Sea, Jazer being in the north border of Moab. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 591.

ICO'NIUM, 'Ικόνιον, from ἴκω, signifies coming, and was a city of Lycaonia, the chief of the fourteen belonging to that tetrarchy. Here was a synagogue of Jews and proselytes, to whom Paul and Barnabas preaching and confirming their doctrine by miracles, converted many to the Christian faith; (Acts xiv. 1, 2, 3.) and here the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles made an assault upon them, 'to use them despitefully and to stone them.' (ver. 5.) It is now called Konieh. Wells's Geography.

ICONOCLASTÆ, or ICONOCLASTS, breakers of images, from εἰκών, an image, and κλάω, to break. This name is given by the church of Rome to all who reject the use of images in religious matters.

The opposition to images began in Greece, under the reign of Philipicus, who was created emperor of the Greeks soon after the commencement of the eighth century, when the worship of images had become common. The tumult occasioned by this opposition was quelled by a revolution, which, in 713, deprived Philipicus of the imperial throne. Under Leo the Isaurian, the contests concerning image-worship, which had for some time lain dormant, were revived; measures against the prevalence of this pernicious superstition were conceived, and executed with resolution and intrepidity; and sharp and continued tumults agitated the whole Christian world. In 726, Leo published a severe edict against this species of idolatry, in which he strictly prohibited that images should receive any kind of worship and adoration, and commanded them to be removed from all the churches. However, the successful struggle of Leo, for the demolition of idolatry in the imperial city, did not influence the conduct of his subjects in the other parts of the empire, nor render his measures acceptable to the Roman see. The horrors of civil war raged in the Islands of the Archipelago, in Asia, and in Italy. Gregory II., the Roman pontiff, opposed, with great vehemence the attempts of the emperor respecting image-worship, and absolved the people of Rome from their allegiance to Leo. This measure was the signal of revolt: the Romans and other Italian provinces, subject to the Grecian Empire, rose in arms, massacred or banished the imperial officers, and, refusing to acknowledge the authority of the emperor, chose new magistrates. Leo, however, opposed the worship of images with reiterated fury, and enforced his prohibition by threatening the guilty opposer of his laws with severe and exemplary punishment. A favourite image of Christ, which was destroyed, was the signal of another rebellion; and the adorers of images, who were called Iconolatæ, and their opponents the Iconoclastæ, mutually resisted, detested, and persecuted each other.

The death of Leo, and that of Gregory III., who died the same year, and whose attachment to image-worship had not been less decisive than that of his predecessor, did not restore tranquillity to the church and the empire. Leo was succeeded by his son Constantine Copronymus, who renewed his father's edict, and, in 754, convened at Constantinople a council in which not only the worship, but the use, of images was unanimously condemned. The decrees of this assembly, which the Greeks regarded as the seventh general council, were received by great numbers, though not universally, even in the eastern churches, but were utterly rejected at Rome. Leo III., who succeeded Constantine in 775, was not more favourable to the cause of idolatry than his progenitors. He openly declared his abhorrence of image-worship, and punished with severity those who had presumed to pay any kind of adoration to the saints, to the Virgin Mary, or to their images. The infant son of Leo, who was only ten years of age, was the nominal successor of his father; but the reins of government were assumed by the ambitious empress, Irene, who transacted all the affairs of the empire. Under her administration, the Iconolatæ enjoyed not only a respite from their sufferings, but the utmost protection and favour. New images decorated the walls which had lately been deprived of their ornaments; and she adopted the popular measure of annulling the edicts of former emperors against the worship of idols. In 786, in concert with Adrian, bishop of Rome, a council was convened at Nice, in Bithynia, where the impiety of the image-breakers was severely condemned, the adoration of images and of the cross re-established, and severe punishments were denounced against the daring transgressors of the established rites. Charlemagne ordered a judicious divine to compose Four Books concerning Images, which refuted the absurd decrees of the Nicene assembly with judgment and with spirit. These books were sent, in 790, to the Roman pontiff Adrian, who attempted to answer and refute the objections of Charlemagne. The prince, however, in 794, assembled a council at Frankfort, in which the opinion supported in the Four Books, of the lawfulness and expediency of placing pictures in churches, either as ornaments to the building, or as useful in refreshing the memory, was allowed; but the worship of them was absolutely forbidden. According to the testimony of Roger Hovedon and other English writers, the British churches assented to this decision.

After the banishment of Irene, the controversy concerning images was renewed among the Greeks, and was carried on by the contending parties, during the half of the ninth century, with various and uncertain success. The emperor Nicephorus seems, upon the whole, to have been an enemy to that idolatrous service. His successor, Michael Curopalates, surnamed Rhangabe, pursued very different measures, and persecuted the adversaries of image-worship with the greatest rancour and cruelty. The scene again changed on the accession of Leo, the Armenian, to the empire, who abolished the decrees of the Nicene council, relating to the use and worship of images, in a council assembled at Constantinople, in 814. His successor, Michael, surnamed Balbus, or the Stammerer, disapproved of the worship of images; and Theophilus, the son of Michael, opposed the worshippers of images with much violence, and treated them with great severity. On the death of Theophilus, the regency was entrusted to the empress Theodora, during her son's minority. This superstitious princess assembled, in 842, a council at Constantinople, in which the decrees of the second Nicene council were reinstated in their lost authority, and the Greeks were indulged in their corrupt propensity to image-worship by a decisive law. The council held at the same place under Photius, in 879, and reckoned by the Greeks the eighth general council, added force and vigour to idolatry, by maintaining the sanctity of images, and approving, confirming, and renewing, the Nicene decrees.

The Latins were generally of opinion, that images might be suffered as the means of aiding the memory of the faithful, and of calling to their remembrance the pious and virtuous actions of the persons they represented; but they detested all thoughts of paying them the least degree of religious homage or adoration. The council of Paris, assembled by Lewis the Meek, in 824, allowed the images in churches, but severely prohibited to treat them with the smallest marks of religious worship. In time, however, the European Christians gradually departed from the observance of this injunction, and fell imperceptibly into a blind submission to the decisions of the Roman pontiff, whose influence and authority grew daily more formidable. Towards the conclusion, therefore, of the ninth century, the Gallican clergy began to pay a certain degree of religious homage to the sacred images; and their example was followed by the Germans and other nations. Yet, the Iconoclasts were not destitute of adherents among the Latins.

The most eminent of these was Claudius, bishop of Turin, who, in 823, ordered all images, and even the cross itself, to be cast out of the churches and committed to the flames. He also composed a treatise, in which he declared against the use, as well as the worship, of images. He denied that the cross was to be honoured with any kind of worship; treated relics with the utmost contempt, as absolutely destitute of the virtues attributed to them; and censured, with much freedom and severity, the frequent pilgrimages to the Holy Land, and the offerings at the tombs of saints.

In the eleventh century, the controversy concerning the sanctity of images was revived among the Greeks by Leo, bishop of Chalcedon. The emperor Alexius had ordered the figures of silver that adorned the portals of the churches to be converted into money, in order to supply the exigencies of the state. Leo obstinately maintained, that Alexius had been guilty of sacrilege; and he published a treatise, in which he affirmed, that in the images of Jesus Christ, and of the saints, there resided an inherent sanctity, and that the adoration of Christians ought not to be confined to the persons represented by these images, but extend to the images themselves. The emperor assembled a council at Constantinople, which determined, that the images of Christ, and of the saints, were to be honoured only with a relative worship; and that invocation and worship were to be addressed to the saints, only as the servants of Christ, and on account of their relation to him as their master. These absurd and superstitious decisions did not satisfy the idolatrous Leo, who obstinately maintained his opinions, and was, therefore, sent into banishment.

In the western church, the worship of images was disapproved and opposed by several considerable parties, as the Petrobrussians, the Albigenses, Waldenses, &c. and at length this idolatrous practice was abolished in many parts of the Christian world by the Reformation. See IMAGES. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. pp. 89, 90, 91, 148, &c.; Gregory's Hist. of the Christ. Church, vol. i. pp. 413, 414, &c.

IDLENESS, aversion from labour. The idle man is, in every view, both foolish and criminal. He lives not to God. Idleness was not made for man, nor man for idleness. A small measure of reflection might convince every one, that for some useful purpose he was sent into the world. Man is placed at the head of all things here below. He is furnished with a great preparation of faculties and powers. He is enlightened by reason with many important discoveries; even taught by revelation to consider himself as ransomed, by the death of Christ, from misery; and intended to rise to a still higher rank in the universe of God. In such a situation, thus distinguished, thus favoured, and assisted by his Creator, does he answer the end of his being, if he aim at no improvement, if he pursue no useful design, if he live for no other purpose than to indulge in sloth, to consume the fruits of the earth, and spend his days in a dream of vanity? Existence is a sacred trust; and he who thus misemploys and squanders it away, is treacherous to its author. Look around, and you will behold the whole universe full of active powers. Action is, to speak so, the genius of nature. By motion and exertion, the system of being is preserved in vigour. By its different parts always acting in subordination to each other, the perfection of the whole is carried on. The heavenly bodies perpetually revolve. Day and night incessantly repeat their appointed course. Continual operations are performing on the earth and in the waters. Nothing stands still. All is alive and stirring throughout the universe. In the midst of this animated and busy scene, is man alone to remain idle in his place? Belongs it to him, to be the sole inactive and slothful being in the creation, when in so many ways he might improve his own nature, might advance the glory of the God who made him, and contribute his part to the general good?

The idle live not to the world and their fellow-creatures, any more than to God. If any man had a title to stand alone, and to be independent of his fellows, he might consider himself as at liberty to indulge in solitary ease and sloth, without being responsible to others for the manner in which he chooses to live. But there is no such person in the world. We are connected with each other by various relations, which create a chain of mutual dependence, that reaches from the highest to the lowest station in society. Without a perpetual circulation of active duties and offices, which all are required to perform in their turn, the order and happiness of the world could not be maintained. Superiors are no more independent of their inferiors, than these inferiors of them. Each have demands and claims upon the other; and he who, in any situation of life, refuses to act his part, and to contribute his share to the general stock of felicity, deserves to be proscribed from society as an unworthy member. 'If any man will not work,' says St. Paul, (2 Thess. iii. 10.) 'neither shall he eat.' If he will do nothing to advance the purposes of society, he has no right to enjoy its benefits.

The idle man lives not to himself with any more advantage than he lives to the world. Though he imagines that he leaves to others the drudgery of life, and betakes himself to enjoyment and ease, yet he enjoys no true pleasure. He shuts the door against improvement of every kind, whether of mind, body, or fortune. Sloth enfeebles equally the bodily and the mental powers. His character falls into contempt. His fortune is consumed. Disorder, confusion, and embarrassment, mark his whole situation. Idleness is the inlet to licentiousness, vice, and immorality. It destroys the principles of religion, and opens a door to sin and wickedness. Every man who recollects his conduct, must know that his hours of idleness always proved the hours most dangerous to virtue. It was then that criminal desires arose, guilty passions were suggested, and designs were formed, which, in their issue, disquiet and embitter his whole life. Habitual idleness, by a silent and secret progress, undermines every virtue in the soul. More violent passions run their course and terminate. They are like rapid torrents, which foam, and swell, and bear down every thing before them; but, after having overflowed their banks, their impetuosity subsides, and they return, by degrees, into their natural channel. Sloth resembles the slowly flowing putrid stream, which stagnates in the marsh, produces venomous animals, and poisonous plants, and infects with pestilential vapours the whole surrounding country. Having once tainted the soul, it leaves no part of it sound; and, at the same time, it gives not to conscience those alarms, which the eruptions of bolder and fiercer emotions often occasion. Nothing is so great an enemy to the lively and spirited enjoyment of life, as a relaxed and indolent habit of mind. He who knows not what it is to labour, knows not what it is to enjoy. The happiness of human life depends on the regular prosecution of some laudable purpose or object, which keeps awake and enlivens all our powers. Rest is agreeable; but it is only from preceding labours that rest acquires its true relish. When the mind is suffered to remain in continued inaction, all its powers decay: it soon languishes and sickens; and the pleasures which it proposed to obtain from rest, terminate in tediousness and insipidity. Blair's Sermons, Sermon xxix.; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. p. 451.

IDOLATRY, superstitious worship paid to idols and false gods. This word is taken in general for all impious, superstitious, and sacrilegious worship. The Old Testament does not warrant us to say, that idolatry was one of those enormities which determined the Creator to involve, in one common ruin, almost the whole race of mankind. However, soon after the flood appeared a portentous idolatry, which gradually overspread the whole earth. Amidst the crowd of imaginary deities, the real one soon became almost entirely forgotten. Irreligion and false religion divided the world between them. Even Abraham, before his call, was, most probably, an idolater. Such, at least, were some of his ancestors; and his father is supposed to have been, by profession, a maker of idols.

The first monument of idolatry seems to have been that stupendous tower, which the united labours of mankind erected in honour of Belus, or the Sun, on the plains of Shinar. Chaldaea was the original theatre of the most ancient species of idolatry, the worship of the heavenly bodies. This delusion may be accounted for, in some measure, from the climate of the Chaldaeans, and the serenity of their sky, together with their occupation as shepherds, which kept them abroad in a wide extent of champaign country, by night as well as by day. It may be granted, with Maimonides and Diodorus, that it was not to the planets themselves, but to the spirit which was thought to reside in them, to be the soul of them, and to direct their course through the expanse of heaven, that the Chaldaeans, at first, addressed their prayers. It cannot, however, be asserted, with these authors, that the Sabæan idolaters had invariably the Supreme Being as the ultimate object of their addresses to the planetary angels. They gradually forgot the Deity, invisible and inaccessible, in the dazzling splendour of the orb itself, and in the imagined influences dispensed by the flaming heralds of the Divinity. In time, the Sun himself became the deity they adored, and the moon and stars his ministers and attributes. The worship of the heavenly bodies and of the elements was not only the most ancient, but, in the judgment of many, the least blamable species of idolatry: 'For they, peradventure, erred seeking God, and desirous to find him.' (Wisdom xiii. 6.)

But superstition degenerates from bad to worse. The farther we remove from the source of idolatry, the more impure it evidently becomes; till in the accumulated corruptions of many ages, we behold, in respect to divine knowledge, the ultimate degradation of the human mind. Elementary and planet worship was soon succeeded, among the Egyptians, by the deification of their deceased kings, heroes, and others. Their superstition became so stupidly vile and depraved, as to lead them to worship birds and beasts, and plants, and not only the most noxious beings in nature, but monsters and chimeras of the most wild and distempered imagination. This country, the inventress of statues, having carried image-worship, and its subsequent errors, to a greater excess than any other nation, and having corrupted all others with its barbarous rites, was, therefore, rendered the scene of those miracles, by which the God of Israel triumphed over idolatry in its strongest citadel. The still more unnatural, the sanguinary and inexorable superstition of the republic of Carthage, was formed on that of its parent state, the Phœnicians, 'who sacrificed their sons and their daughters to the idols of Canaan.' (2 Kings iii. 27. Psalm cvi. 38.)

'The worship of the Pagans,' says Dr. Isaac Barrow, 'was directed to very unsuitable and improper objects; to the spirits of dead men, who, in their lifetime, were vilely enormous, guilty of thefts and rapines, murders, and parricides, of horrid lusts, adulteries, rapes, and incest; persons that good and wise men would rather hate and despise. Nay, they worshipped the vilest of brute beasts, dogs, serpents, and crocodiles; also inanimate creatures, the stars and elements, rivers and trees; they dedicated temples, and offered sacrifices, to the passions of our souls, the diseases of our bodies, and the accidents of our lives; to adore and pay adoration to all which, must argue a very abject and weak mind. To such objects as these they paid their respects and devotion; in them they reposed their confidence. And is it likely such a religion should proceed from God, or that it can produce glory to Him, or benefit to man? What piety towards God? What justice, truth, or goodness, towards men? What sobriety, purity, or morality, can we expect from such principles and practices?' Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. p. 141; Adams's Religious World, vol. i. p. 90, &c.

IDUME'A, or EDMOM, אִדּוּמָא, signifies red, human. Idumea, or Edom, is a province of Arabia, which derives its name from Edom, or Esau, who there settled in the mountains of Seir, in the land of the Horites, south-east of the Dead Sea. His descendants afterwards extended themselves throughout Arabia Petræa, and south of Palestine, between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. During the Babylonish captivity, and when Judea was almost deserted, they seized the south of Judah, and advanced to Hebron. Hence that tract of Judea, which they inhabited, retained the name of Idumea in the time of our Saviour. (Mark iii. 8.) Under Moses and Joshua, and even under the kings of Judah, the Idumeans were confined to the east and south of the Dead Sea, in the land of Seir, but afterwards they extended their territories more to the south of Judah. The capital of East Edom was Bozra; and that of South Edom Petra, or Jectael.

The Idumeans, or Edomites, the posterity of Esau, had kings long before the Jews. They were first governed by dukes or princes, and afterwards by kings. (Gen. xxxvi. 31.) They continued independent till the time of David, who subdued them, in completion of Isaac's prophecy, that Jacob should rule Esau. (Gen. xxvii. 29, 30.) The Idumeans bore this subjection with great impatience; and at the end of Solomon's reign, Hadad, the Edomite, who had been carried into Egypt during his childhood, returned into his own country, where he procured himself to be acknowledged king. (1 Kings xi. 22.) It is probable, however, that he reigned only in East Edom; for Edom south of Judea continued subject to the kings of Judah, till the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, against whom it rebelled. (2 Chron. xxi. 8.) Jehoram attacked Edom, but did not subdue it. Amaziah, king of Judah, took Petra, killed 1000 men, and compelled 10,000 more to leap from the rock, upon which stood the city of Petra. (2 Chron. xxv. 11.) But these conquests were not permanent. Uzziah took Elath on the Red Sea, (2 Kings xiv. 22.); but Rezin, king of Syria, retook it. Some think that Ezarhaddon, king of Syria, ravaged this country. (Isaiah xxi. 11, 12, 13.; xxxiv. 6.) Holofernes subdued this, as well as other nations around Judea. (Judith ii. 23.) When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, the Idumeans joined him, and encouraged him to rase the very foundations of that city. This cruelty did not long continue unpunished. Five years after the taking of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar humbled all the states around Judea, and in particular Idumea. John Hyrcanus entirely conquered the Idumeans, whom he obliged to receive circumcision and the law. They continued subject to the later kings of Judea till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. They even came to assist that city when besieged, and entered it in order to defend it. However, they did not continue there till it was taken, but returned into Idumea loaded with booty.

With respect to the religion of the Idumeans, it is credible, that in early ages they adored the true God, whose worship Esau had learned in his father Isaac's house. The Scripture neither reproaches the Idumeans with idolatry, nor mentions their idols. Calmel's Dictionary.

JEHO'AHAZ, יְהוֹאָחָז, signifies the prize, or possession of the Lord; or, the Lord that sees; יֵאָחֵז, he that takes, or possesses, or sees.

JEHOAHAZ, son of Jehu, king of Israel, succeeded his father in the year of the world 3148, and reigned seventeen years, (2 Kings xiii.) He did evil in the sight of the Lord, like Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. Therefore the anger of the Lord delivered Israel during all his reign to Hazael, king of Syria, and Benhadad, the son of Hazael. Jehoahaz, overwhelmed with so many misfortunes, prostrated himself before the Lord; and the Lord heard him, and sent him a saviour in Joash, his son, who re-established the affairs of Israel, and secured his people from the kings of Syria. Of all his soldiers Jehoahaz had only fifty horsemen left, 10 chariots, and 10,000 foot; for the king of Syria had defeated them, and made them like the dust of the threshing-floor.

JEHOAHAZ, otherwise Shallum, son of Josiah, king of Judah, (Jerem. xxii. 11.) Josiah dying of his wounds at Megiddo, Jehoahaz succeeded him, (2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31, 32.) though he was not Josiah's eldest son. He was twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and he reigned about three months, in the year of the world 3395. Necho, king of Egypt, returning from his expedition against Carchemish, was provoked that the people of Judah had placed this prince on the throne without his participation. Necho sent for him to Riblah in Syria, divested him of the kingdom, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt, where he died, (Jerem. xxii. 11, 12.) Jehoiakim, or Eliakim, his brother, was made king in his room.

JEHOIACHIN, יהויכין, Iwakiu, signifies preparation, or the strength of the Lord. Jehoiachin, Coniah, (Jerem. xxii. 24.) or Jeconiah, (1 Chr. iii. 17.) the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and grandson of Josiah, reigned only three months over Judah. (2 Kings xxiv. 8. 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9.) Some think that he was born about the time of the first Babylonish captivity, in 3398, when Jehoiakim, or Eliakim, his father, was carried to Babylon. Jehoiakim returned from Babylon, and reigned till the year 3405, when he was killed by the Chaldeans, in the eleventh year of his reign. Jehoiachin succeeded him, and reigned alone three months and ten days; but he reigned ten years in conjunction with his father. By this distinction, 2 Kings xxiv. 8. is reconciled with 2 Chronicles xxxvi. 9. In the second book of Kings, it is said that he was eighteen years of age when he began to reign; and in Chronicles, that he was only eight: that is, he was only eight years old when he began to reign with his father, and eighteen when he began to reign alone.

About three months after the death of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar came in person to the siege of Jerusalem. Jehoiachin being unable to defend the city, surrendered himself, with his mother and family, to Nebuchadnezzar, and was sent to Babylon, where he was kept in prison thirty-seven years. Nebuchadnezzar, having made himself master of Jerusalem, sent the remaining treasures of the temple, and of the king's house, with great numbers of captives, to Babylon.

Jeremiah (xxii. 24.) mentions Jehoiachin as a very bad prince, whose sins had incurred the indignation of God. But it is believed that he repented, and that God treated him with mercy; for Evil-merodach, Nebuchadnezzar's successor, used him honourably, took him out of prison, spoke kindly to him, and placed his throne above the throne of other princes who were at his court. (2 Kings xxv. 27, &c. Jerem. lii. 31.) The words, 'Write this man childless,' cannot be taken literally, since we know that Jehoiachin was the father of Salathiel and other children, (1 Chron. iii. 17, 18. Matt. i. 12.) The Hebrew word, translated childless, is taken also for one who has lost his children, who has no SUCCESSION, or heirs. In this sense, Jehoiachin, son of a king, and himself a king, was as a man without issue, since no son succeeded him in his kingdom; for neither Salathiel, who was born and died in captivity, nor Zerubbabel, who returned from Babylon, nor any of Jehoiachin's descendants, sat on the throne of Judah. This is fairly implied in the words 'No man of his seed, that is, posterity, shall prosper.' Hence it appears that he was to have seed, but of whom no one should enjoy the regal dignity. The passage should be rendered, 'Write this man successorless.' Additions to Calmel's Dictionary.

JEHOIADA, by Josephus called Joada, succeeded Azariah in the high-priesthood, and was succeeded by Zechariah. In 1 Chronicles vi. 9, 10. Johanan and Azariah seem to be confounded with Jehoiada and Zechariah. This high-priest, with his wife Jehosheba, preserved Joash, son of Joram, king of Judah, then but one year old, from the murderous violence of Athaliah, and concealed that young prince in the temple. After seven years, he set him on the throne of David, (2 Kings xi. xii. 2 Chron. xxiii. xxiv.)

As long as Jehoiada lived, and Joash followed his advice, every thing happily succeeded. The high-priest formed a design of repairing the temple, and collected considerable sums in the cities of Judah: but the Levites did not acquit themselves of this commission with necessary diligence till after the king was of age, and the prince and the high-priest had united their authority in promoting this design. (2 Kings xii. 2 Chron. xxiv. 5, 6, &c.) Jehoiada died at the age of one hundred and thirty years, and was buried in the sepulchre of the kings of Jerusalem. His son Zechariah, who was high-priest after him, was put to death by Joash, with an ingratitude which has loaded the memory of Joash with eternal ignominy. See JOASH.

JEHOIAKIM, יהויקים, Iwakiu, signifies the resurrection, or confirmation of the Lord. Jehoiakim, or Eliakim, brother and successor of Jehoahaz, king of Judah, was made king by Necho, king of Egypt, at his return from an expedition against Carchemish, in the year of the world 3395. (2 Kings xxiii. 34, 35.) Necho changed his name from Eliakim to Jehoiakim, and set on him a ransom of a hundred talents of silver, and ten talents of gold. To raise this money Jehoiakim laid heavy taxes on his people, in proportion to their fortunes. Jehoiakim was twenty-five years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; and Jeremiah, (xxii. 13, 14, &c.) reproaches him with building his house by unrighteousness, with oppressing unjustly his subjects, with keeping back the wages of those whom he had employed, with having his heart and his eyes turned to avarice and inhumanity, and with following his inclination to barbarities and wicked actions. The same prophet informs us, that he sent men to bring the prophet Urijah out of Egypt, whither he had fled; and that he put him to the sword, and left him without burial. (Jer. xxvi. 23.) Therefore, the Lord threatens him with an unhappy end. He shall die, says Jeremiah, (xxii. 18, 19,) and shall be neither mourned for, nor regretted. 'He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.'

About four years after Jehoiakim had been seated on the throne of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Chaldeans, having recovered what Necho had taken on the Euphrates, came into Phœnicia and Judea, subdued the city of Jerusalem, and subjected it to the same burdens and conditions which it suffered under the king of Egypt. (2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2.) Jehoiakim was taken, and Nebuchadnezzar put him in fetters, intending to carry him to Babylon; but he restored him to liberty, and left him in his own country, on condition of his paying a large tribute.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah having dictated to Baruch the prophecies which he had pronounced till that time, Baruch read them the year following before all the people, in the temple. (Jer. xxxvi.) Jehoiakim, being informed of this publication of them, ordered the book to be brought to him, and burnt it in the fire. He then commanded to seize Jeremiah and Baruch; but the Lord concealed them. The Lord ordered Jeremiah to have his prophecies again written down; and in them he pronounced terrible menaces against Jehoiakim. Of these Jehoiakim soon experienced the truth. Three years after he rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, who sent troops of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, that ravaged all the country, and carried a great number of Jews to Babylon, in the year of the world 3401. Four years after,

Jehoiakim himself was taken, slain, and thrown into the common sewer, according to the prediction of Jeremiah. He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin.

JEHO'RAM, יהורם, signifies exaltation of the Lord, or rejected of the Lord. Jehoram, son and successor of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, was born in the year of the world 3080. (2 Kings iii. 2, 3, &c.) His father associated him in the kingdom, in 3112. He began to reign alone, after the death of Jehoshaphat, in 3116, and died, according to Usher, in 3119. He married Athaliah, daughter of Omri, who engaged him in idolatry and sins, which caused all the misfortunes that attended his reign. Jehoram, being settled in the kingdom, commenced his reign with the murder of all his brothers, whom Jehoshaphat had removed from public business, and placed in the fortified cities of Judah, with good pensions. God, to punish Jehoram's impiety, permitted the Edomites, who, since the reign of David, had been subject to the kings of Judah, to revolt, in the year of the world 3115, (2 Kings viii. 20, 21. 2 Chron. xxi. 8, 9.) Jehoram marched against them, and defeated their cavalry; but the Edomites from that time continued free from the Hebrew yoke.

About this time Libnah, a city of Judah, also rebelled. The Philistines and Arabians ravaged the territories of Judah, plundered the king's palace, carried away his wives and his children, and none remained except Jehoahaz, the youngest. God also smote Jehoram with an incurable disease in his bowels, which dropped out; and he died after a sore sickness of two years. The people refused to pay him the same honours that they had paid his predecessors, by burning spices over their bodies. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre.

The disease of which Jehoram died, says Dr. Mead, was without doubt the dysentery, and though its continuance so long a time was very uncommon, it is by no means a thing unheard of. The intestines in time become ulcerated by the operation of this disease. Not only blood is discharged from them, but a sort of mucous excrements likewise are thrown off, and sometimes small pieces of the flesh itself; so that apparently the intestines are emitted or fall out, which is sufficient to account for the expressions that are used in the statement of king Jehoram's disease. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 515; Mead's Medica Sacra, p. 35; Jahn's Archæol. Bibl. § 187.

JEHOSHAPHAT, יהושפט, signifies God judges, or the judgment of the Lord. JEHO-SHAPHAT, king of Judah, son of Asa, king of Judah, and Azabah, daughter of Shilhi, ascended the throne at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years. He had the advantage over Baasha, king of Israel; and he placed good garrisons in the cities of Judah and of Ephraim, which and been conquered by his father. God was with him, because he was faithful. He demolished the high-places and groves. In the third year of his reign, he sent some of his officers, with priests and Levites, through all the parts of Judah, with the book of the law, to instruct the people. God blessed the zeal of this prince, who was feared by all his neighbours. The Philistines and Arabians were tributaries to him. He built several houses in Judah in the form of towers, and fortified several cities. He generally kept an army of eleven hundred thousand men, without reckoning the troops in his strong holds. This number seems prodigious for so small a state as that of Judah; but, probably, these troops were only an enrolled militia.

The Scripture reproaches Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab, king of Israel. (1 Kings xxii. 2 Chron. xviii.) Some time after he went to visit Ahab in Samaria; and Ahab invited him to march with him against Ramoth-Gilead. Jehoshaphat consented, but first asked for an opinion from a prophet of the Lord. Afterwards, he went into the battle in his robe, and the enemy supposed him to be Ahab; but he crying out, they discovered their mistake, and Jehoshaphat returned in peace to Jerusalem. The prophet Jehu reproved him for assisting Ahab. (2 Chron. xix. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Jehoshaphat repaired this fault by the good regulations, and the good order, which he established in his dominions, both as to civil and religious affairs, by appointing honest and able judges, by regulating the discipline of the priests and Levites, and by enjoining them to perform their duty with punctuality. After this, in the year 3108, the Moabites, Ammonites, and other nations of Arabia Petræa, declared war against Jehoshaphat. (2 Chron. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c.) They advanced to Hazazon-Tamar, otherwise Engedi. Jehoshaphat went with his people to the temple, and put up prayers to God. Jahaziel, the son of Zechariah, by the Spirit of the Lord, encouraged the king, and promised that the next day he should obtain a victory without fighting. Accordingly, these people being assembled the next day against Judah, quarrelled, and killed one another; and Jehoshaphat and his army had only to gather their spoils.

Some time after this, Jehoshaphat agreed with Ahaziah, king of Israel, jointly to equip a fleet in the port of Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea, to sail to Ophir for gold. Eliezer, the son of Dodovah, of Mareshah, came to Jehoshaphat, and said to him, Because thou hast made an alliance with Ahaziah, God hath disappointed thy designs, and thy ships are shattered. This prince continued to walk in the ways of the Lord. Yet, he did not destroy the high-places; and the hearts of the people were not entirely directed to the God of their fathers. Jehoshaphat died after a reign of twenty-five years, and was buried in the royal sepulchre; and his son Jehoram reigned in his stead, in the year of the world 3115.

JEHOSHAPHAT, Valley of. This valley, which is also called the valley of Kidron, because through it runs the brook Kidron, lies on the east of Jerusalem, between that city and the Mount of Olives. It appears to be an extravagant opinion, that all mankind shall be judged in this valley, merely because Joel (iii. 2.) hath said, 'I will gather all nations, and will bring them into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them for my people.' What is here called the valley of Jehoshaphat is not a proper, but an appellative name, and denotes no more than the judgment of God.

'The valley of Jehoshaphat,' says a recent traveller, 'exhibits a desolate appearance: the west side is a high cliff, supporting the walls of the city, above which you perceive Jerusalem itself; while the east side is formed by the Mount of Olives, and the Mount of Offence, thus denominated from Solomon's idolatry. Three antique monuments, the tombs of Zachariah, Jehoshaphat, and Absalom, appear conspicuous amid this scene of desolation. From the dulness of Jerusalem, whence no smoke rises, no noise proceeds; from the solitude of these hills, where no living creature is to be seen; from the ruinous state of all these tombs, overthrown, broken, and half open, you would imagine that the last trumpet had already sounded, and that the valley of Jehoshaphat was about to render up its dead.' Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, &c. vol. ii. p. 38; Stackhouse's Hist. of the Bible.

JEHO'VAH, יהוה, denotes self-subsisting, and is the ineffable and mysterious name of God. 'I appeared,' says God, 'unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them.' (Exod. vi. 3.) This passage has been variously explained. It is certain that the name Jehovah was in use long before the days of Abraham. How, then, can it be said that by his name Jehovah, he was not known unto them? Though, from the beginning, the name Jehovah was known as one of the names of the Supreme Being, yet what it really implied they did not know. Al-Shaddai, God All-sufficient, they knew well, by the continual provision he made for them, and the constant protection he afforded them:

but, the name JEHOVAH is particularly to be referred to the accomplishment of promises already made; to the giving them a being, and thus bringing them into existence, which could not have been done in the order of his providence sooner than here specified. This name, therefore, in its power and significancy, was not known unto them; nor fully unto their descendants till the deliverance from Egypt, and the settlement in the promised land. It is possible for a person to bear the name of a certain office or dignity before he fulfils any of its functions. God, who was known as JEHOVAH, the Being who makes and gives effect to promises, was known to the descendants of the twelve tribes to be THAT JEHOVAH, by giving effect and being to the promises which he had made to their fathers.

After the captivity of Babylon, the Jews, from a superstitious respect for this holy name, left off the custom of pronouncing it, and forgot its true pronunciation. The Septuagint generally render it Κύριος, the Lord. Origen, Jerome, and Eusebius, testify, that in their time the Jews left the name of Jehovah written in their copies with Samaritan characters, instead of writing it in the common Chaldee or Hebrew characters; which shows their veneration for this holy name, and their fear lest strangers should discover and misapply it. However, these precautions did not prevent the heathens from frequently misapplying it. Origen informs us, that they used it in their exorcisms and charms against diseases. The Jews call this name of God the Tetragrammaton, or name with four letters. They believe that whoever knows the true pronunciation of Jehovah, cannot fail of being heard by God; that if they have not the happiness to be heard at this day, it is owing to their ignorance of the true pronunciation; that Simon the Just, the high-priest, was the last that was acquainted with it; that after his death the number of profane persons increasing, and abusing this divine name, others forbore to pronounce it, and substituted another composed of twelve letters, which the high-priest pronounced when blessing the people. The Jews, indeed, never mention the name Jehovah, but substitute Adonai, or Elohim.

It has long been a question, what is the meaning of the word יהוה Jehovah, Yehovah, Yehue, Yehveh, or Yeve, Jeue, Jao, Jhueh, and Jove; for it has been as variously pronounced, as it has been differently interpreted. Some have maintained that it is utterly inexplicable. Some say, that it implies the essence of the divine nature. Some think that it expresses the doctrine of the Trinity connected with the incarnation: the letter jod standing for the Father, ה he for the Son, and ו vau (the connecting particle) for the Holy Ghost; and they add, that the ה he being repeated in the word, signifies the human nature united to the divine in the incarnation. Others are of opinion, that God himself interprets this name in Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7: 'And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed יהוה, JEHOVAH, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty.' These words, say they, contain the proper interpretation of the venerable and glorious name Jehovah. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Exod. xxxiv. 6; vi. 3.

JEHU, יהוא, signifies himself; otherwise, who exists. Jehu, son of Jehoshaphat, and grandson of Nimshi, captain of the troops of Joram, king of Israel, was appointed by God to reign over Israel, and to punish the sins of the house of Ahab. The Lord had ordered Elisha to anoint Jehu; (1 Kings xix. 16.) and this order was executed by one of the sons of the prophets. (2 Kings, ix. 1, 2, 3, &c.) The Lord declared his will to Elisha concerning Jehu, in the year of the world 3097; but Jehu was not appointed till 3120, twenty-three years after the order given to Elisha. Jehu was at Ramoth-Gilead, besieging the citadel of that place, with the army of Israel, when a young prophet entered, and took him aside from among the officers; and when they were alone in a chamber, he poured oil on the head of Jehu, and said, 'Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king over Israel, thou shalt extirpate the house of Ahab, and avenge the blood of the prophets shed by Jezebel.' The prophet instantly opened the door, and fled. Jehu returning to the officers, they inquired what the business might be? He declared to them what had passed. Upon this, they immediately rose up, and each taking his cloak, they made a kind of throne for Jehu, and, sounding the trumpets, cried, 'Jehu is king.'

At this time, Joram, king of Israel, was at Jezreel, under cure of wounds received in besieging Ramoth-Gilead. Jehu ordered that no one should leave the army, which he quitted instantly, in order to surprise the king at Jezreel. Joram sent an officer to meet him, and afterwards a second; at last Joram came himself, riding in his chariot, with Ahaziah, king of Judah, who was also in his chariot. They met Jehu in the field of Naboth of Jezreel. Joram asked him, 'Is it peace, Jehu?' He answered, 'What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel, and her witchcrafts, are so many?'

Joram immediately turned, and said to Ahaziah, 'There is treachery, O Ahaziah!' Jehu drew his bow, smote Joram between his shoulders, and pierced his heart. He then commanded his body to be cast into the portion of Naboth, the Jezreelite, to fulfil the prediction of the prophet Elijah. See AHAZIAH.

Jehu afterwards went to Jezreel, where was Jezebel. As he entered the city, Jezebel, who was at her window, said to him, 'Had Zimri peace who slew his master?' Jehu lifting up his head, and seeing her, commanded two or three eunuchs, who were above, to throw her out of a window. This they did; and she was trampled to death under the horses' feet, and afterwards devoured by dogs. When, therefore, Jehu sent to have her buried, they found only her bones. After this, Jehu commanded the inhabitants of Jerusalem to slay all the late king's children, and to send him their heads. He then slew all Ahab's relations and friends, the great men of his court, and his priests, who were at Jezreel. (2 Kings x. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

Afterwards, going to Samaria, he met with the relations of Ahaziah, king of Judah, in their way to Jezreel to salute the king and queen's children, of whose death they were ignorant. Jehu ordered to massacre them all, forty-two in number. A little farther, he found Jonadab, son of Rechab; and, taking him into his chariot, he said, 'Come with me and see my zeal for the Lord.' At Samaria, he slew all that remained of Ahab's family, and spared not one. He then assembled the people of Samaria, and said, 'Ahab served Baal a little, but Jehu shall serve him much,' and ordered them to collect all the ministers, priests, and prophets of Baal for a great festival. When they were all in Baal's temple, he commanded to give habits to them all, and to take particular care that there was no stranger among them. He then ordered his people to slay them every one. The statue of Baal was pulled down, broken, and burnt; and the temple itself was destroyed, and made a privy.

The Lord promised Jehu that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. The Scripture, however, accuses him of following the sins of Jeroboam, son of Nebat; and the prophet Hosea threatens him with the vengeance of God. (Hosea i. 4.) Jehu, indeed, had been the instrument of God's wrath on the house of Ahab; but in what he had done, he had been impelled by the spirit of animosity and ambition: he had followed his own passion, rather than the will of God. He had not kept within due bounds. Therefore God rewards his obedience, but punishes his injustice, ambition, idolatry, and the blood unjustly spilt by him. He reigned twenty-eight years over Israel, and was succeeded by his son Jehoahaz. (2 Kings x. 35, 36.) The four descendants of his family who governed after him, were Jehoahaz, Joash, Jeroboam II., and Zechariah. The reign of Jehu was perplexed with the war against Hazael, king of Syria.

JEPH'THAH, יִפְתָּח, signifies he that opens, or he will open. Jephthah, judge of Israel, and successor to Jair, in the government, was a son of Gilead, by one of his concubines. (Judg. xi. 1, 2.) Gilead having married a lawful wife, by whom he had children, these children drove Jephthah from his father's house. Jephthah retired into the land of Tob, where he became captain of a band of rovers. At that time, the Israelites beyond Jordan were pressed by the Ammonites, and desired assistance from Jephthah, to whom they offered the command over them. Jephthah reproached them with their injustice to him, when he was driven from his father's house; but he said that he would assist them, provided that at the end of the war they would acknowledge him as their prince. This happened in the year of the world 2817.

Jephthah having been acknowledged prince of the Israelites, in an assembly of the people, sent to the king of the Ammonites, saying, 'Why art thou come to ravage my country?' The Ammonite answered, because when Israel came out of Egypt, they seized my territory, &c. Jephthah, filled with a divine spirit, began to assemble his troops, and went over all the land of Israel beyond Jordan. He also vowed to the Lord, that if he were successful against the Ammonites, he would offer up a burnt-offering, and whatever should first come out of his house to meet him. Jephthah vanquished the Ammonites, and ravaged their land; but, as he returned to his house, his only daughter came out to meet him, with timbrels and dances, and by that means became the subject of his vow.

The tribe of Ephraim, jealous of Jephthah, passed the Jordan in a tumultuous manner, complained that he had not invited them to share in this war, and threatened to fire his house. Jephthah answered, that he had sent to desire their assistance, but they did not come. The Ephraimites not being satisfied with these reasons, Jephthah assembled the people of Gilead, gave the Ephraimites battle, and defeated them. On that day forty-two thousand men of Ephraim were killed.

Jephthah judged Israel six years, and was buried in a city of Gilead. (Judg. xii. 7.) St. Paul places him among the saints of the Old Testament, whose faith had distinguished them.

With respect to Jephthah's vow, some believe that his daughter was really offered up by him for a burnt-sacrifice; whilst others are of opinion, that she was devoted to celibacy, or dedicated to the service of

God. This matter depends on the acceptance of a single particle, which is taken for either AND or OR; for the same Hebrew particle vau may signify either. The passage may be thus rendered: 'Whatever comes to meet me, I will devote to the Lord—OR—I will offer him up a burnt-sacrifice.' Otherwise, 'Whatever comes to meet me, I will devote to the Lord; AND, that is ALSO, I will offer up to him a burnt-sacrifice;' or, 'AND I will offer up to him that which comes out of my house.' It ought likewise to be observed, that Jephthah's rashness had time to cool, as his daughter went two months to bewail her virginity, that is, her consecration to God, which obliged her to remain single, without posterity, &c. It is said, that she went to bewail her virginity, not her sacrifice. Besides, the Israelite women went yearly four times to mourn for—rather WITH—the daughter of Jephthah; to lament her seclusion from the world, and the hardship of her situation, as cut off from domestic life and enjoyment. Now, if in the course of two months no person could have suggested to Jephthah a ransom for his daughter, yet, surely, she must have been alive, though dead to him and his family (as his only child), and to the world by her seclusion, if the Israelite women went to condole with her. We may also observe, that it is not said afterwards, that he sacrificed her, but 'he did with her according to his vow.' It is added, she knew no man; if she was sacrificed this remark is frivolous, but if she was consecrated to perpetual virginity, this idea coincides with the visits of the Israelitish women. On the whole, we may safely conclude, that Jephthah's daughter was not sacrificed, but devoted to a state of celibacy; and if there were at that time women attendants at the tabernacle, she might, probably, join them. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. part i. p. 319.

JEREMI'AH, ירמיה, 'Ιερειας, signifies exaltation, or grandeur of the Lord; or who exalts, or gives glory to the Lord: ירמי, 'Ιερεμι, my height, my elevation; otherwise, he that fears; or that rejects the waters.

Jeremiah, son of Hilkiah, of a priestly family, was a native of Anathoth, a village of Benjamin. (Jer. i. 1.) Before his birth he was appointed to the prophetic office. When God first sent him to speak to the kings and princes, the priests and people of Judah, he excused himself, and alleged his youth. This was in the fourteenth year of his age, the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, and in the year of the world 3375. He prophesied till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldees, in the year of the world 3416.

When God called Jeremiah to the prophetic ministry, he discovered to him that he should suffer much from the Jews; but at the same time he promised to make him as a wall of brass against the kings, princes, and people of Judah. He also showed him, under the figure of a branch of an almond tree, and that of a pot heated by fire blown up by a vehement north wind, that Judea was threatened by a very great and near calamity from the Chaldeans. (Jer. i. 11, 12, &c.) This appears to be the general subject of his prophecies, which turn on the sins of Judah, and their punishment by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophet begins with a sharp invective against the disorders of Judah, during the first year of Josiah's reign, in which these prophecies were pronounced, and before that prince had reformed his dominions; this Josiah did in the eighteenth year of his reign. (Jer. ii. iii. iv. v. vi. vii. viii., &c.) During this time Jeremiah suffered great persecutions from the Jews. (2 Kings xxiii. 4, 5, 6, &c.) His very relations and fellow-citizens of the little town of Anathoth, threatened to kill him if he continued to prophesy; but he also threatens them, that they should perish by the sword, or by famine. (Jer. xii. xiii. xiv. xv. xvi.) At this time a famine was in the land, as one effect of the Divine wrath. About this time, God forbade the prophet to take a wife, and have children in Jerusalem, to enter any house of mirth or feasting, or any house of mourning, for the purpose of comforting those in sorrow.

Some are of opinion, that under the reign of Shallum, the son of Josiah, Jeremiah received God's orders to go to a potter's house, (Jer. xvi. xvii. xviii.) where he observed a pot which broke in the potter's hands, who immediately made another of the same clay. Jeremiah represented this as an indication of Judah's reprobation, in whose place God would raise up another people. To render this prophecy more striking, he was commanded to take an earthen pitcher, and to break it before the priests and elders of the people in the valley of Hinnom; whence he went up to the temple, where he confirmed all he had said. Pashur, captain of the temple, seized and confined him in a prison of the temple till the next day. He then told Pashur, that he, his sons, and his friends, should be carried into captivity.

Jehoiakim, king of Judah, having succeeded Shallum, Jeremiah informed him, that if he would be steadfast in fidelity to God, there should still be kings of Judah in his palace, with all the lustre of their dignity; but if he persevered in his irregularities, God would reduce that place to a wilderness. As Jehoiakim, instead of reforming, abandoned himself to cruelty and avarice, and to the raising of costly buildings, Jeremiah threatens him with a miserable death, deprived of the honours of burial. He also foretels against Coniah, the brother of Jehoiakim, that he should be delivered to the Chaldeans, and never should any prince of his family sit on the throne of Judah. (Jer. xxii. xxiii.)

About the same time, Jeremiah going up to the temple foretold its destruction. The priest, therefore, seized him, and declared that he deserved to die. The princes being come thither to judge him, Jeremiah undauntedly told them, that he had said nothing but by God's order: they dismissed him, and justified him by the example of the prophet Micah, who had foretold the same event under king Hezekiah, without suffering for it.

Before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah had prophesied against several people bordering on Judea; the Egyptians, Philistines, Tyrians, Phœnicians, Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, the inhabitants of Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, &c. (Jer. xli. xlvii. xlviii. xlix.) In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah foretold the captivity of the Jews, and its duration for seventy years, after which God would punish the Chaldeans and Babylonians in their turn. In this year also, he dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them before the people. The king cut the volume with a pen-knife, and threw it into the fire. Jeremiah received orders to dictate a second time to Baruch what was thus burnt, and God added many new things.

The countries of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Tyre, and Sidon, sent ambassadors to Zedekiah in the beginning of his reign. To each of these ambassadors Jeremiah gave a yoke to carry to their masters, with orders to tell them from God, that whoever should refuse to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, should be compelled to submission. The prophet said the same to Zedekiah. Calmet is of opinion, that in the reign of Zedekiah, Jeremiah received God's orders to go to some cavern near the Euphrates, and there hide a linen girdle. Some time after he returned to the same place, and found the girdle all rotten; prefiguring God's desertion of Judah, which he had before valued as a girdle. In the fourth year of the same prince, Seraiah, Baruch's brother, being sent to Babylon, Jeremiah gave him prophecies against Babylon, with directions to read them to the captive Jews, and afterwards fasten them to a stone, and throw them into the river Euphrates. (Jer. l. li.) Jeremiah wrote again to the same captives, by Gemariah, whom the king sent to Babylon, and advised them to settle in that country, to build houses, and marry there, because their captivity was to continue seventy years. Shemaiah, at Babylon, wrote to Zephaniah, one of the chief priests, and reproved him for permitting Jeremiah to write these things. Zephaniah read the letter to Jeremiah, who wrote again to the captives of Babylon, and foretold to Shemaiah, that he should die in captivity, and that neither he, nor any of his posterity, should see the deliverance of Judah.

Whilst Nebuchadnezzar was besieging Jerusalem, in the tenth year of Zedekiah, Jeremiah, who was continually prophesying calamities, was imprisoned in the court of the palace. Hanameel, son of Jeremiah's uncle, visited the prophet, and told him, that the right of redeeming such a field at Anathoth was his. Jeremiah bought the field, sealed the writings, and delivered the money for it. He committed the writings to Baruch, to keep them, because, added he, the time will come, when this land will be again cultivated and inhabited. After the siege was suspended, liberty was given to Jeremiah, to whom Zedekiah sent, and recommended himself to his prayers. The prophet informed the king, that Nebuchadnezzar would return against the city, which he would take and reduce to ashes. When Jeremiah was retiring to Anathoth, the place of his nativity, the guards seized him as a deserter, and the princes threw him into a dungeon, where his life was in great danger. Some time after, Zedekiah released him from this place, and ordered bread for him every day so long as there should be any in the city.

Nebuchadnezzar returning to the siege of Jerusalem, and this prophet continuing to foretell calamities, the great men of Jerusalem complained to Zedekiah, who permitted them to do what they pleased with Jeremiah. They let him down into a muddy well, where the prophet must soon have perished, if Ebedmelech had not informed the king, who commanded him to be drawn out: but he was kept in the court of the prison till the city was taken. Jeremiah, with other captives, was carried to Ramath; but as Nebuchadnezzar had charged Nebuzaradan, his general, to give Jeremiah his liberty, Nebuzaradan allowed the prophet his choice of going to Babylon, or staying in Judea. Jeremiah chose the latter, and went to Gedaliah at Mizpah. Here they lived in security, when Ishmael, son of Nathaniah, with ten men, murdered Gedaliah. Johanan having collected as many Jews as he could at Beth-lehem, they consulted Jeremiah, whether they should stay in Judea, or retire into Egypt. (Jer. xlii.) The prophet advised them to continue in Judea; but the principal of the people resolving to go into Egypt, compelled Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany them. Here this prophet uttered several predictions against the Jews and Egyptians; and he threatened the king of Egypt, that God would give him into the hands of the Chaldeans, as he had given Zedekiah. Some accounts state, that Jeremiah returned into his own country, where he died; but Jerome says, which seems more probable, that he was stoned to death at Talpesha, a royal city of Egypt, about 586 years before Christ.

The greater part of Jeremiah's predictions related to his countrymen, the Jews, many of whom lived to behold their literal fulfilment, and thus attested the truth of his prophetic mission, while several of his predictions concerned other nations. Yet, two or three of his prophecies clearly announce the Messiah. In chap. xxiii. 5, 6, the prophet foretells the future reign of Christ, the Son of David, who is called the LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. "The ancient rabbinical book of Ilkarim," says Dr. Hales, "well expresses the reason of the appellation:" 'the Scripture calls the name of the MESSIAH JAHOH, OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS, to intimate that he will be A MEDIATORIAL GOD, by whose hand we shall obtain justification from THE NAME: wherefore it calls him by THE NAME, that is, the ineffable name JAHOH, here put for GOD HIMSELF. See Buxtorf's Lexicon, voce יהוה. Hence, probably, Paul declares that 'Jesus Christ was born unto us WISDOM FROM GOD, and RIGHTEOUSNESS, and SANCTIFICATION, and REDEMPTION;' (1 Cor. i. 30.) and that 'God transcendently exalted him, and bestowed on him THE NAME ABOVE EVERY NAME, that at the name of JESUS, every knee should bow, of celestial, terrestrial, and infernal beings, and every tongue should confess that JESUS CHRIST IS LORD, to the glory of GOD THE FATHER.' (Phil. ii. 9—11.)

In chap. xxxi. 22. we have a distinct prediction of the miraculous conception of Jesus Christ. Professor Dahler, however, considers this simply as a proverbial expression; and the modern Jews, and a few Christian interpreters, particularly the late Dr. Blayney in his translation of Jeremiah, have denied the application of this prophecy to the Messiah; but the following remarks will show that this denial is not authorized. According to the first evangelical promise concerning the seed of the woman, followed this prediction of the prophet:—"The Lord hath created a new thing in the earth, a woman shall compass a man." (Jer. xxxi. 22.) The new creation of a man is therefore new, and therefore a creation, because wrought in a woman only, without a man, compassing a man. This interpretation is ancient, literal, and clear. The words import a miraculous conception: the ancient Jews acknowledged this sense, and applied it determinately to the Messiah. This prophecy is illustrated by that of Isaiah, vii. 14.

In chap. xxxi. 31—36. and xxxiii. 8. the efficacy of Christ's atonement, the spiritual character of the new covenant, and the inward efficacy of the Gospel, are most clearly and emphatically described. Compare St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. viii. 8—12. and x. 16, et seq.

The fifty-first chapter of Jeremiah concludes in this manner: 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah;' and hence it appears that the fifty-second, being the last chapter, was not written by that prophet. This chapter is supposed to have been compiled by Ezra, principally from the latter part of the second book of Kings, and from the thirty-ninth and fortieth chapters of the prophecies, as a proper introduction to the Lamentations. It is certain that the Lamentations of Jeremiah were formerly annexed to his prophecies, though they now form a separate book. Josephus and several others have referred them to the death of Josiah; but the more general opinion is, that they are applicable only to some period subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

The style of Jeremiah, though deficient neither in sublimity nor elegance, is considered as inferior in both respects to that of Isaiah. Jerome objects to him a certain rusticity of language, 'cujus equidem,' says Bishop Lowth, 'fateor nulla me deprehendisse vestigia.' The writings of Jeremiah are principally characterised by precision in his descriptions, and by a pathos calculated to awaken and interest the milder affections, but not admitting of that loftiness of sentiment, and dignity of expression, which we meet with in several of the prophets. At the same time, many of his invectives against the ingratitude and wickedness of his countrymen are delivered in an energetic strain of eloquence, and in his predictions he frequently rises to a very high degree of sublimity. His historical relations are written with great simplicity, and the events of which he was himself witness, are described with animation and force. JER'ICHO, יריחו, signifies the moon, or a month; otherwise, his smell; perhaps, prolonged odour; 'scented town.' Jericho was a city of Benjamin, about seven leagues from Jerusalem, and two from the Jordan. (Josh. xviii. 21.) Moses calls it the city of palm-trees, (Deut. xxxiv. 3.) because of palm-trees growing in the plain of Jericho. Josephus says, that in the territory of this city were not only many palm-trees, but also the balsam-tree. The valley of Jericho was watered by a rivulet which had been formerly salt and bitter, but was sweetened by the prophet Elisha. (2 Kings ii. 19.) Jericho was the first city in Canaan taken by Joshua. (Josh. ii. 1, 2, &c.) He sent thither spies, who were received by Rahab, lodged in her house, and preserved from the king of Jericho. Joshua received God's orders to besiege Jericho, soon after his passage over Jordan. (Josh. vi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) God commanded the Hebrews to march round the city once a day for seven days together. The soldiers marched first, (probably out of the reach of the enemies' arrows,) and after them the priests, the ark, &c. On the seventh day, they marched seven times round the city; and at the seventh, while the trumpets were sounding, and all the people shouting, the walls fell down. The Rabbins say, that the first day was our Sunday, and the seventh the sabbath-day. During the first six days, the people continued in profound silence; but on the seventh, Joshua commanded them to shout. Accordingly, they all exerted their voices, and the walls being overthrown, they entered the city, every man in the place opposite to him. Jericho being devoted by God, they set fire to the city, and consecrated all the gold, silver, and brass. Then Joshua said, Cursed be the man before the Lord, who shall rebuild Jericho. About 530 years after this, Hiel, of Bethel, undertook to rebuild it; but he lost his eldest son Abiram, at laying the foundations, and his youngest son Segub, when he hung up the gates.

However, we are not to imagine, that there was no city of Jericho till the time of Hiel. There was a city of palm-trees, probably the same as Jericho, under the Judges. (Judg. iii. 13.) David's ambassadors, who had been insulted by the Ammonites, resided at Jericho till their beards were grown. (2 Sam. x. 5.) There was, therefore, a city of Jericho, which stood in the neighbourhood of the original Jericho. These two places are distinguished by Josephus. After Hiel of Bethel had rebuilt old Jericho, no one scrupled to dwell there. Our Saviour wrought miracles at Jericho.

In the time of our Saviour, Jericho yielded only to Jerusalem in size and the magnificence of its buildings. It was situated in a bottom, in that vast plain which was named the great plain; and this marks the propriety of the expression of going down from Jerusalem. (Luke x. 30.) It is 150 furlongs, or about nineteen miles from the capital of Judæa. The country around Jericho was the most fertile part of Palestine, abounding in roses and palm-trees, whence it is called 'the city of palm-trees,' (Deut. xxxiv. 3.); and yielding also great quantities of the opobalsamum or balm of Gilead, so highly esteemed in oriental courts even to the present day; and which being an article of commerce, accounts for the mention of publicans and of a chief publican in that region. (Luke xix. 2.) Jericho was one of the cities appropriated for the residence of the priests and Levites, 12,000 of whom dwelt there; and as the way thither from Jerusalem was rocky, and desert, it was, as it still is, infested with thieves. A country more favourable for the attacks of banditti, and caves better adapted for concealment than those presented on this road, can scarcely be imagined. This circumstance marks the admirable propriety with which our Lord made it the scene of his beautiful parable of the good Samaritan. (Luke x. 30—37.)

'The whole of this road,' says Mr. Buckingham, 'from Jerusalem to the Jordan, is held to be the most dangerous about Palestine; and, indeed, in this portion of it, the very aspect of the scenery is sufficient, on the one hand, to tempt to robbery and murder, and, on the other, to occasion a dread of it in those who pass that way. It was partly to prevent any accident happening to us in this early stage of our journey; and partly, perhaps, to calm our fears on that score, that a messenger had been dispatched by our guides to an encampment of their tribe near, desiring them to send an escort to meet us at this place. We were met here, accordingly, by a band of about twenty persons on foot, all armed with matchlocks, and presenting the most ferocious and robber-like appearance that could be imagined. The effect of this was heightened by the shouts which they sent forth from hill to hill, and which were re-echoed through all the valleys, while the bold, projecting crags of rock, the dark shadows in which every thing lay buried below, the towering height of the cliffs above, and the forbidding desolation which every where reigned around, presented a picture that was quite in harmony through all its parts. It made us feel most forcibly the propriety of its being chosen as the scene of the delightful tale of compassion which we had before so often admired for its doctrine, independently of its local beauty. (Luke x. 30—34.) One must be amid these wild and gloomy solitudes, surrounded by an armed band, and feel the impatience of the traveller who rushes on to catch a new view at every pass and turn; one must be alarmed at the very tramp of the horses' hoofs rebounding through the caverned rocks, and at the savage shouts of the footmen, scarcely less loud than the echoing thunder produced by the discharge of their pieces in the valleys; one must witness all this upon the spot, before the full force and beauty of the admirable story of the good Samaritan can be perceived. Here, pillage, wounds, and death, would be accompanied with double terror, from the frightful aspect of every thing around. Here, the unfeeling act of passing by a fellow-creature in distress, as the Priest and Levite are said to have done, strikes one with horror, as an act almost more than inhuman. And here, too, the compassion of the good Samaritan is doubly virtuous, from the purity of the motive which must have led to it, in a spot where no eyes were fixed on him to draw forth the performance of any duty, and from the bravery which was necessary to admit of a man's exposing himself by such delay, to the risk of a similar fate to that from which he was endeavouring to rescue his fellow-creature.'

D'Arvieux thus describes the state of Jericho in his time, A.D. 1659. 'After having travelled a quarter of a league in the plain, we encamped near to the gardens of Jericho, by the side of a small brook; and, while our supper was preparing, we walked in the gardens, and among the ruins of Jericho. This very ancient city is now desolate, and consists of only about fifty poor houses, in bad condition, wherein the labourers who cultivate the gardens shelter themselves. The plain around is extremely fertile; the soil is middling fat; but it is watered by several rivulets, which flow into the Jordan. Notwithstanding these advantages, only the gardens adjacent to the town are cultivated. We saw here abundance of those trees which are called in Arabic Zacoun; they are furnished with thorns like Acacias, and resemble bushes. They bear fruits the size of large plums, the stone of which resembles a rough-sided melon. These are pounded, and the kernel yields an oil, which is a kind of balsam, perfectly good against bruises, cold humours, nervous contractions, and rheumatisms. We visited the fountain of the prophet Elisha, which for many ages has furnished water for the gardens; it was formerly bitter, but was healed by that prophet. The head of this water is enclosed in a basin of a triangular shape, of which each side is about three fathoms in length. It is lined with wrought stone, and is even paved in parts. There are two niches in one of its sides, which is higher than the others, and an orifice by which the water issues in a stream sufficient to turn a mill. It is said, that several sources discharge themselves into the same basin; but their depth prevents them from being explored.'

'The brook of Elisha,' says Dr. Shaw, 'which flows from the mountains of Quarantania, and waters the gardens of Jericho, together with its plantations of plum-trees (the Zaccoun), and date-trees, hath its banks adorned with several species of brook lime, lysimaquia, water-cresses, betony, and other aquatic plants: all of them very like those that are the produce of England. And, indeed, the whole scene of vegetables, and of the soil which supports them, hath not those particular differences and varieties, that we might expect in two such distant climates.'

At present Jericho is a wretched village, consisting of about thirty miserable cottages. The once celebrated 'City of Palms' cannot now boast of one of those beautiful trees in its vicinity. The plain that surrounds it (through which the Jordan flows) is watered by a beautiful fountain: it has ever been venerated as the same which the prophet Elisha healed; (2 Kings ii. 19—22.) the water of which was 'naught (or bitter) and the ground barren.' Carne's Letters, pp. 322, 323; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 592, 593; Shaw's Travels p. 369, fol. edit.; Sacred Geography; Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. ii. pp. 55—57, octavo edition of 1822.

JEROBO'AM, ירבעם, signifies he that rejects or opposes the people; or cause, or dispute of the people; otherwise, that multiplies the people.

JEROBOAM, son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, is often characterized in Scripture as the author of the schism and idolatry of the ten tribes. He was the son of Nebat, and of a widow named Zeruah, and was born at Zereda in Ephraim. Jeroboam was bold and enterprising; and Solomon gave him a commission to levy the taxes of Ephraim and Manasseh. As Jeroboam was going alone one day out of Jerusalem into the country, he was met by the prophet Ahijah wearing a new cloak. (1 Kings xi. 29.) Only these two were in the field. Ahijah rent his cloak in twelve pieces, and said to Jeroboam, Take ten to thyself; for the Lord will rend the kingdom of Solomon, and give ten tribes to thee. Jeroboam, who was already disaffected, began to excite the people to revolt; but Solomon being informed of his designs, Jeroboam fled into Egypt, where he continued till the death of Solomon. Rehoboam, who succeeded, behaved in a haughty and menacing manner, and ten of the tribes separated from the house of David. Jeroboam returning from Egypt, these ten tribes invited him among them to a general assembly, in which they appointed him king over Israel. He fixed his residence at Shechem.

Jeroboam, forgetting the fidelity due to God, who had given him the kingdom, resolved to make two golden calves, in imitation, probably, of the god Apis, and to place one at Dan, and the other at Bethel. Henceforth, said he to the people, go no more to Jerusalem. He appointed a solemn feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month, to dedicate his new altar, and consecrate his golden calves; and he himself went up to the altar to offer incense and sacrifices. (1 Kings xiii.) At that time, a man of God (generally believed to be the prophet Iddo) came from Judah to Bethel by divine direction; and seeing Jeroboam at the altar, he cried, 'O altar, altar, thus saith the Lord, a child shall be born unto the house of David, by name Josiah, and upon thee shall he sacrifice the priests of the high-places, who now burn incense upon thee: he shall burn men's bones upon thee.' The king, who was standing by the altar, stretched out his hand, and commanded the prophet to be seized; but the hand which he stretched out became withered, and he could not draw it back. Immediately, the altar was broken; and the fire, with the ashes which were upon it, fell on the ground. Then the king said to him, Offer up thy prayers to God, that he may restore to me the use of my hand. The man of God besought the Lord, and the king's hand was restored. An event so extraordinary did not recover Jeroboam from his impiety. This was the sin of Jeroboam's family, and the cause of its extirpation. He died after a reign of twenty-two years, and was succeeded by his son, Nadab.

It is evident that the worship of the golden calves was not considered by the sacred writers and by the prophets as an absolute pagan idolatry. The worship offered before these images is supposed to have been in imitation of the ceremonies of the Mosaic law. See CALVES, GOLDEN.

On the subject of the withered hand of Jeroboam, 'it seems that we ought not to understand this drying up, of an actual dsecication of the arm, as if all its vital fluids had ceased to circulate in it; as if it retained no vital powers; but rather a rheumatic or paralytic affection, which suspended the powers of motion for a time. The palsy requires a long perseverance in remedies nervous, cephalic, and discussive; unctions, lotions, frictions, fomentations, and bathings.' The instantaneous cure, therefore, of this rash king is no less wonderful than his instantaneous affliction. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 109; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 345.

JEROBOAM the Second, king of Israel, was son of Jehoash, and succeeded his father in the year of the world 3179. He reigned forty-one years. He walked in the evil ways of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. (2 Kings xiv. 23.) Yet, he restored the kingdom of Israel to its splendour, from which it had fallen under his predecessors; he reconquered those provinces and cities which the kings of Syria had usurped; and he extended his authority over all the countries on the other side Jordan, to the Dead Sea.

Under Jeroboam II. the prophets Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, prophesied. It is evident from their writings, that in his reign, idleness, effeminacy, magnificence, and injustice, polluted Israel; that the licentiousness of the people with regard to religion was extreme; that they frequented not only Dan and Bethel, the golden calves, but Mizpah in Gilead, Beersheba, Tabor, Carmel, Gilgal, and almost all the high-places in Israel, and wherever God had, at any time, appeared to the patriarchs. They did not always worship the idols there; but they exposed themselves to disorders, by frequenting assemblies of so much hilarity, gaiety, and pleasure.

JERUSALEM, ירושלים, Ἱεροσόλυμα, signifies the vision of peace, or perfect, or consummate vision; otherwise, perfect or consummate fear. Jerusalem, anciently denominated Jebus, or Salem, is by some called Solyma, or Hierosolyma, and by the Hebrews Jeruschalaim, or Jerschelem, the vision of peace, or the possession, or inheritance of peace. Joshua gave it to the tribe of Benjamin. (Josh. xviii. 28.) He took and slew the king of Jerusalem in the famous battle of Gibeon: yet it appears from other passages, that the Jebusites continued to hold it till the time of David; (2 Sam. v.) and it is expressly said, that the children of Benjamin did not drive the Jebusites out of Jerusalem. (Judg. i. 21.)

As Jerusalem was situated on the frontiers of the two tribes of Benjamin and Judah, it sometimes formed a part of one, and sometimes of the other. By Joshua's division, Benjamin had most right to it; and Judah, who had twice subdued it, first under the Judges, and afterwards under David, might claim it by right of conquest. After the Lord had declared his choice of Jerusalem for the place of his habitation and temple, it was considered as the metropolis of the Jewish nation, as belonging to all Israel in common, and not properly either to Benjamin or Judah.

The city of Jerusalem was built upon hills, and was encompassed with mountains. (Psalm cxxv. 2.) It was situated in a stony and barren soil, and, according to Strabo, was sixty furlongs in length. Adjacent to Jerusalem were the fountains of Gihon and Siloam, and the brook Kidron; and also the waters of Ethan, which Pilate conveyed through aqueducts into the city. The ancient city Jebus, which David took from the Jebusites, was not large. It was situated upon a mountain, south of the place where the temple afterwards stood. The opposite mountain, on the north, is Sion, where David built a new city, which he called the city of David, and in which was the royal palace. Between these mountains lay the valley of Millo, which separated the ancient Jebus from the city of David, but which David and Solomon filled up to join the cities. (1 Kings ix. 15. 24.; xi. 27.) After the reign of Manasseh, a new city is mentioned, called the Second, and enclosed with walls by that prince (2 Chron. xxiv. 22.; xxxiii. 14.; 2 Kings xxii. 24.) The Maccabees considerably enlarged Jerusalem on the north, by enclosing a third hill, as part of the city. Josephus speaks of a fourth hill called Bezetha, which Agrippa joined to Jerusalem. This new city lay north of the temple, along the brook Kidron. Hence it appears, that Jerusalem had never been so large as when attacked by the Romans. It was then thirty-three furlongs in circumference, or nearly four miles and a half. Josephus says, that the wall of circumvallation, which Titus made, was thirty-nine furlongs, or four miles and eight hundred and seventy-five paces. Others admit a much larger extent.

'This city,' says D'Arvieux, 'is situated on the summit of one of the highest mountains of Judea. In truth, every way to it is a perpetual ascent, and from it a perpetual descent. The lands around it are all bare, and are merely dry, arid rocks, white as chalk, except on the side next to Bethlehem, which is more agreeable and fertile. The present walls are tolerably good, they were built by Soliman: they are about six feet thick, and about 4,500 paces in circumference, with a dry ditch, from the gate of Damascus to that of Bethlehem, where the castle stands. The city has seven gates, without drawbridges. The castle was built by the Pisans. It serves as a citadel to the city; its walls and towers are good and well terraced, with large and deep ditches. On mount Sion was formerly the palace of David, of which some vestiges still remain. A magnificent church was built on this site, with a convent; but these have been seized by the Turks. On the mountain of offence, where Solomon is supposed to have sacrificed to idols, is now a poor paltry village, inhabited by Jews, called Gehennam, that is to say, hell. The houses are mostly hollowed in the rock, which is soft like a tufa. The Bethlehem gate leads to Emmaus. On this, the northern side of the city, are hills of ruins on all sides; and not far off is the fountain Gihon, where Solomon was proclaimed king.'

Dr. Wittman observes, that at the distance of about twenty-five miles from Jerusalem, towards Rama, the territory becomes rocky and mountainous, and the road almost impenetrable. To the gates of Jerusalem the land exhibited the same rocky and barren appearance. The city itself stands on an elevated rocky ground, capable of yielding but little produce; in the vicinity, however, we saw several spots, which the inhabitants had with great industry fertilized, by clearing away the stones with which they had banked up the soil, to prevent it from being washed away, and by resorting to every other expedient which could suggest itself. The soil, which is a reddish clay, wherever it is of any depth, is essentially of a good quality; consequently, their labours had been rewarded, in these partial and chosen spots, by an abundant produce of fruits, corn, and vegetables. The grapes were uncommonly fine and large. At the season of vintage the vineyards must have had a pleasing aspect in this land of rocks and mountains.

The circumference of Jerusalem does not now exceed four miles. The walls and habitations are in good repair. The walls have several small square towers. Near the entrance gate is a castle, denominated David's tower, of which the stones in the lower part are massive, and apparently of great antiquity.

It is a general opinion, that Melchizedek was king of Jerusalem. Some, however, think that the Salem of Melchizedek was a village near Scythopolis, where Jerome says the ruins of that prince's palace were visible in his time. (Gen. xiv. 18.) In the reign of Rehoboam, Jerusalem was taken and pillaged by Shishak, king of Egypt, (1 Kings xiv. 26, 27.) Some time after, Amaziah, king of Israel, took Jerusalem, carried away all the treasures of the temple and the royal palace, and demolished 400 cubits of the city walls, (2 Kings xiv. 13, 2 Chron. xxv. 23.) Necho, king of Egypt, returning from his expedition against Carchemish on the Euphrates, entered Jerusalem; but we do not read, that he pillaged either the city or the temple. Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, besieged Jerusalem, and subjected it to the Chaldeans. (2 Kings xxiv. &c.) The same prince again besieged and took it twice in the reign of Jehoiakim; and, lastly, he captured the city a fourth time, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah. After the captivity of Babylon, Jerusalem was rebuilt and repopled. Alexander the Great, after he had taken Tyre, entered it; and after the death of that prince, Jerusalem remained under the kings of Egypt. According to Josephus, Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, took it by stratagem. Antiochus Epiphanes besieged the city, pillaged it and the temple, and killed 80,000 men, (1 Macc. i. 21. 2 Macc. v.) Two years after, Antiochus sent to Jerusalem Apollonius, who fell suddenly on the city, made a great slaughter, got a rich booty, and burnt most of the houses. Jerusalem was thus forsaken by its own inhabitants, and left to the Gentiles. This city was next besieged and taken by Pompey, who on this occasion acted with great moderation. It was afterwards captured by Sosius. Titus besieged Jerusalem, burned it, and reduced it to a wilderness, in the year of Christ 70.

From the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans to the present time, that city has remained, for the most part, in a state of ruin and desolation; and it has never been under the government of the Jews themselves, but oppressed and broken down by a succession of foreign masters—the Romans, the Saracens, the Franks, the Mamelukes, and last by the Turks, to whom it is still subject. It is not, therefore, only in the history of Josephus, and in other ancient writers, that we are to look for the accomplishment of our Lord's predictions: we see them verified at this moment before our eyes, in the desolate state of the once celebrated city and temple of Jerusalem, and in the present condition of the Jewish people, not collected together into any one country, into one political society, under one form of government, but dispersed into every region of the globe, and every where treated with contumely and scorn.'

The following is the description given by our celebrated countryman, the late Dr. E. D. Clarke, of the city of Jerusalem:—On first obtaining a view of the Holy City, he observes, 'we had not been prepared for the grandeur of the spectacle which the city alone exhibited. Instead of a wretched and ruined town, by some described as the desolated remnant of Jerusalem, we beheld, as it were, a flourishing and stately metropolis; presenting a magnificent assemblage of domes, towers, palaces, churches, and monasteries; all of which, glittering in the sun's rays, shone with inconceivable splendour. As we drew nearer, our whole attention was engrossed by its noble and interesting appearance. The lofty hills surrounding it gave to the city itself an appearance of elevation less than it really has.

'If Mount Calvary have sunk beneath the overwhelming influence of superstition, studiously endeavouring, during so many ages, to modify and to disfigure it; if the situation of Mount Sion yet remain to be ascertained; the Mount of Olives, undisguised by fanatical labours, exhibits the appearance it presented in all the periods of its history. From its elevated summit all the principal features of the city may be discerned; and the changes that eighteen centuries have wrought in its topography may, perhaps, be ascertained. The features of Nature continue the same, although works of art have been done away: the beautiful gate of the Temple is no more; but Siloa's fountain haply flows, and Kidron sometimes murmurs in the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

'Leaving the mountain, where all the sepulchres of the kings of Judah are hewn, and regaining the road which conducts towards the east, into the Valley of Jehoshaphat, we passed the fountain of Siloa; from hence we ascended to the summit of the Mount of Olives; passing in our way a number of Hebrew tombs. Here indeed we stood upon holy ground; and it is a question, which might reasonably be proposed to Jew, to Christian, or Mahometan, whether, in reference to the history of their respective nations, it be possible to attain a more interesting place of observation. So commanding is the view of Jerusalem afforded in this situation, that the eye roams over all the streets, and around the walls, as if in the survey of a plan, or model of the city. The most conspicuous object is the Mosque, erected upon the site and foundations of the Temple of Solomon: this edifice may perhaps be regarded as the first specimen of the architecture among the Saracens which exists in the world. A spectator, standing upon the Mount of Olives, and looking down upon the space enclosed by the walls of Jerusalem, in the present state, as they have remained since their restoration in the sixteenth century—must be convinced that instead of covering two conspicuous hills, Jerusalem now only occupies one eminence, namely that of Mount Moriah, where, of old, the temple stood, and where, like a Phoenix, that hath arisen from the ashes of its parent, the famous mosque of Omar is now situated. It is probable that the whole of Mount Sion has been excluded, and that the mountain covered by ruined edifices, whose base is perforated by ancient sepulchres, and separated from Mount Moriah by a deep trench, which Josephus calls Tyropæon, extending as far as the fountain Siloa towards the eastern valley, is, in fact, that eminence which was once surrounded by the 'bulwarks, towers, and regal buildings of the house of David.' There seems to be no other way of reconciling the accounts which ancient authors give of the space occupied by the former city.—That the summit of this mountain was formerly included within the walls of the ancient city, seems forcibly demonstrated by the remains, which to this hour are upon it, both of walls and sumptuous edifices. In this view of the subject, the topography of the city seems more reconcilable with ancient documents. The present church of the holy sepulchre, and all the trumpery attached to it, will, it is true, be thrown into the back ground; but the sepulchres of the kings of Judah, so long an object of research, do then become a prominent object in the place; the possible site of our Saviour's tomb may be denoted, and

—Siloa's brook, that flowed

Fast by the oracle of God, will continue in the situation assigned for it, by Christian writers of every sect and denomination, since the age of the Apostles, and earliest fathers of the Church.

'As we descended from the mountain, we visited an olive ground, always mentioned as the Hortus Oliveti, or garden of Gethsemane. This place is not, without reason, shewn as the scene of our Saviour's agony, the night before his crucifixion, both from the circumstance of the name it still retains, and its situation with regard to the city.—We found a grove of aged olive trees, of most immense size, covered with fruit, almost ripe. It is a curious and interesting fact, that during a period of little more than two thousand years, Hebrews, Assyrians, Romans, Mahometans, and Christians, have been successively in possession of the rocky mountain of Palestine; yet the olive still vindicates its paternal soil, and is found at this day upon the same spot, which was called by the Hebrew writers, Mount Olivet, and the Mount of Olives, eleven hundred years before the Christian era.

‘Proceeding toward the south, along the eastern side of the valley, between the Mount of Olives and Mount Moriah, towards the bridge over the Kidron, across which Christ is said to have passed in his visits to the garden of Gethsemane, we came to “the sepulchres of the Patriarchs,” facing that part of Jerusalem where Solomon’s temple formerly stood. The antiquities which particularly bear this name are four in number. According to the order in which they occur from north to south, they are severally called, the sepulchres of Jehoshaphat, of Absalom, the cave of St. James, and the sepulchre of Zechariah. From the difficulty of conveying any able artist to Jerusalem, and the utter impossibility of finding any of the profession there, these monuments have never been faithfully delineated. The wretched representations given of them in books of travels convey no adequate idea of the appearance they exhibit. There is a certain air of sublimity, expressed by their massy structure, by the boldness of their design, and by the sombre hue prevailing, not only over the monuments themselves, but over all the surrounding rocks, whence they are hewn, which is lost in the minuteness of the engraved representations. To form the sepulchres of Absalom, and Zechariah, the solid substance of the mountain has been cut away; sufficient areas being thereby excavated, two monuments of a prodigious size appear in the midst, each seeming to consist of a single stone, although standing as if erected by an architect, and adorned with columns which appear to support the edifice, but of which they, in fact, form an integral part—the whole of each mausoleum being of one entire block of stone.—It has never yet been determined, when these sepulchres were hewn, nor by what people. They are a continuation of one vast cemetery extending along the base of all the mountainous elevations which surround Jerusalem upon its southern and eastern sides; and their appearance alone, independently of every other consideration, denotes the former existence of a numerous, flourishing, and powerful people. ‘The sepulchre of Jehoshaphat,’ and the ‘cave of St. James,’ are smaller works of the same nature with the monuments ascribed to Absalom and Zechariah. They all contain apartments and receptacles for the dead, hewn after the same surprising manner. A very extraordinary circumstance concerning the two principal sepulchres is, that, at present, there is no perceptible entrance to the interior. The only way of gaining admittance to that of Absalom, is through a hole recently broken for that purpose; and to that of Zechariah, although the Jews pretend to a secret knowledge of some such opening, there is no entrance of any kind. After viewing these monuments, having now examined all the antiquities to the south and east of Jerusalem, we crossed the bed of the brook Kidron, by the bridge before mentioned: then ascending to the city by a very steep hill, on which tradition relates that Stephen, the martyr, was stoned, we made the circuit of the walls upon the northern and western sides, but, finding nothing remarkable, we entered by the gate of Jaffa.

‘On the following morning, July 11, we left Jerusalem by the gate of Damascus, on the north-west side, to view the extraordinary burial-place, erroneously called, “the sepulchres of the kings of Judah,” about a mile distant from the walls. This place does not exhibit a single sepulchral chamber, as in the instances so lately described, but a series of subterraneous chambers, extending in different directions, so as to form a kind of labyrinth, somewhat resembling that in Egypt, known by the name of the “sepulchres of the Ptolemies.” Each chamber contains a certain number of receptacles for dead bodies, not being much larger than our coffins. The taste manifested in the interior of these chambers seems also to denote a later period in the history of the arts; the skill and neatness visible in the carving is admirable, and there is much of ornament displayed in several parts of the work. We also observed slabs of marble, exquisitely sculptured, such as we had not seen in the burial places before mentioned. The entrance is by an open court excavated like a quarry, and forming a square of thirty yards. We lighted some wax tapers, and descended into the first chamber; in the sides of which were some square openings, like door frames, offering passages to yet interior chambers. In one of these we found the appearance of a white marble coffin, entirely covered with the richest and most beautiful sculpture; but, like all the other sculptured work about the place, it represented nothing of the human figure, nor of any animal, but consisted entirely of foliage and flowers, chiefly of the leaves and branches of the vine.

‘As to the history of this most princely place of burial, we shall find it difficult to obtain much information. That it was not what its name implies, is very evident; because the sepulchres of the kings of Judah were in Mount Sion. The most probable opinion is maintained by Pococke, who considered it as the sepulchre of Helen, queen of Adiabene. Chateaubriand has since adopted Pococke’s opinion.’ Clarke’s Travels, vol. iv. pp. 289—379; Dr. Wittman’s Travels, p. 156; Sacred Geography.

JESUITS, a famous religious order of the Romish church, founded in 1540, under the name of the Society of Jesus, by Ignatius Loyola, a Spanish gentleman of illustrious rank. The plan, which this fanatic formed of its constitution and laws was suggested, as he gave out, by the immediate inspiration of Heaven. But, notwithstanding this high pretension, his design met at first with violent opposition. The Pope, to whom Loyola had applied for the sanction of his authority to confirm the institution, referred his petition to a committee of cardinals. They represented the establishment to be unnecessary as well as dangerous, and Paul refused to grant his approbation. At last, Loyola removed all his scruples, by an offer which it was impossible for any pope to resist. He proposed, that besides the three vows of poverty, of chastity, and of monastic obedience, which are common to all the orders of regulars, the members of his society should take a fourth vow of obedience to the Pope, binding themselves to go whithersoever he should command, for the service of religion, and without requiring any thing from the Holy See for their support. At a time when the papal authority had received such a shock by the revolt of so many nations from the Romish Church; at a time when every part of the popish system was attacked with so much violence and success; the acquisition of a body of men, thus peculiarly devoted to the see of Rome, and whom it might set in opposition to all its enemies, was an object of the highest consequence. Paul instantly perceiving this, confirmed the institution of the Jesuits by his bull; granted the most ample privileges to the members of the society; and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the order.

The primary object of almost all the monastic orders is to separate men from the world, and from any concern in its affairs. In the solitude and silence of the cloister, the monk is called to work out his own salvation by extraordinary acts of mortification and piety. He is dead to the world, and ought not to mingle in its transactions. He can be of no benefit to mankind, but by his example and prayers. On the contrary, the Jesuits were taught to consider themselves as formed for action. They were chosen soldiers, bound to exert themselves continually in the service of God, and of the pope, his vicar upon earth. That they might have full leisure for this active service, they were totally exempted from those functions, the performance of which is the chief business of other monks. They appeared in no processions; they practised no rigorous austerities; they did not consume one half of their time in the repetition of tedious offices. But they were required to attend to all the transactions of the world, on account of the influence which these may have upon religion; they were directed to study the dispositions of persons in high rank, and to cultivate their friendship; and by the very constitution, as well as genius of the order, a spirit of action and intrigue was infused into all its members.

Other orders are to be considered as voluntary associations, in which whatever affects the whole body is regulated by the common suffrage of all its members. In this, a general, chosen for life by deputies from the several provinces, possessed power that was supreme and independent, extending to every person and to every case. He, by his sole authority, nominated provincials, rectors, and every other officer employed in the government of the society, and could remove them at pleasure. In him was vested the sovereign administration of the revenues and funds of the order. Every member belonging to it was at his disposal; and by his uncontrollable mandate he could impose on them any task, or employ them in any service. To his commands they were required not only to yield outward obedience, but to resign to him the inclinations of their wills, and the sentiments of their minds. There is not in the annals of mankind any example of such absolute despotism, exercised not over monks confined in the cells of a convent, but over men dispersed among all the nations of the earth. As the constitutions of the order vested in the general such absolute dominion over all its members, they carefully provided for his being perfectly informed with respect to the character and abilities of his subjects. Every novice, who offered himself as a candidate for entering into the order, was obliged to manifest his conscience to the superior, or to a person appointed by him; and in doing this he was required to confess not only his sins and defects, but to discover the inclinations, the passions, and the bent of his soul. This manifestation was to be renewed every six months. The society, not satisfied with penetrating in this manner into the innermost recesses of the heart, directed each member to observe the words and actions of the novices; and he was bound to disclose every thing of importance concerning them to the superior. In order that this scrutiny into their character might be as complete as possible, a long novitiate was to expire, during which they passed through the several gradations of ranks in the society, and they must have attained the full age of thirty-three years, before they could be admitted to take the final vows, by which they became professed members. In order that the general, who was the soul that animated and moved the whole society, might have under his eye every thing necessary to inform or direct him, the provincials and heads of the several houses were obliged to transmit to him regular and frequent reports concerning the members under their inspection. In these they descended into minute details with respect to the character of each person, his abilities natural or acquired, his temper, his experience in affairs, and the particular department for which he was best fitted. These reports, when digested and arranged, were entered into registers kept on purpose, that the general might, at one comprehensive view, survey the state of the society in every corner of the earth; observe the qualifications and talents of its members; and thus choose, with perfect information, the instruments which his absolute power could employ in any service for which he thought proper to destine them.

Unhappily for mankind, the vast influence which the order of Jesuits acquired, was often exerted with the most pernicious effect. Such was the tendency of that discipline observed by the society in forming its members, and such the fundamental maxims in its constitution, that every Jesuit was taught to regard the interest of the society as the capital object, to which every consideration was to be sacrificed. This spirit of attachment to their order, the most ardent, perhaps, that ever influenced any body of men, is the characteristic principle of the Jesuits, and serves as a key to the genius of their policy, as well as to the peculiarities in their sentiments and conduct. The active genius of this order which penetrated the remotest countries of Asia, at a very early period of the seventeenth century, directed their attention to the extensive continent of America, as a proper object of their missions. Conducted by their leader, St. Francis Xavier, they formed a considerable settlement in the province of Paraguay, and made a rapid progress in instructing the Indians in arts, religion, and the more simple manufactures, and accustoming them to the blessings of security and order. A few Jesuits presided over many thousand Indians: they soon, however, altered their views, and directed them altogether to the increase of the opulence and power of their order. Immense quantities of gold were annually transmitted to Europe; and in the design of securing to themselves an independent empire in these regions, they industriously cut off all communication with both the Spaniards and Portuguese in the adjacent provinces, and inspired the Indians with the most determined detestation to those nations. Such was the state of affairs when, in the year 1750, a treaty was concluded between the courts of Lisbon and Madrid, which ascertained the limits of their respective dominions, in South America. Such a treaty was death to the projects of the Jesuits, and the consequence was a violent contest between the united forces of the two European powers, and the Indians of Paraguay incited by the Jesuits. The crafty and vindictive marquis of Pom-bal, who had raised himself from performing the duties of a common soldier, in the character of a cadet, to be absolute minister of the kingdom of Portugal, could not easily forgive this refractory conduct; and, perhaps, he might apprehend the downfall of his own authority, unless some decisive check were given to the growing influence of this dangerous society. In the beginning of the year 1759, therefore, the Jesuits of all descriptions were banished the kingdom of Portugal, on the plea that certain of their order were concerned in the attempt upon the life of the king in September 1758, and their effects were confiscated.

The disgrace of the Jesuits in France proceeded from different and more remote causes. By their influence the bull Unigenitus, which condemned so strongly the principles of the Jansenists, was generally supposed to have been obtained. The Jesuits, who omitted no opportunity of enriching their treasury, engaged largely in trade, particularly with the island of Martinico. But certain losses falling heavily upon them, the Jesuit, who was the ostensible person in the transactions, affected to become a bankrupt, and to shift the payment of the debts he had incurred from the collective body. As a monk, it was evident he could possess no distinct property; and he had been always considered as an agent for the society. The affair was, therefore, litigated before the parliament of Paris, who were not too favourably disposed to the holy fathers. In the course of the proceedings, it was necessary to produce the institute or rules of their order, which were found to contain maxims subversive equally of morals and of government; and other political motives concurring at the same time, the order was abolished in France by a royal edict, in the year 1762, and their colleges and possessions were alienated and sold. Pope Ganganelli, on the 21st of July, 1773, signed a brief for the final suppression of the Jesuits.

Of late years, however, the Jesuits have made great exertions to re-possession themselves of their former power, and have again established their order in several nations of Europe. The supreme authority in the church of Rome, during the pontificate of the late pope Pius VII., and about the year 1819, re-established this order, and, in the bull of re-establishment, bestowed upon it the highest commendations. In that bull, the Jesuits are termed by the pope, 'the vigorous rowers, who were necessary to the labouring ship of the church;' and to them, it appears, that the direction of the vessel is at present principally entrusted by the church of Rome.

In this country, by a late act of parliament, every Jesuit, and every member of every other religious order, community, or society, of the church of Rome, is required to deliver a notice or statement of his name, age, place of birth, denomination of the order to which he belongs, &c. to the clerk of the peace of the county or place where the party resides; and if any Jesuit or member of such religious order shall come into this realm (unless licensed so to do by one of the principal secretaries of state,) he is liable to be banished for the term of his natural life. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 280. 519.

JE'SUS, יהושע, Ἰησοῦς, signifies saviour. JESUS CHRIST, the Son of God, the Messiah, and Saviour of the world, the first and principal object of the prophecies, who was prefigured and promised in the Old Testament, was expected and desired by the patriarchs; the hope and salvation of the Gentiles; the glory, happiness, and consolation of Christians. The name Jesus, or as the Hebrews pronounce it, יהושע, Jehoshua, or Joshua, Ἰησοῦς, signifies he who shall save. No one ever bore this name with so much justice, nor so perfectly fulfilled its signification as Jesus Christ, who saves from sin and hell, and hath merited heaven for us by the price of his blood.

The angel Gabriel had six months before declared to Zacharias the future birth of his son, John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Messiah, when God sent the same angel to Nazareth, a city of Galilee, to the Virgin Mary, who was espoused to Joseph, of the tribe of Judah, and family of David. (Luke i. 28.) Gabriel announced to her the operations of the Holy Spirit within her; and gave her, as a sign of his veracity, information of the conception of her ancient cousin Elizabeth, whom Mary went immediately to visit.

About nine months after this, an edict of the emperor Augustus enjoined all persons in Judea to be registered in the place of their birth, or whence they derived their descent. (Luke ii. 1, &c.) Joseph, who was of the tribe of Judah, and family of David, went with Mary, his espoused wife, to Bethlehem. Whilst they were there, Mary was delivered of a son, whom she had placed in a manger belonging to the stable where they were obliged to lodge, there being no room in the inn or caravansera of the town. The night of his birth, our Saviour was visited by shepherds, who were informed of that circumstance by an angelic host.

On the eighth day, at his circumcision, he was called Jesus. Some time after, certain wise men came from the east to Jerusalem, seeking the new-born king of the Jews, and saying that his birth had been signified to them by a star. At this inquiry the whole city was moved; and Herod, who was then at Jericho under cure for the disease of which he died, being informed of this inquiry, sent for the priests, and asked them where Christ should be born? They answered, at Bethlehem. Then inquiring diligently at what time the star appeared to the wise men, he bid them go and find out the new king, and as soon as they had seen him, come and inform him, that he also might worship him. The star conducted them to Bethlehem, and here it stayed over the place where the child was. They worshipped Jesus, and, according to eastern custom, presented him with gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Being divinely warned in a dream of Herod's evil disposition, they returned by another way into their own country.

Forty days after the birth of Jesus, the time of Mary's purification being come, she went to the temple of Jerusalem, to present her first-born son, and to offer those sacrifices which the law prescribed after lying-in. (Luke ii. 22, &c.) On this occasion, Simeon and Anna, two devout and aged inhabitants of Jerusalem, were supernaturally directed to go into the temple; and seeing the child Jesus, they declared, in the spirit of prophecy, that he was the promised Messiah. After this, Joseph and Mary prepared to return to Nazareth; but an angel warned Joseph in a dream to flee into Egypt. Herod understanding that the wise men were returned, and fearing this new-born king might deprive him of his crown, sent orders to slay all the male children under two years old in Bethlehem and its confines. Herod died soon after, and was succeeded by his son, Archelaus. Joseph returned into Judea; but when he understood that Archelaus reigned there, he chose rather to go to Nazareth in Galilee, out of the dominion of Archelaus. Here Jesus Christ dwelt, subject to Joseph and Mary, and working at the trade of his father, who was, as is generally believed, a carpenter, till the thirtieth year of the vulgar æra, which was the thirty-third year of his age.

At the age of twelve years, Jesus accompanied his parents to Jerusalem, to celebrate the passover. (Luke ii. 42—52.) Joseph and Mary returning to Nazareth, and believing Jesus to be in the company, went a day's journey without suspecting his absence. In the evening, however, they sought him in vain. They went back the next day to Jerusalem, where they found him in the temple, sitting among the doctors, asking them questions, and hearing them.

After a long interval, of which we have no authentic account, John the Baptist, son of Zacharias, having lived to the age of thirty-two in the wilderness, came into the country about Jordan, preaching repentance, and proclaiming that the so long expected Messiah was then present among the Israelites. (Matt. iii. 13, &c.; Luke iii. 1—22.) As multitudes resorted to John to be baptized, Jesus also went to him. John, urging his own inferiority, at first refused; but when Jesus represented the necessity of his being baptized by him, he complied. Immediately after the baptism of Jesus, 'the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased: and Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age.' (Matt. iii. 16, 17. Luke iii. 21, &c.) After this, Jesus was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil, all whose temptations he piously withstood. (Matt. iv. Luke iv.)

Some time after, when John was baptizing at Bethabara beyond Jordan, Jesus passed that way in his return from Galilee. John, seeing him, said to two of his disciples, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world!' These two disciples went with Jesus to the place where he abode, and continued with him all that day. Towards evening, Andrew having found his brother Simon, brought him to Jesus, who said, Thou art Simon, son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas, that is, a stone or rock—Peter. The next day, Jesus departed for Nazareth, accompanied by Andrew, Peter, and that other disciple, who first went with Andrew to visit Jesus, and whom some think to be Bartholomew, or James, son of Zebedee, but others, with greater probability, John the Evangelist. On the way, Jesus met Philip, who followed him. Philip, meeting with Nathanael, told him, that they had found the Messiah in Jesus of Nazareth. Nathanael answered, 'Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?' Philip replied, 'Come and see.' Jesus saw Nathanael coming to him, and said, Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile! Nathanael answered him, Whence knowest thou me? Jesus replied, Before Philip called thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree. Then Nathanael answered him, 'Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the king of Israel,' thus evincing his firm belief that Jesus was the Messiah.

Jesus returned from Bethabara to Galilee, and on the third day after, he wrought his first public miracle at Cana, on the confines of Tyre, where, at a wedding, to which he and his disciples were invited, he changed water into wine. (John ii. 1—12.) Thence he went to Capernaum, where he continued some days with his mother and his disciples, because he proposed to celebrate the passover at Jerusalem.

Being come into the temple, (John ii. 13—21.) he drove out the money-changers, and the sellers of beasts and birds for sacrifice; and when questioned as to his authority, he answered, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up again. This was the FIRST PASSOVER celebrated by our Saviour after he entered on his public ministry. Whilst at Jerusalem, Nicodemus came by night to visit him. Jesus discoursed to him of baptism and regeneration; he also declared to him, that he was the light of the world, and the Son of God from heaven. Nicodemus did not very readily understand these mysteries; but the sequel shows, that his faith and conversion were solid and real. (John iii. 1, &c.)

After Jesus had attended this first passover, he went and resided in Judea, and in the country about Jordan, where his disciples baptized in his name with water unto repentance, following up John's baptism; but Jesus himself baptized not, because his was properly the baptism of the Spirit unto regeneration, which was not to take place till he was glorified, after his resurrection. A crowd of people attended his baptism, or rather that of his disciples. The number of those who resorted to him was so great, that the disciples of John the Baptist became jealous, and hinted their uneasiness to their master. But John answered, He is the bridegroom, and I am only the friend of the bridegroom. (John iii. 29.)

John the Baptist being imprisoned by Herod the Tetrarch, Jesus was afraid that the Pharisees would prevail with Pilate to seize him also, on pretence that he was too much followed by the people. Jesus, therefore, retired to Galilee, which was part of Philip's Tetrarchy, where Pilate had no power. In the way he stopped near a small village called Sychar, inhabited by Samaritans. He sat down greatly fatigued near Jacob's well, and sent his disciples into the town to buy provisions. During their absence, a woman of the place came to draw water. Jesus desired her to let him drink; and a very interesting conversation followed. The woman, returning to the town, expressed her opinion of Jesus; and the inhabitants came and invited him to enter into their city. There he continued two days, and many believed on him. (John iv. 41.)

On his arrival in Galilee, he preached in the synagogues. At Nazareth, where he had been brought up, he applied to himself the passage of Isaiah (lxi. 1, 2.) which describes the Messiah. The people of Nazareth admired his doctrine, but were offended at the meanness of his condition. He told them that no prophet is honoured in his own country; that God is sovereign in dispensing his favours, and, indeed, that he had formerly preferred the heathens to native Israelites, and might do the same again. This discourse so incensed the Nazarenes, that they led him to the top of a mountain upon which their city was built, with the design of throwing him down headlong; but Jesus, passing through the midst of them, went to Capernaum. He went a second time to Cana, where a certain nobleman, or one of Herod's courtiers, came and requested him to cure his son, who was sick at Capernaum. Jesus told him he might return, as his son was healed. The nobleman's servants met him on his way home, and informed him of his son's recovery, from the very moment that our Saviour told him his son was cured. (John iv. 46.) Some days after, on the sea of Tiberias, Jesus called Peter and Andrew his brother a second time, who were then employed in fishing. A little farther, he called the two brothers James and John, the two sons of Zebedee, who were also in their vessel. (Matt. iv. 18, 19, 20, &c.)

On a sabbath-day, in the synagogue of Capernaum, he healed one possessed with a devil; and, entering Simon's house, he cured his mother-in-law of a violent fever. (Mark i. 21—31.) Towards evening, all who had any sick persons, brought them to the door of the house where Jesus was, and he healed them. The next day, early in the morning, he retired alone into a desert to pray. Peter and the other disciples went to find him, and told him that the multitude sought him. But he carried them through the cities and villages of Galilee, where he preached the kingdom of God. His reputation spread throughout Syria, and the sick were sent to him from all parts. (Matt. iv. 23, &c.) Jesus, seeing the great multitude that followed him in his circuit through Galilee, went up into a mountain, and instructed them by an admirable sermon. After this discourse, a leper was presented to him, whom he healed, and enjoined to show himself to the priests.

Jesus returned to Capernaum, where a centurion, a Gentile, prevailed on the principal Jews of the city to intreat Jesus to restore one of his principal servants to health. The centurion, observing that Jesus was hastening towards his house, went himself, or sent some friends, to say, that he did not esteem himself worthy to receive him under his roof, but if he would only speak the word, his servant would be healed. Jesus admired his faith, and cured his servant. (Matt. viii. 5—13.) Jesus went from Capernaum to Nain, where he raised from the dead a widow's son, whom the people were carrying to his grave. (Luke vii. 11—50.) When come into the city, a Pharisee, named Simon, invited him to dine with him, and, whilst at table, a woman of the place, of loose conduct, came and washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with her hair. Simon was offended at this; but Jesus convinced him of her repentance and love.

Jesus entered into a ship to pass over the sea of Tiberias; but in the night he fell asleep, and, a storm rising, the vessel was in danger. The disciples, therefore, awoke Jesus, who commanded the winds, and immediately the sea was calm. (Matt. viii. 23. Luke viii. 23.) He landed in the country of the Gergesenes, east of the sea which he had crossed. Here were two famous demoniacs, one of whom was possessed by a legion of devils. He met Jesus, and the devils complained by him, that Jesus came to torment them before their time. They besought him not to send them into the abyss, but rather into a herd of swine, feeding near the place. Jesus suffered them, and immediately the swine, about two thousand in number, ran violently down a steep precipice into the sea of Tiberias. The Gergesenes, being frightened, intreated Jesus to quit their country. He, therefore, recrossed the sea, and was scarcely come ashore, when Jairus, a ruler of the synagogue at Capernaum, requested him to cure his only daughter of twelve years old. As he was going to Jairus's house, a woman who had an issue of blood was cured by touching secretly the hem of his garment. Soon after Jairus was informed that his daughter was dead. But Jesus encouraged him, and raised the young woman from the dead. (Matt. ix. 18—26. Luke viii. 49—56.) As he left the ruler's house, two blind men earnestly begged to be restored to sight. They followed him into a house whither he was going; and he restored to them their sight. He also cured one possessed with a devil, that was dumb. (Matt. ix. 27—33.)

Jesus went to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover. This appears to be the SECOND PASSOVER, though some are of opinion, that it was another feast of the Jews. Indeed, the chronology of this passover has been embarrassed by the indefinite description of St John, ἑορτὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, 'a feast of the Jews,' which will equally apply to that of Pentecost, or of Tabernacles. But the more correct reading appears to be ἡ ἑορτή, 'the feast,' by way of eminence, as the passover was styled, (Luke ii. 42. John iv. 45.; xi. 56.; xii. 12.) and this reading is supported by the two Syriac versions, by the Coptic, by twenty-five MSS. including three of the oldest, by the Fragment. edit. Aldin., and by the fathers, Irenæus, Eusebius, Cyril, and Theophylact.

Whilst Jesus was at Jerusalem, he cured one sick of the palsy, who had been thirty-eight years waiting at the pool of Bethesda. This person carried his bed on the sabbath-day, and by that means offended the Jews, who, being informed that Jesus had commanded it, resolved on his death, as a blasphemous, and destroyer of the law, because he had declared that God was his Father.

(John v. 1—47.) Departing from Jerusalem, he passed through corn-fields on a sabbath-day, and his disciples rubbed the almost ripe ears of corn in their hands, with intent to eat them. The Pharisees complained to Jesus, that this was a violation of the sabbath. Jesus justified the conduct of his disciples by the example of David, who in his necessity ate the shew-bread taken from before the Lord, (1 Sam. xxi. 4, 5, 6.) and by that of the priests, who worked in the temple on the sabbath-day, &c. On another sabbath-day he entered into one of the synagogues of Galilee, where he cured a man whose hand was withered. The Pharisees, being exasperated, confederated with the Herodians to procure his death; but Jesus knew it, and withdrew himself from thence. (Matt. xii. 9—15. Mark iii. 1—7. Luke vi. 6—11.)

Before the choice of his apostles, our Lord retired to the mountain district to pray, and spent the whole night in prayer to God. (Luke vi. 12.) In addition to his six early disciples, chosen before the first passover, and Levi, the publican, or Matthew, chosen before the second, (Matt. ix. 9.) he made choice of five more, to complete the number of twelve apostles, in reference, probably, to the twelve tribes of Israel. (Matt. x. 2. Mark vi. 7. Luke vi. 13.) After Jesus had sufficiently taught his disciples by his public discourses and parables, and by his fuller explanations and interpretations to them in private, he expressed his tender compassion for the multitude, as sheep without a shepherd. He, therefore, sent his disciples through the land, to proclaim the approach of the kingdom of God. He sent them two by two, with power to perform miracles; and he forbade them to carry provisions, arms, or change of raiment. He directed them to visit the houses of persons in repute for virtue, to abide there without changing lightly their habitation, and to receive such entertainment as was given them.

One day he crossed the lake Gennesareth, or sea of Tiberias, and retreated to a mountain; but the crowd followed him by land, and came to the foot of the mountain, in the desert of Bethsaida. Jesus graciously received them, cured their sick, and taught them. The apostles represented to him, that it was time to dismiss the people into the villages to buy provisions. Jesus answered, Give them food. They excused themselves by the impossibility of it. Jesus being informed that they had five loaves and two fishes, caused the people to sit down on the grass, and supplied them plentifully with food. The fragments which were gathered up filled twelve baskets. The number of those who had eaten was about five thousand men. (Mark vi. 37—44.) In the evening, he sent away his disciples to repass the sea in a ship, while he continued upon the mountain in prayer. The apostles having a contrary wind all night, instead of proceeding to Bethsaida, as they proposed, were driven for the coast of Tiberias or Capernaum. The next morning at day-break, they discovered themselves to be five-and-twenty or thirty furlongs from the shore. They then saw a man walking on the sea near them; and thinking it to be an apparition, they were afraid. Jesus, however, removed their fears, by telling them it was he. Peter desired to walk on the water; but being alarmed, and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, 'Lord, save me.' Jesus supported him by the hand, and the disciples took Jesus into their ship. (Matt. xiv. 13—34. John vi. 16—21. Mark vi. 47—53.)

The multitude came on this side of the sea to find Jesus, who in the mean time was gone to Capernaum. He exhorted them to labour for the meat which perisheth not; told them he was the true bread from heaven, that his flesh was meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed. As this discourse was figurative, many disciples deserted him: but Peter testified that he was the true Christ, and protested the constancy of the apostles. (John vi. 22—63.)

Jesus did not attend the THIRD PASSOVER at Jerusalem, because the Jewish rulers sought to kill him, but remained in Galilee. Having retired into the regions between Tyre and Sidon, a Syrophenician woman desired him to cure her daughter. As she continued her urgency, his disciples requested him to send her away. He replied, I am not sent but to the lost sheep of Israel: meaning that his favours were not intended for the Gentiles. When, however, he was returned to the house, the woman, not discouraged, threw herself at his feet, and besought him on account of her daughter. Jesus answered, It is not just to give the children's bread to dogs. True, said she, yet the dogs eat the crumbs under their masters' table. Jesus admired her faith and ingenious answer, and complied with her request. (Matt. xv. 22—28.)

Departing thence he visited the region of Decapolis, on the eastern side of the lake of Galilee. Here he wrought several signal miracles. He also fed four thousand men, besides women and children, with seven loaves of bread, and a few small fishes, which multiplied, as before; and the fragments that remained, after all were satisfied, filled seven baskets. Immediately after this, he went by sea to Magdala, in Dalmanutha. Whilst he was there, certain Pharisees and Sadducees came and asked of him the sign from heaven of the prophet Daniel, to prove his being the Messiah. He referred them, as he had referred others, to the sign of the prophet Jonah. He then crossed the lake, and went to Cæsarea Philippi, near the springs of the Jordan. Here he foretold to his disciples his sufferings at Jerusalem, and informed them of the necessity of self-denial, and of taking up their cross as his followers in this world.

Eight days after, according to Luke, or six entire days, excluding the extremes, according to Matthew and Mark, Jesus took three of his apostles, Peter, James, and John, into a high mountain apart, where, while at prayer in the night-time, he suddenly appeared surrounded by great glory and splendour. The apostles, who were asleep, awakened by the brightness of this light, were witnesses of their Master's transfiguration. They saw Moses and Elijah with him, who spoke of his intended sufferings at Jerusalem. Peter said to Jesus, Lord, let us make three tabernacles, one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias: for Peter was so transported as not to know what he said. Moses and Elijah soon disappeared, and the apostles heard a voice, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. They fell prostrate to the ground, but Jesus raised them up. As they descended from the mountain, Jesus charged them not to discover what they had seen, till after his resurrection. (Matt. xvii. 1—9. Mark ix. 1—9. Luke ix. 28—36.) Mount Tabor, in Galilee, is commonly supposed to have been the scene of this wonderful transaction; but this may reasonably be doubted. It seems rather to have been some mountain near Cæsarea Philippi; and Lightfoot conjectures, that it was the highest mountain of that country, which, according to Josephus, hangs over the springs of Jordan, and at the foot of which Cæsarea Philippi was built.

When they were come down from the mountain, they found the other disciples in dispute with the scribes, on their inability to cure a young man, who was dumb, lunatic, epileptic, and possessed with a devil. As soon as Jesus appeared, the whole company respectfully met him, and the young man's father importuned him to cure his son, which Jesus did. (Matt. xvii. 14—21. Mark ix. 18, 19.)

Jesus left Cæsarea Philippi, and returned privately to Galilee, where he seems to have remained till the ensuing feast of tabernacles. On the way, he informed his disciples of his approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection; but they understood not the meaning of his rising again. When they were come to Capernaum, the tax-gatherers enquired of the disciples, whether their master paid the capitation tax of two drachmas, about fifteen pence, a tribute which was now claimed by the Romans, but had formerly been raised for the service of the temple; Peter answered, Yes. Jesus prevented Peter, before he could mention it to him, and showed, that as the Son of God he was not obliged to pay this tribute. Yet, he directed him to go to the sea, and throw in his line, and the first fish which he should take would furnish what was sufficient to pay for them both. Accordingly, Peter went, and the first fish he took had in his mouth a stater, an Attic silver coin, equal in value to the sacred shekel, or four drachmas. (Matt. xvii. 24—27.) The disciples having disputed among themselves, they asked Jesus which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Our Saviour, who knew what had passed among them, told them, that to become first they should endeavour to place themselves last; and taking a little child, he said, that whosoever should humble himself as that little child, should be greatest in the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. xviii. 1—5.) He afterwards delivered rules how to treat our brethren when they offend us. Peter asking him how oft he was to forgive his brother? whether seven times? Jesus replied, not seven only, but seventy times seven. He added the parable of the servant, to whom his master had forgiven the sum of ten thousand talents, but who refused to have compassion on one of his fellow-servants that owed him only one hundred pence. (Matt. xviii. 10. 15—35.)

Not yet believing the spiritual nature of his kingdom, his brethren, or kinsmen, who had at length become his disciples, and expected promotion, not less than the rest, advised him to exhibit his miracles in Judea, as a more public theatre than the despised Galilee. Jesus rebuked them for their worldly-mindedness and ostentation, and refused to accompany them to the feast of tabernacles; but he afterwards followed them privately, and came to Jerusalem in the middle of the festival week, and taught openly in the temple. (John vii. 1—14.) The Jews admired his doctrine, which he declared was not restrictively his own, but his heavenly Father's also. There was much talk concerning him. Some affirmed that he was the Messiah: others held a different opinion. On the last day of the feast, Jesus cried in the temple, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth in me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' These discourses increased the contradictions of opinion concerning him. The priests maintained that he could not be a prophet, because he was of Galilee. The people were so struck with his miracles, that they were ready not only to admit that he was a prophet, but that he was the Messiah.

Jesus retired that evening to Bethany, where he lodged; and the next morning early, he returned to the temple, and taught the people, who assembled to hear him. The Pharisees brought to him a woman who had been taken in adultery, and asked what they should do with her? Jesus wrote on the ground, as if too busy to attend to them; but, raising himself up, he said, He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone. He then resumed his writing, and did not appear to notice their conduct. Being convicted in their own consciences, they withdrew one by one, till Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst. Jesus said to her, Hath no man condemned thee to execution? Neither do I, go and sin no more. The next day, Jesus saw a man who had been blind from his birth. His disciples asked him, whether this affliction was a punishment of his own, or of his parents' sins. Jesus told them, for neither of these; but that the works of God should be manifested in him. Then, spitting on the ground, he made a kind of clay, with which he rubbed the blind man's eyes, and bid him go and wash them in the pool of Siloam. The blind man went thither, and returned perfectly cured. As the blind man was well known, this miracle made a great noise; and he was brought to the Pharisees, and examined how he had been cured. He told them. As the cure was wrought on the sabbath-day, the Pharisees maintained that Jesus could not be a true prophet, because he violated the sabbath. The blind man resolutely asserted that Jesus was a good man, and a prophet: they, therefore, drove him out of the temple, and, as some think, even excommunicated him. Jesus hearing of this, found the man, and said, 'Dost thou believe in the Son of God?' The blind man answered, 'Who is he?' Jesus said, 'Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee.' Immediately he threw himself at the feet of Jesus, and worshipped him. (John ix. 1, &c.)

After this, Jesus returned into Galilee; but he determined to be present at the feast of dedication. He, therefore, journeyed through the midst of Galilee and Samaria; and he sent messengers before his face to a Samaritan village to make preparations for him. But as the Samaritans understood that he was on his way to Jerusalem, they refused to receive them. Provoked at this inhospitality, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, asked him, whether they should call for fire from heaven upon that village? Jesus, however, told them, that he came not to destroy, but to save men's lives. (Luke ix. 51—56.) During our Lord's stay in Samaria, he sent forth seventy disciples, in succession, to the apostles, to proclaim, in pairs, his approach to the several cities and places which he intended to visit in his way to Jerusalem; and he gave them instructions very similar to those he had before given to the twelve apostles.

In his progress through Judea, our Lord was entertained at the village of Bethany, near Jerusalem, by the sisters of Lazarus. Martha, the elder, as mistress of the house, was very diligent in preparing entertainment for him and his retinue, while Mary, the younger, sat at the feet of Jesus, and listened to his heavenly conversation. Martha complained of this to Jesus; he answered her, 'Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her.' (Luke x. 38—42.)

At the feast of dedication, as Jesus walked in Solomon's porch, the Jews said, How long wilt thou keep us in suspense? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly. Jesus answered, I have already told you, and ye believe me not: the works that I do sufficiently prove my mission. If ye were my sheep, and of my flock, ye would believe me: my Father and I are one. Then the Jews took up stones to stone him, because he made himself God. They afterwards sought to seize him; but he escaped out of their hands, probably, by rendering himself invisible, and departed again from Judea to Bethabara, beyond Jordan, where John at first baptized, and where he remained about two months. Many of the Jews came to him, and believed on him, saying, John the Baptist did not perform one miracle; but Jesus has wrought a great number. (John x. 22—42.)

Whilst he was beyond Jordan, Lazarus, brother to Martha and Mary, fell sick; and a messenger informed Jesus of it. He said this sickness would not issue in death, but in the manifestation of God's power; he, therefore, continued two days longer in the same place. In the mean time, Lazarus died. He then told his disciples that Lazarus was dead, and set forwards for Judea, though dissuaded from it by his disciples. When arrived at Bethany, he found that Lazarus had been buried four days. Martha met him, and said, 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died.' Jesus assured her, that her brother should rise again. Mary also coming soon after, Jesus sympathized with their tears, desired to be conducted to the grave, ordered it to be opened, called Lazarus with a loud voice, and raised him from the dead. This miracle made a great noise in Jerusalem, and the priests concluded that it was necessary to put Jesus to death. Our Saviour, therefore, retired to Ephraim, in the mountainous country near the wilderness of Judea, where he abode with his disciples. (John xi. 45.)

His stay at Ephraim was short. The FOURTH PASSOVER approached; and he set out for Jerusalem. He forewarned his disciples of what was to befall him; but it was a mystery which they did not comprehend. As he came near to Jericho, a blind man, who knew of his arrival, solicited from him the gift of sight, and obtained it. Near the city he saw a publican, called Zaccheus, who had climbed up into a sycamore tree, that he might have a better view of our Saviour. Jesus invited himself to lodge with him; and Zaccheus, transported with this honour, was converted, and made full restitution of his exactions. (Luke xviii. xix.) The next day, Jesus quitting the city restored to their sight two blind men, one of whom was Bartimeus. (Matt. xv. 29—44. Mark x. 46—52.)

Six days before the passover, our Lord reached Bethany. The day of his arrival at Bethany is generally supposed to have been the Saturday before his crucifixion; but it seems rather to have been Sunday, the first day of the Passion, or suffering week. Whilst he was at supper, the pious, virtuous, and grateful Mary, the sister of Lazarus, poured a box of very precious spikenard on his feet, and wiped them with her hair. Judas Iscariot censured this act of Mary, and said, 'Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor?' Jesus defended Mary, and rebuked Judas and others of the disciples, who approved his conduct. He observed, that what she had done was a prelude to the embalming of his body, which he foresaw would not, indeed, be anointed for that purpose; though it might be covered with spices, and though ointments might be prepared for it.

When the multitudes, who came from all parts to celebrate the passover, found that Jesus was at Bethany, they went thither on Monday morning, both to see Lazarus, and to attend Jesus in public procession to Jerusalem, and proclaim him as their undoubted Messiah, or Christ the king of Israel. Jesus did not any longer decline their proffered homage; and as soon as he had reached Bethphage, he sent two of his disciples, whom he directed to bring him an ass, that he might fulfil an ancient prophecy. (Zech. ix. 9.) He entered the city, therefore, in triumph; and the multitude before and behind shouted, 'Hosannah to the son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord.' Some of the Pharisees among the crowd, taking exception at the acclamations made in his honour, bid him rebuke his disciples; but Jesus answered, that if the people were silent, the stones in the street would cry aloud. He went to the temple, where he wrought his signal and appropriate miracles of curing the blind and the lame; which excited the admiration even of the children, who joined in the general acclamation of Hosannah to the son of David, and thus hailed him as the Messiah. (Matt. xxi. Mark xi. Luke xix. John xii.)

In the evening he retired to Bethany.

The next day, Tuesday, going in the morning early to Jerusalem, he was hungry, and advanced toward a fig-tree to look for fruit; but finding nothing but leaves, he cursed it, and the tree began to wither. In the temple, he again drove out the merchants. The priests and elders sought to seize him; but they feared the people, who admired his discourses. In the evening, he again retired out of the city.

The next day, Wednesday, returning with his disciples to Jerusalem, they noticed the withered fig-tree, and remarked it to Jesus. This day, whilst he was in the temple, the chief priests and elders asked him, by what authority he set up for such a reformer? He in his turn asked them, whether the baptism of John was human or divine? Unwilling to own its divinity, yet fearing to call it an imposture, they answered, 'they could not tell.' And I, said Jesus, do not tell you what is my authority. Afterwards, addressing the priests, doctors, and Pharisees, he proposed to them some parables, and suggested that God was about to reject them, because of their infidelity, and to call the Gentiles into his church. Such is the parable of the two sons, sent into the vineyard by their father; of the husbandman, who maltreated the servants, and killed the son of the owner of the vineyard; and of the feast, to which the persons invited would not come, but strangers were collected to partake of it. After this, the Herodians, Sadducees, and Pharisees, came one after another, and proposed to him captious questions. The Herodians asked him, if it was lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar? Jesus proved, by a piece of money stamped with the impression of Cæsar, that they ought to give to Cæsar the dues of Cæsar, and to God the dues of God. The Sadducees asked, whose wife a certain woman would be after the resurrection, as she had been married successively to seven brothers? Jesus told them, that at the resurrection there would be no need of marriage; and, consequently, no special property of wives and husbands. The Pharisees demanded, which was the greatest commandment of the law? He answered, that the first and principal was the love of God; and the second, the love of our neighbour. After this, he inveighed severely against the Pharisees, exposing their hypocrisy, and the abuses they patronized. He boldly and authoritatively denounced repeated 'woes' against the Scribes and Pharisees for their complicated vices, their hypocrisy, ostentation, pride, arrogance, extortion, rapacity, and long continued persecution of the prophets, from the earliest times to the sacrilegious murder of the last and greatest, Zechariah; and he concluded with predicting the desolation of their temple, and the withdrawing of his presence till their final conversion.

Towards evening, as Jesus went out of the temple, his disciples observed to him the beauties of this edifice, and the rich presents belonging to it. Jesus told them that the time would come, when the temple should be so entirely destroyed, that one stone should not remain upon another. When he was withdrawn from the city to the Mount of Olives, he communicated to his confidential disciples, Peter, James, John, and Andrew, the signs or prognostics of, first, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; secondly, his next personal appearance in glory; and thirdly, his last, at the end of the world. After this, he told his disciples that the passover was to be celebrated in two days, and that the Son of Man should be delivered into the hands of his enemies, and be crucified. (Matt. xxvi. 1, 2.) It appears, that at this very time the chief priests, and Scribes, and elders of the people, were assembled to plot his destruction. From the Mount of Olives our Lord proceeded to Bethany, that evening, to the house of Simon the leper, whom he, probably, had cured. Whilst he was at supper with his disciples, he received his last unction; when another woman, whose name is not mentioned, but whom some think to be Mary Magdalene, poured costly and fragrant spikenard on his head, completing that of Mary, the sister of Lazarus, on the preceding Sunday. This additional costly tribute of veneration excited the indignation of the disciples in general, as before chiefly of Judas. Our Lord's repeated rebuke, involving Judas among the rest, completed the resentment of the traitor, who immediately retired from the company, and bargained with the chief priests (whom he probably found still sitting in council,) to deliver Jesus to them for thirty shekels of silver, about 3*l.* 15*s.* or at most 4*l.* 10*s.* sterling.

The next morning (Thursday,) Jesus sent his two favourite disciples, Peter and John, to Jerusalem, to prepare a room and accommodations for celebrating the passover. In the evening he came into the city, and went to the house, where Peter and John had provided, and, sitting down to table, declared that he had earnestly desired to eat this passover with them.

To cure his disciples of their passionate inclination for pre-eminence and distinction, he arose from table and washed their feet, exhorting them to imitate him, and to consider as their true dignity the showing of all manner of respect and deference to each other. To correct the too great confidence of Peter, he foretold that he would deny him thrice that very night before the cock crew twice. When they had placed themselves again at table, to eat the second course of the entertainment, Jesus declared, that one of them should betray him. Judas having received a sop, by which he was detected, rose from table, transported by the evil spirit. Jesus said to him, 'What thou doest, do quickly.' This was interpreted by the apostles very differently from its real meaning. When Judas had departed, our Lord instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, or as St. Paul calls it, his supper. After this, he discoursed to them of union and charity which they ought to maintain among themselves, and the confidence which they should place in Providence, and in his own kindness for them. He also promised them another Comforter.

After some other discourse, he rose from table, and, having repeated an hymn of thanksgiving, went out of the city with them. He retired to the Mount of Olives, where he resumed his discourse, in which he enlarged on their union with him; on his approaching sufferings, death, and resurrection; on the scandal which his death would occasion; on their flight; on Peter's denial; and on the descent of the Holy Ghost. This discourse proved that he knew all things, and that he suffered death in perfect coincidence with his own will.

Having passed the brook Cedron, he came to Gethsemane, where was a garden, into which he went with his disciples. As he had frequently been here, Judas perfectly knew the place. He took with him his confidential disciples, Peter, James, and John, apart from the rest, further into the garden. Here he became extremely sad: his soul was sorrowful even unto death. Stay ye here, said he, and watch with me. Then going a little farther, he fell on his knees, and prostrating himself on the earth, he said, Father, all things are possible unto thee: if it be possible, take away this cup from me: nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt; not my will, but thine, be done. An angel from heaven comforted him; and being in this agony, he continued his prayer, and his sweat was, as it were, drops of blood falling to the ground. He rose three times from prayer, and as often found his three disciples asleep. The third time he informed them that his betrayer was near, and that it was necessary to meet him.

Judas now entered the garden with a company of soldiers, to whom he had given this signal, Seize him whom I shall kiss, and convey him away safely. Jesus, advancing towards the soldiers, said, 'Whom seek ye?' They answered, 'Jesus of Nazareth.' Jesus said, 'I am he.' At these words they fell to the ground. He proposed to them the same question a second time, and they answered in the same manner. Jesus said to them, 'If, therefore, ye seek me, let these go their way.' Judas seeing the irresolution of the wavering band, in order to urge them to execute their commission, went up to Jesus, and said, 'Hail Master!' and kissed him. Jesus gently reproved him with this rebuke, 'Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?' Then they laid hands on Jesus, and apprehended him. Peter drew his sword, and struck one of the high priest's servants; he aimed at his head, but he only cut off his ear. Jesus touched his ear, and cured him, saying to Peter, 'Put up thy sword, for all who take the sword shall perish by the sword.'

Jesus was carried first to Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas. Annas had been high-priest; and Caiaphas was high-priest that year. Annas sent him bound to Caiaphas, to be examined by him, and tried before the whole council, as soon as they could be assembled at the judgment-hall, in his palace. Jesus stood before Caiaphas, who questioned him concerning his doctrine and disciples. Jesus told him he had taught nothing in secret, and that all the Jews were witnesses of his doctrine. One of the high-priest's servants smote him on the face, saying, 'Answerest thou the high-priest so?' Jesus said to him, 'If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil; but if well, why smitest thou me?' After the Sanhedrim were assembled, the chief-priests, the elders, and the whole council, sought evidence against him, that they might convict him of a capital crime: but they could find none sufficiently strong. At last came two false witnesses, of whom one declared, 'This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days;' the other, 'We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands.' But their testimony did not exactly agree, nor was it sufficient to convict him. All this time Jesus continued silent. Caiaphas, therefore, adjured him in the name of the living God, to declare whether he was the Christ. Jesus confessed it, and added, that he would come one day in the clouds at the right hand of his Father, to judge mankind. At these words, the high-priest rent his clothes, and exclaimed, 'What further need have we of witnesses? Behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. What think ye?' They answered, 'He deserves to die.' His unjust condemnation was now aggravated by every insult and injury, which diabolical rage and malice could devise.

In the morning, the whole council led him away bound to Pilate, the governor, for the purpose of getting him to confirm their act, and sentence Jesus to be executed. The Romans had deprived the Jews of the power of life and death; and though the Jews might pronounce a man guilty, yet they could not condemn in him, nor order his execution. When the whole council came to the prætorium, or Roman court of justice, they delivered Jesus to Pilate, to whom they insisted, first, that Jesus stirred up insurrection against the Romans; secondly, that he taught it was unlawful to pay tribute to the emperor; and thirdly, that he called himself Christ, the king, and the Son of God. Pilate examined him, and asked him, if he was the Messiah, or king of the Jews? Jesus answered by admitting, but explaining, the alleged fact: 'My kingdom is not of this world,' and can therefore create no alarm to the Romans. The Jews, the accusers of Jesus, did not enter the prætorium, lest they should be polluted, because they intended that evening to eat the passover. Pilate, therefore, after having examined Jesus, went out to them, and declared that he found nothing in him which deserved condemnation. Notwithstanding this declaration, they clamoured against Jesus with great noise: but our Lord, who was brought out to them, answered nothing. Pilate being informed that Jesus was a Galilean, sent him to Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, who was then at Jerusalem. Herod had long desired to see Jesus, and proposed to him several questions, to which he returned no answer. This so surprised and provoked Herod and his court, that in derision they covered him with a scarlet robe, for the purpose of insulting him, and sent him back to Pilate.

Pilate then summoned the chief priests, and rulers, and the people, again to the prætorium, and declared to them, that, as neither he nor Herod had found him guilty of any thing which deserved death, he should order him only to be corrected, and so dismiss him. As, however, they continued to insist on the condemnation of Jesus, Pilate gave them their choice of Jesus or Barabbas, (a most notorious villain and murderer, under sentence of death,) it being customary to grant them the life of some criminal at the passover. The Jews chose Barabbas, and cried out, Crucify Jesus. Still Pilate would not consent, but inflicted on him the milder punishment which he had proposed. He first scourged Jesus, and then left him to the derision and mockery of the Roman soldiers, who placed on his head a crown of thorns, dressed him in a purple robe, and put a reed in his right hand, as a substitute for a sceptre. They then mimicked a salutation and homage to him as king, spat in his face, and smote him. Pilate expected that the Jews would be satisfied with this punishment; but the chief priests and their attendants still demanded that Jesus should be crucified. Pilate having made two other attempts to deliver the innocent, was overpowered with their cries and threats; and, fearing some sedition, he ordered water to be brought, in which he washed his hands, told them that he cleared himself of the guilt of his death, and gave him up to them. It was about the third hour, or nine o'clock in the morning, when the governor thus determined.

Jesus, in order to be executed, was put into the hands of the Roman soldiers, who took off the purple robe, put on him his own raiment, and led him away to crucify him. They laid a part of his cross on him, and conducted him to Calvary, a little hill north-west of the city. As Jesus was extremely faint, and the cross was heavy, the Roman soldiers meeting one Simon, a Cyrenian, pressed him to assist Jesus in carrying it. When he came to Calvary, they offered him wine mingled with myrrh, or gall, to drink; but, having tasted it, he would not drink. They nailed him to the cross between two thieves, one on the right hand, the other on the left. He prayed for those who crucified him. His crucifixion took place about eleven or twelve o'clock, that is, at noon. (Luke xxiii. 44.)

Pilate commanded his sentence of condemnation to be fixed upon his cross in these terms, 'JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWS.' The Jews would have persuaded Pilate to alter this; but he refused. The soldiers divided our Saviour's garments among them; but, as his coat was without seam, they agreed to cast lots for it by itself. The magistrates, priests, people, and also one of the thieves who were crucified close to him, insulted him. Yet, the other thief rebuked his companion, confessed his guilt, acknowledged the innocence of Jesus, and desired to be remembered by him when he came into his kingdom. Jesus promised him, that he should be that day with him in Paradise. Mary, the mother of Jesus, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene, with John the Evangelist, were then standing near his cross. Jesus said to his mother, showing her St. John, 'Woman, behold thy son;' and to John, 'Behold thy mother.' From that time John kept her as his mother.

About noon, the sun was covered with darkness, which continued till the ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. About, or at the ninth hour, Jesus cried with a loud voice, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' Then they gave him vinegar in a sponge to drink; and when he had tasted it, he said, 'IT IS FINISHED.' Then he bowed his head, and dismissed his spirit. That instant the earth trembled, the adjacent rocks were rent, graves were opened, many who were dead arose; and the substantial veil of the temple was rent from the top to the bottom. The Jews, being unwilling that the bodies should remain on the cross the next day, which was the great day of the sabbath, or passover, desired Pilate that their legs might be broken to hasten their death, and they might be taken down. However, as Jesus was already dead, they brake not his legs; but one of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith there issued blood and water.

Towards the evening, Joseph of Arimathea, a disciple of Jesus, and a senator of distinction, requested from Pilate permission to receive the body of Jesus, and to bury it before sun-set; for it was the evening before the sabbath, the rest of which began at sun-set. Pilate, being informed that Jesus was really dead, consented; and Joseph placed the body in a new tomb, designed for himself, which was hewn out of the rock in his garden, and the entrance of which was closed with a great stone. The priests, fearing that the disciples of Jesus would steal his body, placed guards, and sealed up the sepulchre. The next day, which was the great sabbath-day, every one rested according to the law; but after sun-set, when it was allowable to engage in business, and buy any thing, the holy women who had seen that our Saviour's body was put hastily into the tomb, and who intended to embalm it with more ointments, bought drugs and spices for that purpose. The day following, early in the morning, before it was light, they went towards Calvary. But Jesus, who had submitted to the bonds of death for so long a time as he thought proper, had now awaked from his confinement, and was risen; and the soldiers, who witnessed his resurrection, were convulsed with fear, and fell into a trance.

These women coming near the sepulchre, and seeing the entrance open, concluded the body was removed. Alarmed at this, Mary Magdalene left her companions, ran to Jerusalem, and told Peter and John that their Master's body was carried off. The other women went towards the grave; and when they came to the porch, they saw an angel sitting on the stone, and the guards lying in a trance. The angel told them not to be afraid. Entering into the sepulchre, they saw another angel, who said, 'Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth which was crucified: he is risen; he is not here: behold the place where they laid him.' The women left the sepulchre with fear and great joy to tell his disciples. Their departure was followed by that of the guards, who, recovering from their trance, and no longer seeing the tremendous apparition in the porch, went into the city and related to the chief priests all that had happened. Soon after came Peter and John running to the sepulchre; John arrived first, but did not enter the sepulchre. Peter entering it, saw the linen clothes in which the body of our Saviour had been wrapped up, and the napkin which had covered his head. John likewise saw them, believed that Jesus was risen, and returned to Jerusalem. When they were gone, Mary Magdalene came again to the sepulchre. Stooping down to look within the tomb, she saw two angels sitting, one at the head, the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had laid. They said to her, 'Why weepest thou?' She answered, 'They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him.' Then turning herself backward, she saw Jesus, and said to him, 'If thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.' Jesus said to her, 'Mary!' Immediately she knew his voice, and threw herself at his feet to kiss them. Mary returned to Jerusalem, and related what she had seen to the disciples. Jesus also appeared to the other women, her companions, as they returned from the sepulchre; and they adored him. However, the apostles treated them as fanciful persons, and did not believe what they related.

The same day, being the first day of the week, two of Jesus's disciples going to Emmaus, a village about seven miles from Jerusalem, Jesus joined them in the way, appeared as a traveller, and enquired the subject of their earnest discourse. They spoke to him of his death and passion, which were the subject of universal conversation at Jerusalem. We had hopes, said they, this Jesus should redeem Israel; but it is now the third day since these things happened. Then Jesus reproved their want of faith, demonstrated to them from the Scriptures that the Messiah was first to suffer, and afterwards to enter into glory. Being come to Emmaus, about the third hour, afternoon, or the first evening, when the sun had declined, they invited Jesus to stay with them. This he at first refused; but they constrained him to take some refreshment. At table, he assumed the character of master of the family, blessed the bread, and gave it them. Then their eyes were opened, and they knew him; but they soon lost sight of him. Returning immediately to Jerusalem, they found the apostles, and understood that Jesus had appeared also to Peter.

Whilst they were together, Jesus entered the room and presented himself among them. This sight alarmed them; but he removed their apprehensions with 'Peace be unto you! Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see: for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as you see me have.' He also took broiled fish, and part of a honey-comb, and did eat before them. Afterwards, he breathed on them, and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained.' As Thomas, one of the twelve, was absent at this time, he remained incredulous, and said, 'Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.' Eight days after, the apostles being all together, Jesus again appeared among them, and said, 'Peace be unto you.' Then addressing Thomas, he said, 'Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing.' Thomas answered, 'My Lord, and my God!'

The disciples of our Saviour being assembled upon a mountain in Galilee, Jesus showed himself to them. When they saw him, they worshipped him. Some, however, doubted whether his body was a real body; for as to his resurrection and his presence, it does not appear, that of these they could doubt. This assembly was numerous, according to St. Paul; and it consisted of more than five hundred brethren, or disciples, of whom the majority were still alive when that apostle wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, about A.D. 57.

Jesus showed himself to several of the apostles at the sea of Tiberias. Peter, Thomas, Nathanael, James, John, and two other disciples, were fishing on this sea, when Jesus appeared in the morning on the shore, and directed them to a very large capture of fishes. Some of these they broiled, and ate with him: but no one asked who he was, for they knew very well that he was Jesus. After the meal, Jesus asked Peter three times successively, Peter, lovest thou me more than these? Peter also answered three times, that he loved him with all his heart; and Jesus as often directed him to show his affection by feeding his flock. He also foretold that Peter should suffer crucifixion for his sake; but that John should live to see Jerusalem severely punished for its rejection of him.

After this manifestation at the lake of Galilee, the apostles, probably, returned immediately to Jerusalem, where Jesus appeared again to all the apostles. At this important general meeting of the apostles, our Lord renewed to them, in their collective capacity, the commissions given to their leaders before, and stated his own authority, and their apostolic functions and powers, more fully and explicitly. 'All power,' said he, 'is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' He opened their understandings, explained to them the Scriptures, and empowered them to perform miracles.

He now appointed the last meeting for the following Thursday, the fortieth day from the resurrection, at Jerusalem; where, being associated with him, he renewed to them the promise of the Holy Ghost, and directed them to remain at Jerusalem till they were endued with power from on high. After this, he conducted them from Jerusalem to Bethany, and, on the Mount of Olives, lifting up his hands he blessed them, and, rising in the air, he was gradually taken up by a cloud, beyond their view. Whilst they looked after him, two angels appeared to them, and said, 'Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.' Then they went back to Jerusalem, where they continued with Mary, the mother of Jesus, and such of his relations as believed on him, till the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost descended on them.

If we recapitulate the evangelical evidences of the character of Jesus, they may be reduced to the following heads: 1. The stupendous miracles which he wrought, exceeding in number, variety, and magnitude, those of all his predecessors the prophets. 'The works which I do bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me.' 2. The wonderful chain of prophecies, of which he was the subject, both in his divine and human nature, as the Son of God and the Son of man conjointly; his mission, his sufferings, and his glories, which were altogether fulfilled in him, and altogether in no other person. 'Search the Scriptures, for they testify of me.' 3. His exact and minute knowledge of future events, respecting himself and his disciples; and his historical prophecies, which reach to the end of the world, and even into eternity, and which were delivered personally by himself, and afterwards by his apostles. 'Now I tell you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass ye may believe that I am [the Christ].' 4. The testimony of John the Baptist, whom the multitude revered as a prophet, and the Scribes and Pharisees durst not deny or dispute his claim. 5. The legislative capacity, in which he came 'not to destroy the law and the prophets,' but 'to fulfil' or complete them by more refined and spiritual precepts and ordinances, and to sanction them, not by temporal, but by eternal rewards and punishments. 6. His conscious dignity and commanding authority, delivering his divine precepts and ordinances in his own name, and not like Moses and the prophets, sub-ordinately in the name of God. 7. The pure sanctity of his life, and uniform propriety of his conduct, which afford the finest illustration of his doctrines, and a consummate example of perfect and unerring obedience, and are the most decisive and unequivocal proof of genuine DIVINE NATURE. 'Which of you,' said he, 'convicteth me of sin? He was, indeed, pre-eminently, 'THE HOLY ONE,' 'THE JUST,' 'THE RIGHTEOUS,' 'THE SAINT OF SAINTS,' to whose spotless innocence, and transcendent virtue, even his inveterate foes, his treacherous disciple, and his pusillanimous judge, bore witness.

Dr. Priestley, in his parallel of Mahomet and Jesus, has skilfully drawn the leading features of both. 'If we consider,' says he, 'the characters of the two men, the great superiority of that of Jesus is manifest. Mahomet, though not without religion, had nothing of that rational and humble piety, which eminently distinguished Jesus; nor did he discover any marks of that ardent and disinterested love of mankind in general, or of his own disciples in particular, which led Jesus to suffer and to die for them. Mahomet's passions of lust and revenge, the suspicion of which never fell on Jesus, render him a very improper object of imitation; whereas Jesus exhibited in his life a perfect pattern of every human virtue. Whence, then, could arise this great difference in the character and conduct of these two men, equally the founders of new systems of religion? The only hypothesis that can account for the facts is, that the consciousness which Jesus had of his peculiar and near relation to God, gave him that spirit of habitual devotion, which is the genuine parent of every other virtue; and the sure prospect of a great future reward, (Heb. xii. 2.) gave him a great superiority over all lower gratifications and pursuits. On the contrary, Mahomet, conscious that he was an imposter, could have no other object than worldly power and sensual indulgence; and whatever might have been his devotion at his outset, he afterwards retained no more of it than was subservient to his schemes; and at length, (as was probably the case with Oliver Cromwell,) his religion was certainly swallowed up in his ambition.' See MESSIAH. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. p. 943, &c. Priestley's Discourses relating to the Evidences of Revealed Religion, vol. ii.

JEWS, the appropriate denomination of the descendants of Judah, which soon included under it the Benjamites, who joined themselves to the tribe of Judah, on the revolt of the other ten tribes from the house of David. After the Babylonish captivity, when many individuals of these ten tribes returned with the men of Judah and Benjamin to rebuild Jerusalem, the term Jews included them also, or rather was then extended to all the descendants of Israel who retained the Jewish religion, whether they belonged to the two or to the ten tribes, whether they returned into Judea or not. Hence, not only all the Israelites of future times have been called Jews, but all the descendants of Jacob are frequently so called by us at present, and we speak even of their original dispensation as the Jewish dispensation.

The most remarkable periods in the history of the Jews are the call of Abraham; the giving of the law by Moses; their establishment in Canaan under Joshua, the successor of Moses; the building of the temple by Solomon; the division of the nation into the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, in the reign of Rehoboam; their seventy years' captivity in Babylon; their return under Zerubbabel; their persecution and murder of Jesus Christ, whom Christians believe to be the Messiah, the Lord of Glory, and, in consequence of this, the destruction of their city and temple by the emperor Titus, A. D. 70. From that time to the present day, they have been without a common country, without a temple, without a sacrifice, without a prophet, without a common leader, or protector; and, as was predicted respecting them, they have been 'an astonishment, a proverb, and a by-word,' among all nations whither the Lord hath scattered them. The history of this people certainly forms a striking evidence of the truth of divine revelation. They are a living and perpetual miracle; continuing to subsist as a distinct and peculiar race, for upwards of three thousand years, and even in the midst of other nations; flowing forward in a full and constant stream, like the waters of the Rhone, without mixing with the waves of the expansive lake through which the passage lies, to the ocean of eternity.

The expectation of the promised Messiah is the leading tenet of the religion of the modern Jews; and in this they differ widely from Christians, who believe that the Messiah has already come, and that in Christ Jesus all the Jewish prophecies respecting him were accomplished. Infatuated with the idea of a temporal Messiah and deliverer, who is to subdue the world, and re-instate them in their own land, the Jews still wait for his appearance; but they have not fixed either the place whence, or the time when, he is to come. Finding it difficult to evade the force of certain texts in Isaiah, &c. which speak of a suffering Messiah, some have had recourse to the idea of two Messiahs, who are to succeed each other; Ben Joseph, of the tribe of Ephraim, in a state of humiliation and suffering, and Ben David, of the tribe of Judah, in a state of glory, magnificence, and power. As to the character and mission of their Messiah, he is to be of the tribe of Judah, the lineal descendant of David, and called by his name, and to be endued with the spirit of prophecy; and his especial mission is, to restore the dispersed sheep of Israel, plant them safely in their own land, subdue their enemies, and by that means bring the whole world to the knowledge of the one true God. The Jews say that his coming and their restoration have not yet taken place, because they are still unworthy to be redeemed, and have not repented, or have not yet received the full measure of their punishment. Yet, they insist that their redemption is not conditional, but will take place at the appointed time, though they should not repent; that God will not redeem and restore them for any merit of their own, but for his name's sake, for the sake of the few righteous, and also in consideration of what they will be after their redemption, when they will all be good and righteous. They believe, that Judea will be the seat of those wars which will precede their redemption; and that, after due vengeance taken on the nations for the cruelties exercised on the people of God, during this long and deplorable captivity, they will terminate in the complete subjection of all nations to the power of the Messiah, and in the introduction of universal peace and happiness that shall never more be interrupted. Though they profess to know nothing of the abode, or present state, of the ten tribes, yet they believe that they are lost only in name, and shall be restored together with Judah and Benjamin; that all those Jews who have embraced Christianity or Mahometanism, shall then return to the religion of their fathers; and that their nation, thus restored and united, shall never again go into captivity, nor ever be in subjection to any power, but that all the nations of the world shall thenceforward be subject to them. Judea will then again become fruitful; Jerusalem 'will be built on its ancient ground plot;' and the real descendants of the Priests and Levites will be reinstated in their respective offices, though they may have been forced to apostatize. Then also will be restored the spirit of prophecy, the ark and cherubim, fire from heaven, &c. as formerly in the tabernacle, in the wilderness, and in Solomon's temple. In fine, then will idolatry wholly cease in the earth, and all men will acknowledge the unity of God, and his kingdom. (Zech. xiv. 9.) Such are the expectations of the modern Jews, with respect to the Messiah and his kingdom, which they still avow to be not of a spiritual, but of a temporal nature.

It is, however, complained by Mr. David Levi, that there are two different parties among the Jews, who slight the prophecies which speak of the restoration, and laugh at the idea of a Messiah coming to redeem them. The one consists of such as call themselves philosophers, enlightened men, who, he says, 'are perfect Deists, not believing a syllable of revelation, and not ascribing our sufferings to the immediate providence of God, but to a concatenation of causes, in a political light.' The other party are such, 'as either through the length of the captivity, or the easy circumstances that they are in, and the splendid and voluptuous manner in which they are able to live, neither look for, nor desire, a restoration.'

The Jewish economy, as contained in the Pentateuch, is so much directed to temporal rewards and punishments, that it has been questioned whether the Jews had any knowledge of a future state. Bishop Warburton, in his 'Divine Legation of Moses,' and Dr. Russell, in his 'Ancient Europe,' have defended this opinion; but it has been controverted by Bishop Sherlock, Drs. Sykes, Jortin, Priestley, and other distinguished authors. The modern Jews are also decidedly against it; and Mr. Levi believes not only that 'Moses inculcated the doctrine of a future state in his dispensation,' but also that the 'Jews were certainly well acquainted with the doctrine of the resurrection in the days of Isaiah, who lived almost eight hundred years before the incarnation.' See JUDAISM. Letters to Dr. Priestley, p. 89; Dissertations on the Prophecies, vol. i. p. 184; vol. ii. p. 237; Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 1—27.

JEZ'EBEL, אִיזֶבֶל, signifies island of the habitants; otherwise, woe to the habitation; or, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, isle of the dunghill, or woe to the dunghill. Jezebel was daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians, and wife to Ahab, king of Israel. (1 Kings xvi. 31.) This princess introduced into the kingdom of Samaria the public worship of Baal, Astarte, and other Phœnician deities, which God had expressly forbidden; and with this impious worship a general prevalence of all those abominations which had formerly incensed the Lord against the Canaanites, and procured their utter extirpation. Jezebel was so zealous for the honour of this false religion, that she fed at her own table four hundred prophets belonging to the goddess Astarte; and her husband Ahab, in like manner, kept four hundred of Baal's prophets, as ministers of his false gods. (1 Kings xviii. 1. &c.) Jezebel seems to have undertaken the utter abolition of the worship of the Lord in Israel, by persecuting his prophets; and she would have destroyed them all, had not a part been saved by some good men. Elijah, who lived at this time, having brought fire from heaven on his burnt-offering in sight of Ahab and all Israel, assembled at Mount Carmel, and the people having killed four hundred and fifty of Baal's prophets, Jezebel sent to Elijah, and declared that the next day he should be dispatched. On hearing this he fled. (1 Kings xix. 1, &c.)

Some time after, Ahab was desirous of buying Naboth's vineyard, but met with a refusal from Naboth. Jezebel, therefore, wrote in the king's name to the principal men of Jezreel, and required them to accuse Naboth of blaspheming God and the king, and to punish him capitally. These orders were too punctually executed. Ahab, returning from Jezreel, was met by Elijah, who threatened his destruction in the name of God; and that Jezebel, who had been the cause of this evil, should be eaten by dogs in the portion of Jezreel, or, according to the Hebrew, by the outward wall of Jezreel. These predictions were verified, when Jehu son of Nimshi rebelled against Ahab. Jehu coming to Jezreel, Jezebel painted her eyes with antimony, to make them appear larger and blacker, decked her head with all her ornaments, and looking out of a window, which was in the apartment over the city-gate, and seeing Jehu as he entered riding in his chariot, she cried out, 'Had Zimri peace who slew his master?' Jehu, lifting up his head, asked who was there? Immediately, two or three eunuchs appeared, and Jehu bid them throw her down. They threw her out of the window, and she fell into the inclosure of the outward wall, where she was eaten by dogs. Jehu afterwards said, Go, see what is become of this unhappy woman, and bury her: for she is a king's daughter. They went, and found only her skull, her feet, and the palms of her hands.

JEZ'REEL, יִרְעֵאֵל, signifies seed of God, or distilling of contrition, or distilling of the friendship of God, or sprinkling of the pastor of God. Jezreel was a celebrated city in the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan, in the confines of that tribe and of Issachar. (Josh. xix. 18.) Ahab had a palace at this place; and this city is remarkable for the vengeance which God executed here on Jezebel. Eusebius and Jerome say, that it was a considerable town in their time. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 338.

JEZREEL was also the name of a city in the tribe of Judah. (Josh. xv. 56.) Sacred Geography.

JEZREEL, PLAIN of, or, of ESDRAELON, also called the GREAT PLAIN, and in Scripture, and elsewhere, 'the Great Plain, or Field of Esdraelon,' the 'Field of Megiddo,' the 'Galilean Plain,' and afterwards the 'Plain of Saba.' This plain is the Armageddon of the Apocalypse. It extends from Mount Carmel and the Mediterranean, to the place where the Jordan issues from the Sea of Tiberias, through the middle of the Holy Land. 'Here,' says Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'on this plain, the most fertile part of all the land of Canaan, (which, though a solitude, we found like one vast meadow, covered with the richest pasture,) the tribe of Issachar 'rejoiced in their tents.' (Deut. xxxiii. 18.)

'In the first ages of Jewish history, as well as during the Roman empire, the crusades, and even in later times, this plain has been the scene of many a memorable contest. Here it was that Barak, descending with his ten thousand men from Mount Tabor, discomfited 'Sisera, and all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron, and all the people that were with him,' gathered 'from Harosheth of the Gentiles, unto the river of Kishon;' when 'all the host of Sisera fell upon the edge of the sword, and there was not a man left,' when 'the kings came and fought, the kings of Canaan in Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo.' (Judg. iv. 13, 15, 16; v. 19.) Here also it was that Josiah, king of Judah, fought in disguise against Necho, king of Egypt, and fell by the arrows of his antagonist. (2 Kings xxiii. 29.) So great were the lamentations for his death, that the mourning for Josiah became 'an ordinance in Israel.' (2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25.) The 'great mourning in Jerusalem,' foretold by Zechariah, (xii. 11.) is said to be as the lamentations in the Plain of Esdraelon, or, according to the language of the prophet, 'as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.' Josephus often mentions this very remarkable part of the Holy Land, and always under the appellation of 'The Great Plain.' Under the same name it is also mentioned by Eusebius, and by St. Jerome. It has been a chosen place for encampment in every contest carried on in this country, from the days of Nebuchodonosor, king of the Assyrians, in the history of whose war with Arphaxad, it is mentioned as 'the great Plain of Esdrolom,' (Judith i. 8.) until the disastrous march of the late Napoleon Buonaparte from Egypt into Syria, Jews, Gentiles, Saracens, Christian crusaders, and anti-christian Frenchmen, Egyptians, Persians, Druses, Turks, and Arabs, warriors out of 'every nation which is under heaven,' have pitched their tents in the Plain of Esdraelon, and have beheld the various banners of their nations wet with the dews of Tabor and of Hermon.'

This plain is enclosed on all sides by mountains: the hills of Nazareth to the north,—those of Samaria to the south,—the mountains of Tabor and Hermon to the east,—and Carmel to the south-west.

In November 1823, the Rev. Mr. Jowett, counted in his road across this plain only five very small villages, consisting of wretched mud hovels, chiefly in ruins. The soil is stated to be extremely rich; and in every direction are the most picturesque views. The plain of Esdraelon now bears the name of Fooli, and has been celebrated in modern times by the victory which Murat gained over the Mamelukes and Arabs, in their attempt to relieve Acri or Acre, in April 1799. Mr. Jowett computes this plain to be at least fifteen miles square, making allowances for some apparent irregularities. Though it bears the title of 'Plain,' yet it abounds with hills, which in the view of it from the adjacent mountains, shrink into nothing. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 57. Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, pp. 191, 192, 301, 302. Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 255—258.

ILLYRICUM, Ἰλλυρικὸν, signifies exhilaration, or making joyful. Illyricum was a province lying to the north and north-west of Macedonia, along the eastern coast of the Adriatic Gulf, or Gulf of Venice. It was distinguished into two parts; Liburnia to the north, where is now Croatia: and Dalmatia to the south, which still retains the same name, and to which, as St. Paul informs Timothy, Titus went. (2 Tim. iv. 10.) St. Paul (Rom. xv. 19.) says, that he preached the Gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum. Wells's Geog. vol. ii. p. 279.

IMAGE, in a religious sense, is an artificial representation of some person or thing, used as an object of adoration, and is synonymous with idol. Nothing can be more clear, full, and distinct, than the expressions of Scripture prohibiting the making and worship of images. (Exod. xx. 4, 5. Deut. xvi. 22.) No sin is so strongly and repeatedly condemned in the Old Testament as that of idolatry, to which the Jews, in the early part of their history, were much addicted, and for which they were constantly punished. St. Paul was greatly affected when he saw that the city of Athens was 'wholly given to idolatry;' (Acts xvii. 16.) and he told the Athenians, that they ought not 'to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.' (Acts xvii. 29.) He condemns those who 'changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things.' (Rom. i. 23.)

That the first Christians had no images is evident from this circumstance, that they were reproached by the heathens, because they did not use them; and we find almost every ecclesiastical writer of the first four centuries arguing against the Gentile practice of image-worship, from the plain declaration of Scripture, and from the pure and spiritual nature of God. The introduction of images into places of Christian worship dates its origin soon after the times of Constantine the Great: but the earlier Christians reprobated every species of image-worship in the strongest language. When the empress Constantia desired Eusebius to send her the image of Jesus Christ, he expostulated with her on the impropriety and absurdity of her requisition: 'What kind of image of Christ,' says he, 'does your imperial majesty wish to have conveyed to you? Is it the image of his real and immutable nature; or is it that which he assumed for our sakes, when he was veiled in the form of a servant? With respect to the former, I presume you are not to learn, that "no man hath known the Son but the Father, neither hath any man known the Father, but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." But you ask for the image of Christ, when he appeared in human form, clothed in a body similar to our own. Let me inform you that the body is now blended with the glory of the Deity, and all that was mortal in it is absorbed in life.'

Paulinus, who died bishop of Nola, in 431, caused the walls of a place of worship to be painted with stories taken out of the Old Testament, that the people might thence receive instruction. It is probable, that the introduction of images into churches was first done to preserve the remembrance, and do honour to the memory of departed saints; but it was impossible to look at these interesting representations, standing in places consecrated to the worship of God, without feeling some degree of respect, which was gradually heightened into reverence, and at last ended in absolute worship. In the eighth century began the famous controversy respecting the breaking of images, which was carried on for more than a hundred years with the greatest eagerness and animosity, both in the east and in the west. Different popes, and different councils, espoused different sides of the question; but at length, after much uncertainty, and fluctuation of opposite interests, those who contended for the lawfulness of worshipping images prevailed; and from that time image-worship has been an established doctrine of the church of Rome. By what is called the seventh general council, held at Nice, about the close of the eighth century, it was decreed, 'that holy images of the cross should be consecrated, and put on the sacred vessels and vestments, and upon walls and boards, in private houses and in public ways. And especially that there should be erected images of the Lord God, our Saviour Jesus Christ, of our blessed Lady the mother of God, of the venerable angels, and of all the saints. And that whosoever should presume to think or teach otherwise, or to throw away any painted books, or the figure of the cross, or any image or picture, or any genuine relics of the martyrs, they should, if bishops or clergymen, be deposed; and, if monks or laymen, be excommunicated.' It was also decreed by the council of Trent, the last general council, that 'due worship should be given to images.'

It is sometimes pretended by the papists, that they do not worship the images, but God through the medium of images; or that the worship which they pay to images is inferior to that which they pay to the Deity himself. These distinctions would be scarcely understood by the common people, and formerly an enlightened heathen or Jew would probably have urged the same thing. But idolatry, in general, is condemned in Scripture; and all use of images in the worship of God, making or bowing to any likeness, is absolutely forbidden. See ICONOCLASTÆ. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. p. 354; White's Bampton Lectures, Notes, p. 3; Jones's Hist. of the Waldenses, p. 252.

IMMORTALITY. God is absolutely immortal, he cannot die. Angels are immortal; but God, who made them, can terminate their being. Man is immortal in part, that is in his spirit; but his body dies. Inferior creatures are not immortal; they die wholly. Thus the principle of immortality is differently communicated, according to the will of him who can render any creature immortal, by prolonging its life; who can confer immortality on the body of man, together with his soul; and who maintains angels in immortality, by maintaining them in holiness. Holiness is the root of immortality; but only God is absolutely holy, as only God is absolutely immortal. All imperfection is a deduction on the principle of immortality. Only God is absolutely perfect, and, therefore, absolutely immortal. See FUTURE STATE. Supplemen. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

INCEST, the crime of unnatural commerce with a person within the degrees forbidden. In the beginning of the world, and again long after the deluge, marriages between near relations were allowed. In the time of Abraham and Isaac, these marriages were permitted. Some authors believe, that such marriages were allowed, or at least tolerated, till the time of Moses, who first prohibited them among the Hebrews: and that among other people they were allowed even after him.

'In order to preserve chastity in families, and between persons of different sexes, brought up and living together in a state of unreserved intimacy, it is necessary, by every method possible, to inculcate an abhorrence of incestuous conjunctions; which abhorrence can only be upheld by the absolute reprobation of all commerce of the sexes between near relations. Upon this principle, the marriage, as well as other cohabitations of brothers and sisters, of lineal kindred, and of all who usually live in the same family, may be said to be forbidden by the law of nature. Restrictions which extend to remoter degrees of kindred than what this reason makes it necessary to prohibit from intermarriage, are founded in the authority of the positive law which ordains them, and can only be justified by their tendency to diffuse wealth, to connect families, or to promote some political advantage. The Levitical law, which is received in this country, and from which the rule of the Roman law differs very little, prohibits marriages between relations, within three degrees of kindred; computing the generations, not from, but through the common ancestor, and accounting affinity the same as consanguinity. The issue, however, of such marriages are not bastardized, unless the parents be divorced during their life-time.' Paley's Moral and Polit. Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 311, 312.

INDEPENDENTS were formerly a distinct sect, but now comprehend the members of various denominations, as far as respects church government and discipline. They are called Independents, from maintaining that all Christian congregations are so many independent religious societies; or, that each congregation of Christians which meets in one house, for public worship, is a complete church; has sufficient power to perform every thing relating to ecclesiastical government within itself; and is in no respect subject or accountable to other churches. The founder of the Independents was a Mr. John Robinson, of Norfolk, 'a man who had much of the solemn piety of the times, and was master of a congregation of Brownists that had settled at Leyden. This well-meaning man, perceiving the defects that reigned in the discipline of Brown, and in the spirit and temper of his followers, employed his zeal and diligence in correcting them, and in modelling anew the society, in such a manner as to render it less odious to his adversaries, and less liable to the just censure of those true Christians, who looked upon charity as the end of the commandment. The Independents, accordingly, were much more commendable than the Brownists in two respects,—they surpassed them both in the moderation of their sentiments, and in the order of their discipline.'

A Mr. Henry Jacobs, who had fled to Holland, in consequence of archbishop Bancroft's active exertions against the Puritans, meeting with Mr. Robinson in that country, embraced his sentiments respecting church discipline; and, returning to England, established the first Independent or Congregational Church here in 1616.

Independency, however, 'made at first but a very small progress in England: it worked its way slowly, and in a clandestine manner; and its members concealed their principles from public view, to avoid the penal laws that had been enacted against non-conformists. But during the reign of Charles I., when, amidst the shocks of civil and religious discords, the authority of the Bishops and the cause of Episcopacy began to decline, and more particularly about the year 1640, the Independents grew more courageous, and came forth, with an air of resolution and confidence, to public view. After this period, their affairs took a prosperous turn; and in a little time they became so considerable, both by their numbers, and by the reputation that they acquired, that they vied in point of pre-eminence and credit, not only with the Bishops, but also with the Presbyterians, though at this time in the very zenith of their power. This rapid progress of the Independents was, no doubt, owing to a variety of causes; among which justice obliges us to reckon the learning of their teachers, and the regularity and sanctity of their manners. During the administration of Cromwell, whose peculiar protection and patronage they enjoyed on more than one account, their credit rose to the greatest height, and their influence and reputation were universal: but after the restoration of Charles II., their cause declined, and they fell back gradually into their primitive obscurity. The sect, indeed, still subsisted; but in such a state of dejection and weakness, as engaged them in the year 1691, under the reign of King William, to enter into an association with the Presbyterians residing in and about London, under certain heads of agreement, that tended to the maintenance of their respective institutions.'

At that era, the Independents and Presbyterians, called, from their association, the United Brethren, were generally Calvinists, and differed only with respect to ecclesiastical discipline. At present, though the English Independents and Presbyterians form two distinct parties of Protestant dissenters, they are distinguished by very trifling differences with regard to church government. Indeed, the distinguishing tenet of the Independents is maintained, with some shades of difference, not only by the three classes of Protestant Dissenters in England, in general, but also by the Sandemanians in England, by their brethren the Glassites, and by both classes of Baptists in Scotland. That which unites them, or rather which distinguishes them from other denominations of Christians, is their disclaiming, more or less, every form of union between churches, and assigning to each congregation the exclusive government of itself. The religious doctrines of the Independents, properly so called, are, in general, strictly Calvinistic. However, many of the Independents, both at home and abroad, reject the use of all creeds and confessions drawn up by fallible men; and they merely require of their teachers a declaration of their belief in the truth of the Gospel and its leading doctrines, and of their adherence to the Scriptures as the sole standard of faith and practice, and the only criterion of faith. Some of them are said to require from all persons, who wish to be admitted into their communion, an account, either verbal or written, of what is called their experience; in which not only a declaration of their faith in the Lord Jesus, and their purpose, by grace, to devote themselves to him, is expected, but also a recital of the means by which they were led to a knowledge and profession of the Gospel.

The public worship of the Independents, which is conducted without form or ceremony, differs little from that of the Presbyterians. The Independents consider it as their right to choose their own ministers and deacons; and though they attribute no virtue to ordination, by imposition of hands, as conveying any new powers, yet it is allowed and practised by them. Many of them, indeed, suppose, that the essence of ordination does not lie in the act of the ministers who assist, but in the choice and call of the people, and in the candidate's acceptance of that call; and hence their ordination may be considered only as a public declaration of that agreement.

It might be well that the term Independents were universally disclaimed and laid aside, as the name of a sect; for other denominations may, perhaps, have as good a right to it as the one that has been distinguished by it. No one, I presume, would assume it to the prejudice of their dependence on our Lord and Saviour; and, with respect to the influence of men, Presbyterians, or Episcopalians, may, in fact, have the advantage of Independents, and their ministers be more independent of their brethren, than theirs are, as they doubtless are more independent of their people. "In no one instance," says a late writer, "does the Independent plan appear to have a solid foundation, either in Scripture or antiquity; yet the interference of the people, and the share of authority exercised by them, gives some plausible colour to Independency." Milner's Hist. of the Church of Christ, vol. i. p. 587; Apologia, or Four Letters to a Minister of an Independent Church, p. 134—136; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 529, &c.; Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. p. 306—318; iii. p. 49, &c.

INDEPENDENTS, SCOTTISH, or NEW INDEPENDENTS. John Glas gave rise to Independency in Scotland, about the year 1728, since which time the Baptists, and some other parties professing Independency, have arisen, and become pretty numerous. Within the last five and thirty years, the controversy between Presbyterians and Independents has been revived, and is still carried on with energy and spirit. Within this period, a numerous body of Independents has arisen, whose ideas of union and discipline are perhaps more mild and accommodating than those of the churches which had previously been collected, and which possess a greater combination of those talents that excite attention, and give influence to religious parties. The members of this new sect profess to be wholly unconnected with any other society of Independents; and their exertions and publications seem to have raised some degree of jealousy in the minds of the established clergy of Scotland, whose attention has been employed in defending the order and constitution of their church against the renewed attacks of the Independents.

In December, 1797, Robert Haldane, esq., a gentleman of much respectability, and possessed of an ample fortune in Scotland, formed a "Society for propagating the Gospel at Home." The object of this society was to send forth men to preach the Gospel in those parts of Scotland where they conceived that this blessing was not enjoyed in its purity, or where it was not regularly dispensed. Adopting the opinion, that it is the right, nay the paramount duty, of every Christian who knows the Gospel, and is duly qualified, to preach it to his fellow sinners, James Haldane, esq., brother of Mr. Robert Haldane, Mr. Aikman, and others, travelled through the greater part of Scotland, and preached the Gospel to their countrymen. Wherever they went, they invariably adhered to 'make the word of God without charge;' and as they had freely received, freely to give. In a short time, the Messrs. Haldanes separated from the church of Scotland; and soon after, Messrs. Innes and Ewing, both ministers in the national church, resigned their charges, and united with them and their associates in preaching the Gospel throughout the kingdom. A distinct society was soon formed, at the head of which were the Messrs. Haldanes; and hence its members have been also called Haldanites, or Haldanite Independents. Large places of public worship, denominated Tabernacles, were erected, at Mr. Robert Haldane's expense, in the principal towns, where the word of God was declared to numerous assemblies, both by those ministers and others from various denominations in England. At the expense chiefly, if not solely, of Mr. R. Haldane, academies were also formed at Edinburgh, Dundee, and Glasgow, for the education of young men for the work of the ministry; who, when deemed qualified for preaching the Gospel, were to be employed as itinerants, under the inspection and countenance of the "Society for propagating the Gospel at Home." Thus a succession of teachers was secured; and so well was their plan founded and administered, that, while their wants were duly supplied, it presented no temptation to any to embark in the cause, whose avarice was greater than their zeal for doing good.

The doctrines of the Scottish Independents are Calvinistic; and they reject all articles of faith or creeds of human composition. They say, that the Scriptures are a divine and infallible standard; and that consistent Independents dare not adopt any other. They insist, that the Scriptures contain a full and complete model and system of doctrine, government, discipline, and worship; and that in them we may find an universal rule for the direction of Christians in their associated state, as well as all necessary instructions for the faith and practice of individuals. They require Scripture for every thing, even for such things as could not be contained in Scripture. Hence they reject the authority of the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and receive the Scriptures, and nothing else, as binding in the worship of God. They conceive the church of Christ, as exhibited in Scripture, to be an association which has no head on earth, and which, as a body, can receive no laws from any one, except from Christ alone. They say, that the kingdom of Jesus is spiritual, neither interfering with human governments, nor admitting their interference in its peculiar concerns; and while they teach obedience to the civil magistrate in all civil matters, in religion they acknowledge no human authority whatever. They profess to see an inconsistency in every form of national religion with the New Testament; nay, they consider a civil establishment of religion as 'the very essence of Antichrist.' They lay it down as a fundamental principle, that a Christian church ought to consist of believers, or of those who give evidence of their knowing and believing the Gospel, united together in the profession of its truths, and walking agreeably to them; that it ought to be directed in its discipline and order by the Scriptures only; and that all Christians, of all ages, are bound to observe the universal and approved practices of the first churches, as recorded in Scripture. The congregations already formed have adopted all the ordinances which they judge to have been observed by the apostolical churches; and the practices they do not follow are—the community of goods in the church at Jerusalem, observing the Lord's Supper daily, love feasts, and washing one another's feet. They differ from the more early Independents, in admitting Christians of all religious denominations to communicate with them in the Lord's Supper, provided they have reason to think them real Christians; and in considering all association of ministers, for giving counsel and advice to the churches in matters of doubt, as unnecessary and unscriptural.

With respect to church government, the members of this denomination are Independents in the strictest sense of the word, and believe, that the apostolical churches, according to the model to which it is their great and professed object to conform, were entirely independent, none of them being subject to any foreign jurisdiction, but each one governed by its own rulers and by no other laws than those written in the word of God. They say, that a true church of Christ is a society formed for the same purpose as the churches planted by the apostles, and whose constitution is the same as theirs. A deviation in these particulars renders it unworthy of the name. According to them, when the word church in Scripture, in its religious sense, does not denote a single congregation of saints, it always refers to the whole body or kingdom of Christ, part of which is in heaven, and part on earth; which body does not constitute two churches, a visible and an invisible, but one church or family, consisting of different parts. They admit that all churches, that is, congregations, are connected together as being Christ's subjects; but they insist that they are dependent only on their King, in whose hands the Supreme authority rests. While they teach that Independent churches have no authority over each other, they allow that they may receive the advantage of each other's opinion on any matter of importance. They conceive that bishop and elder were, in apostolic times, synonymous terms, that the stated officers in all the churches then were elders and deacons, and, of course, that they are the only offices essential to a church of Christ. With them every elder is a preacher; and they conceive there is no difference, in any respect, between elder and deacon, except in the offices to which they are appointed. They insist that ordination is not represented in Scripture as conveying an office, or giving any person a right to discharge that office; it is only the manner of setting him apart to discharge the duties of his office, and recommending him to the grace of the great Head of the church. It gives him no jurisdiction in any church, except in that which appointed him; and as soon as he lays down, or is removed from, his office in that church, his ordination is at an end. They contend, that there is a distinction of departments in the pastoral office, and that teaching and ruling are different branches of that office. Both elders and deacons are ordained by imposition of hands; and though ordination is part of the elder's province, yet, when churches are newly formed, or in other cases of necessity, they allow that the members, who have always the right of election, may ordain church officers for themselves, or, at least, set them apart to their respective offices. They say, that the legislative authority belongs exclusively to Christ, and is already exercised in his word; they, therefore, disavow all right to make laws, but admit a right to judge of the application of Christ's laws, and a right to execute those laws, when judged applicable to any particular case. The first belongs to Jesus alone; the second to the whole church; and the third, to the rulers or elders of the church, who may, therefore, be called the executive officers of the church. The power claimed by the whole church, that is, rulers and ruled, is not to make laws, but to judge of their application. The power claimed by rulers is not to propose that their opinions should be passed into laws, but to carry into execution the laws of Christ, when judged applicable by the church. If the meanest member can point out a misapplication of the law, they are bound to hear. If ever such a difference shall arise as to cause a separation, it is not the majority that constitute the church, but those of them who are obedient to the laws of Christ.

The Scottish Independents use no form of prayer; and public worship, in other respects, is conducted in their congregations in much the same manner as in the established kirks. The Independents, however, read a large but indefinite portion of the Scriptures at each meeting; in many of their chapels they use Dr. Watts's version of the Psalms; and in most of them they stand while singing the praises of God. They adopt weekly communions; and as they make no real distinction between clergy and laity, the want or absence of elders and deacons, on any occasion, in any of their chapels, is not thought a sufficient reason for preventing the administration of the holy communion on the first day of the week. They contend that, by the approved practice of apostolic churches, it is demonstrated to be the appointment of Christ, that his churches must observe the Lord's Supper every first day of the week. A division has taken place among these Independents, chiefly in consequence of Mr. Haldane's adoption of Baptist Principles, and introduction of church discipline, and of mutual exhortation and prayer by the brethren, into the public service on Sunday mornings. Haldane's View of Social Worship, p. 100, &c. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. p. 260—283.

INDULGENCES. In the primitive church very severe penalties were inflicted on those who had been guilty of any sins, whether public or private; and, in particular, they were forbidden to partake, for a certain time, of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or to hold any communion with the church. General rules were formed upon these subjects; but as it was often found expedient to make a discrimination in the degrees of punishment, according to the different circumstances of the offenders, and especially when they showed marks of contrition and repentance, power was given to bishops, by the council of Nice, to relax or remit those punishments as they should see reason. Every favour of this kind was called an Indulgence or Pardon. Such a power was in itself unobjectionable; and it is obvious, that if it had been wisely exercised, it might have been productive of great benefit to the cause of religion. After the bishops had enjoyed this privilege for some centuries, and had begun to abuse it, the popes discovered that in their own hands it might be rendered a powerful instrument to promote both their ambition and their avarice. They could not but perceive that if they could persuade men that they had the power of granting pardon for sin, it would give them a complete influence over their consciences; and if they could at the same time prevail upon them to purchase these pardons for money, it must add greatly to the wealth of the Roman see. In the eleventh century, therefore, when the dominion of the popes was rising to its zenith, and their power was almost irresistible, they took to themselves the exclusive prerogative of dispensing Indulgences, which they carried to a most unwarrantable length. Instead of confining them, according to their original institution, to the ordinary purposes of ecclesiastical discipline, they extended them to the punishment of the wicked in the world to come; instead of shortening the duration of earthly penance, they pretended that they could deliver men from the pains of Purgatory; instead of allowing them gratuitously, and upon just grounds, to the penitent offender, they sold them in the most open and corrupt manner to the profligate and abandoned, who still continued in their vices. They did not scruple to call these Indulgences a plenary remission of all sins, past, present, and future, and to offer them as a certain and immediate passport from the troubles of this world to the eternal joys of heaven. To give some sort of colour and support to this infamous traffic, they confidently asserted, that the superabundant merits of Christ, and of his faithful servants, formed a fund of which the pope was the sole manager; and that he could, at his own discretion, dispense those merits, as the sure means of procuring pardon from God, in any proportion, for any species of wickedness, and to any person he pleased. The bare statement of this doctrine is a sufficient refutation of it; and it is scarcely necessary to add, that it has no foundation whatever in Scripture. It is an arrogant and impious usurpation of a power which belongs to God alone; and it has an obvious tendency to promote licentiousness and sin of every description, by holding out an easy and certain method of absolution.

The popes derived very large sums from the sale of these indulgences; and it is well known that the gross abuses practised in granting them were among the immediate and principal causes of bringing about the Reformation. They continued to the last to be sold at Rome, and were to be purchased by any who were weak enough to buy them, whether Protestants or Papists. The sums required for indulgences were first published by Anthony Egane, a Franciscan friar, in 1673; and the original pamphlet was re-published by Baron Maseres, in 1809, in his last volume of 'Occasional Essays.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1019, note; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. pp. 351—354.

INFALLIBILITY, the quality of not being subject to deception or mistake. The infallibility of the church of Rome has been one of the greatest controversies between the Protestants and the Papists. By this infallibility is understood, that the church of Rome cannot at any time cease to be orthodox in her doctrine, or fall into any pernicious errors; but that she is constituted, by Divine authority, the judge of all controversies in religion, and that all Christians are obliged to acquiesce in her decisions. It is observable, that the church of Rome existed many centuries before any mention was made of infallibility, though it had frequent disputes with other churches from a very early period. This doctrine was afterwards asserted and received; and its long and general prevalence is, perhaps, the strongest instance, which can be produced from the annals of the world, of the presumption and artifice of one set of men, and of the blindness and credulity of another. After infallibility became an established tenet of the church of Rome, a difference of opinion has existed among Papists, whether it is vested in the popes themselves, when they pronounce their decrees ex cathedra, or in general councils. This very doubt is a sufficient argument against the thing itself, since wherever so important and distinguished a privilege as infallibility resided, it could not but be manifest and apparent; and we may conclude, that if it had pleased God to place such a power in any part of his church, he would have distinctly pointed out the persons in whom that power was to be found. If infallibility belonged to the whole church collectively, or to any individual part of it, it must be prominent and conspicuous, that no mistake or doubt could exist on the subject; it must have prevented those dissensions, contests, heresies, and schisms, which have abounded among Christians from the days of the apostles to the present times; and of which that very church, which is the assertor and patron of this doctrine, has had its full share. Many popes, in their bulls and other public instruments, have themselves laid claim to their own personal infallibility in the most arrogant and blasphemous manner. Yet, as Bishop Burnet observes, the papacy for more than 800 years, as it is represented by their own writers, is, perhaps, the worst succession of men to be found in history. This monstrous doctrine of infallibility is now so universally reprobated, as being repugnant to the nature of man, as unfounded in Scripture, as inconsistent with God's general government of the world, as unsupported by miracles or any other authentic sign, and as clearly refuted by the opposite and contrary decisions of different popes, that it is unnecessary to add any thing farther on the subject. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. ii. pp. 329, 330. 345. Buck's Theological Dictionary, vol. i. p. 415.

INQUISITION, a tribunal erected by the popes in several Roman Catholic countries, for the examination and punishment of heretics. It was not till about the year 1200, the papal chair being then filled by Innocent III., that the terms 'Inquisition into heresy,' and 'Inquisitor,' were much, if at all, heard of. As the bishops and the vicars were not, in the opinion of the pope, either so fit or so diligent in the extirpation of heresy as he thought necessary, two new orders of regulars were at this time instituted, namely, those of St. Dominic and St. Francis. To St. Dominic the honour of first erecting this extraordinary court is commonly ascribed. At first, however, it was not on the same footing on which it afterwards settled, and on which it has since continued. The first inquisitors were vested with a double capacity, not very happily united in the same persons: one was that of preachers, to convince the heretics by argument; the other, that of persecutors, to instigate magistrates to employ every method of extirpating the refractory, that is, all who were so unreasonable as not to be convinced by the sound reasoning of those merciless fanatics and wretched sophisters. At first, also, the inquisitors had no tribunals: they merely inquired after heretics, their number, strength, and riches. When they had detected them, they informed the bishops, who, at that time, had the sole power of judging in ecclesiastical affairs, and whom they urged to anathematize, banish, or otherwise chastise, such heretical persons as they brought before them. Sometimes they excited princes to arm their subjects against the heretics; and at other times they inflamed the rabble, whom they themselves headed, to take up arms, and unite in extirpating them. Such as they could induce to devote themselves to this service, obtained the title of crusaders, and were distinguished by a cross of cloth affixed to their garments. The efforts of the inquisitors were greatly assisted by the emperor of the Romans, Frederick II., who, in 1224, promulgated four edicts of the most ferocious and sanguinary description against heretics. These edicts were approved and confirmed by the pope, and inserted in his bulls; and, in process of time, the persecuting spirit which pervades them became gradually incorporated into the laws of almost every country in Europe.

After the death of Frederick, which happened about the middle of the thirteenth century, Pope Innocent IV. remaining sole arbiter of the affairs of Lombardy and other parts of Italy, set himself diligently to extirpate heresy, which of late had exceedingly increased; and considering the labour which had been employed in this service by the Franciscan and Dominican friars, whose zeal, unrestrained by either respect of persons or the fear of dangers, by any regard to justice or the feelings of humanity, had recommended them highly to the pontiff, he cheerfully availed himself of their ardour to second his efforts. Preaching was found of little avail, and even the enlisting of crusaders and inflicting military execution was suspended for the sake of erecting in different countries standing tribunals, armed with tremendous authority, but charged solely with the purgation of heretical pravity. To obviate an objection started against the establishment of these novel tribunals, the pope enacted that the tribunal should consist of the inquisitor and bishop of the place. The inquisitor, however, was not only to be the principal, but in reality every thing; and the bishop had little more than the name of judge. To give at least the appearance of authority to the secular powers, they were allowed to appoint the subordinate officers to the inquisition, but still subject to the approbation of the inquisitors; they were also allowed to send with the inquisitor, when he should go into the country, one of their assessors, whom the inquisitor should choose. Of all the property belonging to heretics which they should be enabled to confiscate, a third part was to go to the community, in return for which the community was to defray the whole expense of keeping the prisons, and supporting the prisoners. The infliction of the legal punishment was also vested in the magistrate, after trial and condemnation by the inquisitors: but that was so much a matter of course, and which he well knew he could not avoid executing without incurring the vengeance of the church, that, in fact, it only converted him into the executioner of a spiritual judge.

Such was the footing on which 'the holy office' was placed in the year 1251, in the ecclesiastical states of Italy; and it was afterwards extended to more distant provinces, and every where entrusted to the management of Dominican friars: thirty-one rules or articles, defining their jurisdiction and powers, and regulating the procedure of this spiritual court of judicature, were devised; and all rulers and magistrates were commanded, by a papal bull, issued for the purpose, to give, under pain of excommunication, the most punctual obedience, and every possible assistance to this holy court. It was not, however, in the power of the pope to obtain the establishment of this tribunal in many of the most populous countries subject to the see of Rome. The difficulties arose partly from the conduct of the inquisitors, their inordinate severity, their unbounded extortion and avarice, and the propensity they showed, on every occasion, to extend, beyond measure, their own authority. Indeed, under one pretext or another, they were making rapid strides to engross all the criminal jurisdiction of the magistrate; for they insisted that under the head of heresy were included infidelity, blasphemy, perjury, sorcery, poisoning, bigamy, and usury! In Spain and Portugal this scourge and disgrace of humanity existed for centuries, with its most frightful aspect; in Rome, it was much more tolerable. Happily for mankind, this diabolical tribunal has ceased to exist in many countries where it had been erected; and the final erasure of the Inquisition from the face of the earth, is a matter extremely to be desired. At present, however, it still exists in some parts; and at Goa, a Portuguese settlement in Asia, it wears all the terrific features which it has assumed in any country. INSPIRATION, in the highest sense, is the immediate communication of knowledge to the human mind by the Spirit of God; but the word is commonly used by divines, in a less strict and proper sense, to denote such a degree of divine influence, assistance, and guidance, as enabled the authors of the Scriptures to communicate religious knowledge to others, without error or mistake, whether the subjects of such communication were things then immediately revealed to those who declared them, or things with which they were before acquainted. When it is said, that Scripture is Divinely inspired, we are not to understand that God suggested every word, or dictated every expression. From the different styles in which the books are written, and from the different manner in which the same events are related and predicted by different authors, it appears that the sacred penmen were permitted to write as their several tempers, understandings, and habits of life, directed; and that the knowledge communicated to them by inspiration on the subject of their writings, was applied in the same manner as any knowledge acquired by ordinary means. Nor is it to be supposed that they were even thus inspired in every fact which they related, or in every precept which they delivered. They were left to the common use of their faculties, and did not, upon every occasion, stand in need of supernatural communication; but whenever, and as far as, divine assistance was necessary, it was always afforded. We perceive that in different parts of Scripture were different sorts and degrees of Inspiration. God enabled Moses to give an account of the creation of the world; Joshua to record with exactness the settlement of the Israelites in the land of Canaan; David to mingle prophetic information with the varied effusions of gratitude, contrition, and piety; Solomon to deliver wise instructions for the regulation of human life; Isaiah to deliver predictions concerning the future Saviour of mankind; and Ezra to collect the sacred Scriptures into one authentic volume: 'but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.' (1 Cor. xii. 11.) In some cases, Inspiration only produced correctness and accuracy in relating past occurrences, or in reciting the words of others; in other cases, it communicated ideas not only new and unknown before, but infinitely beyond the reach of unassisted human intellect; and, sometimes, inspired prophets delivered, for the use of future ages, predictions which they did not themselves comprehend, and which could not be fully understood till they were accomplished. But whatever distinctions are made with respect to the sorts, degrees, or modes of Inspiration, we may rest assured that one property belongs to every inspired writing, namely, that it is free from error, that is, any material error. This property must be considered as extending to the whole of each of those writings, of which a part only is inspired; for it is not to be supposed that God would suffer any such errors, as might tend to mislead our faith or pervert our practice, to be mixed with those truths which he himself has mercifully revealed to his rational creatures as the means of their eternal salvation. In this restricted sense it may be asserted, that the sacred writers always wrote under the influence, or guidance, or care, of the Holy Spirit, which sufficiently establishes the truth and divine authority of all Scripture.

That the authors of the historical books of the Old Testament were occasionally inspired, is certain, since they frequently display an acquaintance with the counsels and designs of God, and often reveal his future dispensations in the clearest predictions. But though it is evident that the sacred historians sometimes wrote under the immediate operation of the Holy Spirit, it does not follow that they derived from Revelation the knowledge of those things which might be collected from the common sources of human intelligence. It is sufficient to believe, that by the general superintendence of the Holy Spirit, they were directed in the choice of their materials, enlightened to judge of the truth and importance of those accounts from which they borrowed their information, and prevented from recording any material error. Indeed, the historical books appear, from internal evidence, to have been chiefly written by persons contemporary with the periods to which they relate; who, in their description of characters and events, many of which they witnessed, uniformly exhibit a strict sincerity of intention, and an unexampled impartiality. Some of these books, however, were compiled in subsequent times from the sacred annals mentioned in Scripture as written by prophets or seers, and from those public records, and other authentic documents, which, though written by uninspired men, were held in high estimation, and preserved with great care by persons specially appointed as keepers of the genealogies and public archives of the Jewish nation. It is not necessary to be able to distinguish the inspired from the uninspired parts of the historical books of the Old Testament. It is enough for us to know, that every writer of the Old Testament was inspired, and that the whole of the history it contains, without any exception or reserve, is true. These points being ascertained and allowed, it is of very little consequence whether the knowledge of a particular fact was obtained by any of the ordinary modes of information, or whether it was communicated by immediate revelation from God; whether any particular passage was written by the natural powers of the historian, or by the positive suggestion of the Holy Spirit. Whatever uncertainty may exist concerning the direct inspiration of any historical narrative, or of any moral precept, contained in the Old Testament, we must be fully convinced that all its prophetic parts proceeded from God. This is continually affirmed by the prophets themselves, and is demonstrated by the indubitable testimony which history bears to the accurate fulfilment of many of these predictions; others are gradually receiving their accomplishment in the times in which we live, and afford the surest pledge and most positive security for the completion of those which remain to be fulfilled.

If the books of the Old Testament, which relate to the partial and temporary religion of the Jews, were written under the direction and superintendence of God himself, surely we cannot but conclude the same of the books of the New Testament, which contain the religion of all mankind. The apostles were constant attendants upon our Saviour during his ministry; and they were not only present at his public preaching, but after addressing himself to the multitudes in parables and similitudes, 'when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples,' (Mark iv. 34.) He also showed himself alive to the apostles, after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen by them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. (Acts i. 3.) Yet, our Saviour foresaw that these instructions, delivered to the apostles as men, and impressed on the mind in the ordinary manner, would not qualify them for the great work of propagating his religion. It was, therefore, promised, that the Holy Ghost should not only bring all things to their remembrance, which the apostles had heard from their divine Master; but he was also to guide them into all truth, to teach them all things, and to abide with them for ever: that is, the Holy Ghost was to enable them to recollect every thing which they had been taught by Christ, and was likewise to furnish them with all the additional knowledge which might be necessary respecting Christianity; and, moreover, this divine Instructor and Guide was, by his constant superintendence, to direct and assist them in communicating that knowledge to others. It is material to remark, that these promises of supernatural instruction and assistance plainly show the insufficiency of common instruction, and the necessity of Inspiration in the first teachers of the Gospel; and we are positively assured that these promises were accurately fulfilled. Of the eight writers of the New Testament, five were among these inspired preachers of the word of God; and therefore, if we admit the genuineness and authenticity of the books ascribed to them, no reasonable doubt can be entertained of their Inspiration. Indeed, if we believe that God sent Christ into the world to found an universal religion, and that by the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost he empowered the apostles to propagate the Gospel, as stated in these books, we cannot but believe that he would, by his immediate interposition, enable those whom he appointed to record the Gospel, for the use of future ages, to write without the omission of any important truth, or the insertion of any material error. The assurance that the Spirit should abide with the apostles for ever, must necessarily imply a constant Inspiration, without change or intermission, whenever they exercised the office of a teacher of the Gospel, whether by writing or by speaking. Though St. Mark and St. Luke were not of the twelve apostles, nor were they miraculously called, like St. Paul, to the office of apostles, yet we have the strongest reason to believe that they were partakers of the extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit granted to the disciples of Christ; and such was the unanimous opinion of the primitive Christians. Besides, a perfect harmony exists between the doctrines delivered by St. Mark and St. Luke, and by the other writers of the New Testament. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive it possible that God would suffer four Gospels to be transmitted, as a rule of faith and practice, to all succeeding generations, two of which were written under the immediate dictation of his Holy Spirit, and the other two by the unassisted powers of the human intellect. It seems impossible that St. John, who wrote his Gospel more than thirty years after the death of Christ, should have been able, by the natural power of his memory, to recollect those numerous discourses of our Saviour which he has related. Indeed, all the evangelists must have stood in need of the promised assistance of the Holy Ghost to bring to remembrance the things which Christ had said during his ministry. We are to consider St. Luke in writing the Acts of the Apostles, and the Apostles themselves in writing the Epistles, as under a similar guidance and direction. St. Paul, in several passages of his Epistles, asserts his own Inspiration in the most positive and unequivocal terms. The agreement which subsists between the Epistles of St. Paul and the other writings of the New Testament, is also a decisive proof that they all proceeded from one and the self-same Spirit. It appears, however, that the apostles had some certain method, though utterly unknown to us, of distinguishing that knowledge, which was the effect of Inspiration, from the ordinary suggestions and conclusions of their own reason.

'Maintaining that the apostles were under the infallible direction of the Holy Spirit, as to every religious sentiment contained in their writings, secures the same advantages as would result from supposing that every word and letter was dictated to them by his influences, without being liable to those objections which might be made against that view of the subject. As the Spirit preserved them from all error in what they have taught and recorded, their writings are of the same authority, importance, and use to us, as if he had dictated every syllable contained in them. If the Spirit had guided their pens in such a manner, that they had been only mere machines under his direction, we could have had no more in their writings than a perfect rule, as to all religious opinions and duties, all matters of faith and practice. But such a perfect rule we have in the New Testament, if we consider them as under the Spirit's infallible guidance in all the religious sentiments they express, whether he suggested the very words in which they are written, or not. Upon this view of the subject, the inspired writings contain a perfect and infallible account of the whole will of God for our salvation; of all that is necessary for us to know, believe, and practise in religion: and what can they contain more than this, upon any other view of it? Parry's Enquiry into the nature and extent of the Inspiration of the Apostles, and other Writers of the New Testament; Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 21, &c.; 280, &c. Watson's Theological Tracts, vol. iv. p. 469.

INTERIM, the name of a formulary or confession of faith, obtruded on the Protestants, after the death of Luther, by the emperor Charles Vth, when he had defeated their forces. It obtained the name of the Interim, because it contained temporary regulations, which were to continue no longer in force than till a free general council could be held. This system was compiled by Pflug, Holding, and Agricola, of whom the former two were dignitaries in the Romish church, but remarkable for their pacific and healing spirit; the last was a Protestant divine, suspected, not without reason, of having been gained, by bribes and promises, to betray or mislead his party on this occasion. The treatise contained a complete system of theology, conformable, in almost every article, to the tenets of the Romish church, though expressed, for the most part, in the softest words, or in Scriptural phrases, or in terms of studied ambiguity. However, every doctrine peculiar to popery was retained, and the observance of all the rites, which the Protestants condemned as inventions of men introduced into the worship of God, was enjoined. With regard to two points only, some relaxation in the rigour of opinion, as well as some latitude in the practice, was admitted. Such ecclesiastics as had married, and would not put away their wives, were allowed, nevertheless, to perform all the functions of the sacred office; and those provinces which had been accustomed to partake of the cup, as well as of the bread, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, were still indulged in the privilege of receiving both. Even these were declared to be concessions for the sake of peace, and granted only for a season, in compliance with the weakness or prejudices of their countrymen. This system was presented by the emperor to the diet at Augsburg, May 15, 1548; and Charles had sufficient influence to obtain a kind of extorted or tacit consent that it should be received and enforced as a general system of faith throughout the German empire. It proved, however, equally disgusting to papists and protestants; and whilst the Lutheran divines attacked it on the one hand, the general of the Dominicans, with no less vehemence, impugned it on the other. Robertson's Charles Vth, vol. iii. pp. 400, 401; Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 353.

JO'AB, יואב, signifies paternity, or who has a father; otherwise, voluntary. Joab was son of Zeruah, David's sister, and brother to Abishai and Asahel. He was one of the most valiant soldiers, and greatest generals in David's time; but he was also one of the most cruel, revengeful, and imperious men of his age. He performed great services for David, to whose interests he was always firm. He was commander-in-chief of his troops, when David was king of Judah only. He signaled himself at the battle of Gibeon against Abner, (2 Sam. ii. 13, 14, &c.); but Asahel his brother was killed in that engagement by Abner. To revenge his death Joab treacherously killed Abner, who had come to Hebron to form an alliance with David, and bring all Israel to his obedience, (2 Sam. iii. 27. 39.) David abhorred that base action; but he did not dare to punish Joab, who was become formidable to him.

After David was acknowledged king by all Israel, he besieged Jerusalem, and promised to make him captain-general of his armies, who should first mount the walls, and beat off the Jebusites. (1 Chron. xi. 6.) Joab was the first that appeared on the walls, and by his valour well deserved to be continued in his station. He subdued the Ammonites, and procured the destruction of the brave Uriah, at the siege of Rabbah, their capital. (2 Sam. xi. 12.) He interceded for Absalom's return from exile, and his restoration to David's favour. But though he showed himself a friend to Absalom in his disgrace, he was his enemy at his rebellion. He overcame him in a pitched battle near Mahanaim; and being informed that he hung by the hair upon an oak, he pierced him to death with his own hands, though he well knew that David had given orders to preserve Absalom. When the king discovered too much sorrow for the death of his son, Joab reprimanded him.

When Sheba, son of Bichri, erected the standard of rebellion, David commanded Amasa to assemble the troops of Judah, and pursue him; but Amasa being too slow, David directed Abishai, Joab's brother, to pursue Sheba. Joab, accompanied him with the Cherethites and Pelethites of the king's guard. Amasa arrived soon after; and at Gibeon, Joab pretending to kiss him, plunged his poniard into his belly. Joab brought the war with Sheba to a happy conclusion, without a battle.

He returned to Jerusalem, and David continued him in the general command of his armies. (2 Sam. xx. 23.)

When David by the impulse of an evil spirit, and a criminal curiosity, undertook to number his people, he gave that commission to Joab. Joab endeavoured to prevent the king's resolution; but, being obliged to obey, he executed in part only what David had commanded.

Adonijah, David's son, being the eldest of the royal family, after the death of Absalom, he considered how he might procure himself to be acknowledged king. He took care principally to engage Joab the general, and Abiathar the high-priest; but he was deceived in his expectation, and Solomon, by order of David, was crowned king. By this last step Joab increased David's aversion from him, so that when David was near his end, he advised Solomon to punish Joab for the various violences of which he had been guilty. Some time after the death of David, Joab, being informed that Solomon had caused Adonijah to be put to death, and had banished the high-priest Abiathar, thought it time to provide for his own security. He, therefore, fled into the temple, and laid hold on the horns of the altar. Solomon sent Benaiah, who required him to quit his asylum; but Joab answering that he would die on the spot, Solomon ordered him to be put to death at the foot of the altar. Thus died Joab, and was buried in his own house in the wilderness, in the year of the world 2990.

JO'ASH, שׂוֹאֵשׁ, signifies who despairs; otherwise, he that burns, who is of fire.

JOASH, son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. When the impious Athaliah undertook to extinguish the race of the kings of Judah, that she might seize the crown herself, she ordered all the princes her grand-children to be murdered. But Jehosheba, the sister of Ahaziah, and wife to the high-priest Jehoiada, rescued young Joash, then a child, from the cruelty of Athaliah, and lodged him in the temple with his nurse. Here he abode six years. In the seventh year, Jehoiada procured him to be acknowledged king, and so well concerted his plan, that young Joash was placed on the throne, and saluted king in the temple, before the queen was informed of it. She was killed without the temple. (2 Kings xi. 1, &c.)

Joash received the diadem, together with the book of the law, from the hands of Jehoiada, the high-priest, who, in the young king's name, made a covenant between the Lord, the king, and the people, for their future fidelity to God. He also obliged the people to take an oath of fidelity to the king. Joash was only seven years old when he began to reign, and he reigned forty years at Jerusalem. His mother's name was Zibiah of Beersheba. He governed with justice and piety, so long as he was guided by the high-priest Jehoiada. Yet, he did not abolish the high places.

Jehoiada, during the king's minority, had issued orders for collecting voluntary offerings to the holy place, with the design of repairing the temple; but his orders were ill executed till the twentieth year of Joash. Then this prince directed chests to be placed at the entrance of the temple, and an account to be given him of what money was received from them, that it might be faithfully employed in repairing the house of God. Jehoiada dying at the age of a hundred and thirty years, Joash was misled by the evil counsel of his courtiers, who had before been restrained by the high-priest's authority. They began to forsake the temple of the Lord, and to worship idols, and groves consecrated to idols; which brought wrath on Judea and Jerusalem.

Then the Spirit of the Lord came on the high-priest Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, who reprimanded the people; but they who heard him, stoned him, according to orders from the king. It was not long before God inflicted on Joash the just punishment of his ingratitude to Jehoiada, whose son he had so lately stoned. Hazael, king of Syria, besieged Gath, which belonged to Judah; and having taken it, he marched against Jerusalem. Joash, to redeem himself from the difficulties of a siege, and from the danger of being plundered, took what money he could find in the temple, which had been consecrated by Ahaziah his father, Jehoram his grand-father, and himself, and all which he gave to Hazael. It is believed by some, that the next year the Syrian army marched again into Judah; but Hazael was not there in person. The Syrians made great havoc, defeated the troops of Joash, entered Jerusalem, slew the princes of Judah, and sent a great booty to the king of Syria at Damascus. They treated Joash himself with great ignominy, and left him extremely ill. His servants revolted against him, and killed him in his bed, by which the blood of Zechariah the high-priest was avenged. He was buried in Jerusalem, but not in the royal sepulchre. Amaziah his son succeeded him.

JOASH, king of Israel, son and successor of Jehoahaz, was declared king during the life of his father, in the year of the world 3163, and reigned alone in the year of the world 3165. He reigned sixteen years in Samaria, including the two years that he reigned with his father. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, and imitated Jeroboam, the son of Nebat: but we are not acquainted with many particulars of his reign.

Elisha falling sick of the disease of which he died, Joash came to see him, and wept over him. The prophet ordered Joash to shoot with arrows; he shot three times, and ceased. Joash, therefore, gained only three victories over Syria.

Joash reigned a long time peaceably. Amaziah, king of Judah, having been victorious over the Edomites, challenged him, saying, Come, let us look one another in the face. Joash reproved him by the fable of the cedar and the thistle of Lebanon. But Amaziah would not hearken to him. Joash, therefore, took the field; and Amaziah was routed, and made prisoner. Joash entered Jerusalem, and ordered four hundred cubits of the city walls to be demolished, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate. He took all the treasures of the temple, and of the royal palace, and returned in triumph to Samaria; where he died in peace soon after this victory, and was succeeded by Jeroboam. (2 Kings xiii. 10, &c.)

JOB, אִיּוֹב, signifies he that weeps, that cries; otherwise, he that speaks out of a hollow place, like the ventriloquists; otherwise, enduring enmity. Job, celebrated for his patience, his constancy, his piety, and his virtue, dwelt in the land of Uz, which is supposed by some to have been situated in Arabia Deserta, on the south of the Euphrates. However, a learned writer, who has published a translation of the Book of Job, contends, with many others, that Job lived in Stony, and not in Sandy Arabia; and he is of opinion, that the Scripture universally places the land of Uz, afterwards called by the Greeks Idumæa, on the southwestern coast of the Dead Sea, and surrounded by Kedar, Teman, and Midian, all of them districts of Arabia Petræa, or Stony Arabia. Job was probably descended from Uz, the eldest son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, from whom the country derived its name. Elihu, in reckoning up the modes of Divine revelation, takes no notice of the delivery of the Mosaic law; nor does the Book of Job in any part seem to allude to the Jewish history. Hence we may infer that Job was prior to Moses, or at least contemporary with him; and this inference is supported by the great age to which he lived. Job and his friends worshipped the one true God in sincerity and truth; and their religious knowledge was in general such as might have been derived from the early patriarchs.

Job was a man of great probity, virtue, and religion; and he possessed great riches in cattle and slaves, which at that time constituted the chief wealth even of princes in Arabia and Edom. He had seven sons and three daughters, and was in great repute among all the Eastern people on both sides of the Euphrates. His sons, by turns, made entertainments for each other; and when they had gone through the circle of their days of feasting, Job sent to them, purified them, and offered burnt-offerings for each of them; that God might pardon any faults inadvertently committed against him during such festivities. He was infinitely averse to injustice, idolatry, fraud, and adultery;

he avoided evil thoughts, and dangerous looks; he was compassionate to the poor, a father to the orphan, a protector to the widow, a guide to the blind, and a support to the lame.

God permitted Satan to prove the virtue of Job, and at first gave him power over his property, but forbade him to touch his person. Satan began with taking away his oxen. A company of Sabæans slew Job's husbandmen, and drove off all the oxen; one servant only escaped to bring the news. Whilst he was telling this misfortune, a second messenger came and informed Job that fire from heaven had consumed his sheep, and those who kept them, and that he alone had escaped. A third messenger came, and said, The Chaldeans have carried away thy camels, killed all thy servants, and I only am escaped. Whilst he was relating this, another came, and said, As thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking in their eldest brother's house, an impetuous wind suddenly overthrew it, and they were all crushed to death under its ruins: I only escaped to bring thee this news. Then Job rent his clothes, shaved his head, and fell down on the ground, saying, 'Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.'

As Job endured these calamities without repining against Providence, Satan solicited permission to afflict his person; and the Lord said, 'Behold, he is in thine hand, but touch not his life.' Satan, therefore, smote him with dreadful diseases; and Job being seated on a dunghill, with a potsherd scraped off the corruption. His wife with taunting irony said, 'Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God, and die.' Job answered, 'Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?' In the mean time three of Job's friends, who had been informed of his misfortunes, came to visit him; Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite. There was also a fourth, Elihu the Buzite, who, (chap. xxxii.) bears a part in their dialogue. They continued seven days sitting on the ground by him, without speaking to him. At last, Job broke silence, and complained of his misery. His friends, not distinguishing between the evils with which God tries those whom he loves, and the afflictions with which he punishes the wicked, accused Job of having harboured some impiety, and invited him to return to God by repentance, and humbly submit to his justice, since he suffered only according to his demerits. Job, convinced of his own innocence, and assured by the testimony of his conscience, maintained that his sufferings were greater than his faults, and that God sometimes chastised the righteous only to try them, to give them an opportunity of manifesting, or of improving, their dispositions; or, because it was his good pleasure, for reasons unknown to mankind. Elihu takes a middle course, and refers strongly to the sovereignty of God. To terminate this dispute, God appears in a cloud, and decides in favour of Job; yet, not approving those harsh expressions, which the extremity of his sorrow, and the warmth of dispute, had urged from him, Job humbly acknowledged his faults, and asks forgiveness. The Lord condemns Job's friends, and enjoins them to expiate their sins with sacrifices, offered by the hands of Job. He restores Job to health, gives him double the riches which he before possessed, blesses him with a beautiful and numerous family, and crowns a holy life with a happy death. This is the substance of Job's history.

The time in which this pious man lived, is very much contested. But supposing him to have been contemporary with Moses, and fixing the time of his trial to some years after the departure of the Hebrews out of Egypt, he might have lived till the time of Othniel; and if, as some suppose, he speaks of the departure of the Hebrews out of Egypt, the time of his trial cannot be placed at an earlier period. If he was afflicted seven years after the Exodus, in the year of the world 2520, and lived 140 years after his recovery, he must have been dead in 2660. Huetius, contrary to the opinion of Calmet, asserts that Job lived before Moses, but that the memory of his misfortunes was recent, when Moses, whom Huetius supposes to be the writer of the Book of Job, undertook to compose the history of them, while he lived in Midian with Jethro. By a combination and coincidence of various evidence derived from history, chronology, and astronomy, Dr. Hales fixes the time of Job's trial to the year 2337 before Christ, 818 years after the deluge, 184 years before the birth of Abraham, 474 years before the settlement of Jacob's family in Egypt, and 689 years before their exode or departure out of Egypt.

'If we reckon,' says Dr. Hales, 'with the most intelligent critics, Schultens, Peters, Lowth, &c. that the work was written by Job himself, whose name it bears; by the same analogy, as those of Samuel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, &c. (and surely among the various authors that have been assigned by the learned Elihu, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Ezra, &c. none has a better title than the venerable patriarch himself to be considered as such), this supposition stamps an additional value on the authority and authenticity of the work; and accounts for the high estimation in which the character of Job is represented (and by the Almighty himself,) in that solemn denunciation to the Israelites, recorded by Ezekiel, and thrice repeated, as if to guard against any mistake of his name, (Ezek. xiv. 14—18—20.); and also by the apostle James; and also, for the respect with which that passage, 'He taketh the wise in their own craftiness,' (v. 13.) is cited, as canonical Scripture by the apostle Paul, (1 Cor. iii. 19.) which surely would not have been the case, had it been the work of a doubtful or unknown author. Nothing, indeed, but its intrinsic excellence, and the inspiration of the author, which is not obscurely intimated by his seeing the Divine presence, (xlii. 5.) can account for the admission of a foreign production into their sacred canon, certainly before the time of Ezekiel; and not improbably, as early as the time of Hezekiah, Solomon, Samuel, or even Moses himself, who might have found it among the collections of his father-in-law, Jethro, priest of the neighbouring country of Midian, who appears to have been a person of great wisdom; and Moses could not want curiosity to procure a book so fraught with wisdom and instruction, and so apposite to his own case, during his long exile of forty years.'

"That Job was a real and not a fictitious character," observes Bishop Tomline, "may be inferred from the manner in which he is mentioned by Ezekiel and by St. James: 'Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord God.' (Ezek. xiv. 14.) As Noah and Daniel were unquestionably real characters, we must conclude the same of Job. 'Behold,' says St. James, 'we count them happy which endure: ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.' (James v. 11.) It is scarcely to be believed, that the apostle would refer to an imaginary character, as an example of patience, or in proof of the mercy of God. Since, then, the history of Job, as here recorded, is manifestly alluded to in both the above passages, we may, upon these authorities, as well as upon the ground of internal evidence, and the concurrent testimony of all eastern tradition, consider this book as containing a relation of actual events, a circumstantial detail of occurrences and discourses which really took place."

The style of the Book of Job is in many parts peculiarly sublime; and it is not only adorned with poetical embellishments, but most learned men consider it as written in metre. 'Through the whole work we discover religious instruction shining forth amidst the venerable simplicity of ancient manners. It every where abounds with the noblest sentiments of piety, uttered with the spirit of inspired conviction. It is a work unrivalled for the magnificence of its language, and for the beautiful and sublime images which it presents. In the wonderful speech of the Deity, (xxxviii. and xxxix.) every line delineates his attributes, every sentence opens a picture of some grand object in creation, characterized by its most striking features. Add to this, that its prophetic parts reflect much light on the economy of God's moral government; and every admirer of sacred antiquity, every inquirer after religious instruction, will seriously rejoice that the enraptured sentence (xix. 23.) of Job is realized to a more effectual and unforeseen accomplishment; that while the memorable records of antiquity have mouldered from the rock, the prophetic assurance and sentiments of Job are graven in Scripture, that no time shall alter; no changes shall efface.' Gray's Key to the Old Testament; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 93, &c. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 59, 60; Good's Translation of the Book of Job.

JOCH'EBED, יוכבד, signifies glorious, honourable, a person of merit; or, the glory of the Lord. Jochebed was wife of Amram, and mother of Miriam, Moses, and Aaron. Several difficulties are started concerning the degree of relation between Amram and Jochebed. Some assert, that Jochebed was the daughter immediately of Levi, and aunt of Amram her husband, because (Exod. ii. 1., vi. 20. Num. xxvi. 59.) she is called the daughter of Levi. Others maintain that she was only cousin-german to Amram, being daughter of one of Kohath's brethren. The Chaldee on Exod. vi. 20, says, that she was the daughter of Amram's sister; the Septuagint, that she was daughter to Amram's brother. The Hebrew, דודא doda, does not always denote the same degree of relation. Calmet thinks it most probable, that Jochebed was only cousin-german to Amram.

JO'EL, יואל, signifies he that wills, commands, or swears. JOEL, son of Pethuel, the second of the twelve minor prophets, was, it is said, but without any authority, of the tribe of Reuben, and city of Bethhoron. It is, however, impossible to ascertain the age in which Joel lived, but it seems most probable that he was contemporary with Hosea. No particulars of his life and death are certainly known. His prophecies are confined to the kingdom of Judah. He inveighs against the sins and impieties of the people, and threatens them with divine vengeance; he exhorts them to repentance, fasting, and prayer, and promises the favour of God to those who should be obedient. The principal predictions contained in this book are the Chaldaean invasion, under the figurative representation of locusts; the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus; the blessings of the Gospel dispensation; the conversion and restoration of the Jews to their own land; the overthrow of the enemies of God; and the glorious state of the Christian church in the end of the world.

The style of Joel, though different from that of Hosea, is highly poetical: it is elegant, perspicuous, and copious; and, at the same time, nervous, animated, and sublime. In the first two chapters, he displays the full force of the prophetic poetry; and his descriptions of the plague of locusts, of the deep national repentance, and of the happy state of the Christian church, in the last times of the Gospel, are wrought up with admirable force and beauty. Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 193; Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 120.

JOHN, יוחנן, Ἰωάννης, signifies the grace, gift, or mercy of the Lord. JOHN the Baptist, the forerunner of our Lord Jesus Christ, and son of Zachariah and Elizabeth, was born in the year of the world 4000, about six months before our Saviour. His birth, name, and employment were foretold to his father Zachariah, when he was performing his functions as a priest in the temple of Jerusalem. (Luke i. 10, 11, &c.)

The time of Elizabeth's delivery being come, her relations and neighbours rejoiced at it: and on the eighth day, when the child was circumcised, they called him by his father's name, Zachariah; but his mother told them his name should be John, which was confirmed by his father. The child grew, and was strengthened in spirit, and dwelt in the wilderness till the day of his manifestation to Israel. During his abode in the wilderness, he fed on locusts and wild honey, and was clothed only with camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins. (Matt. iii. 4.)

After John had passed thirty years in the wilderness, God manifested him to the world, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, and in the year of our Lord 28. He began his ministry by publishing the coming of the Messiah, in the country about and beyond Jordan, preaching repentance, and saying, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and that the axe was laid at the root of the trees. He brought many persons to confess their sins, and baptized them in the river Jordan, telling them that they should believe in Him who was coming after him, and who would baptize them with the Holy Ghost and with fire. From this baptism, John derived the surname of Baptist, or Baptizer. Many persons became his disciples, exercising themselves in acts of repentance, and preaching it to others; and some of his disciples afterwards followed our Saviour.

The virtue of John the Baptist was so eminent, that many of the Jews thought him to be the Messiah; but he plainly declared that he was not that honoured person. Nevertheless, he was as yet unacquainted with the person of Jesus Christ; only the Holy Ghosts had told him, that it was He on whom he should see the Holy Spirit descend and rest. When Jesus Christ presented himself to receive baptism from him, John excused himself, saying, I need rather to be baptized by thee: but Jesus said, It is becoming to fulfil all righteousness. Some time after, the Jews sent a deputation to John, inquiring whether he was the Messiah? John answered, No; he was only the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord. The next day, John said publicly of Jesus, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world.'

Herod Antipas having married his brother Philip's wife, while Philip was still living, occasioned great scandal. John the Baptist, with his usual liberty and vigour, reproved Herod to his face, and told him that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife, while his brother was yet alive. Herod, incensed at this freedom, ordered him into custody, in the castle of Machærus. Josephus gives another turn to the causes of his imprisonment, and says that it proceeded from Herod's apprehension of John's popularity, lest it should occasion an insurrection. John remained in prison for some time, and his disciples did not forsake him. Even Herod respected and feared him, knowing that he was very much beloved by the people; he heard him, and sometimes followed his advice. But Herodias, afraid lest he should set him at liberty, sought an opportunity of putting him to death. Herod having made a great entertainment for his friends on his birthday, Herodias sent Salome, her daughter, by Philip her former and lawful husband, into the banquetting hall, to dance before the king and his guests. She acquitted herself so much to the satisfaction of Herod, that he promised her any thing she should ask of him. Her mother instructed her to demand the head of John the Baptist. Herod was greatly vexed at her request; but, not daring to be worse than his word before his company, he ordered John to be beheaded. This order was immediately executed. The head was given to Salome, who carried it to her mother. See HERODIAS.

JOHN the Evangelist was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, son of Zebedee and Salome; by profession a fisherman. Some have thought that he was a disciple of John the Baptist, before he attended Jesus Christ; but of this there is no proof. He was brother to James the Greater. Our Saviour called them sons of thunder, Boanerges. Some think that this name was given them on account of a fault in their natural temper; but it seems more probable to consider this title as a prophetic declaration of the zeal and resolution with which they would hereafter bear testimony to the great truths of the Gospel. It is believed that St. John was the youngest of the apostles. Tillemont is of opinion, that he was twenty-five or twenty-six years of age when he began to follow Jesus.

Our Saviour had a particular friendship for him; and John describes himself by the name of 'That disciple whom Jesus loved.' John was one of the four apostles to whom our Lord delivered his predictions relative to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the approaching calamities of the Jewish nation. (Mark xiii. 3.) Peter, and James, and John, were chosen to accompany our Saviour on several occasions, when the other apostles were not permitted to be present. When Christ restored the daughter of Jairus to life, (Mark v. 37. Luke viii. 51.) when he was transfigured on the mount, (Matth. xvii. 1, 2. Mark ix. 2. Luke ix. 28.) and when he endured his agony in the garden, (Matth. xxvi. 36, 37. Mark xiv. 32, 33.) Peter, and James, and John, were his only attendants. That John was treated by Christ with greater familiarity than the other apostles is evident from Peter desiring him to ask Christ who should betray him, when he himself did not dare to propose the question. (John xiii. 24.) He seems to have been the only apostle present at the crucifixion, and to him Jesus, just as he was expiring upon the cross, gave the strongest proof of his confidence and regard, by consigning to him the care of his mother. (John xix. 26, 27.) As John had been witness to the death of our Saviour, by seeing the blood and water issue from his side, which a soldier had pierced, (John xix. 34, 35.) so he was one of the first that were made acquainted with his resurrection. Without any hesitation, he believed this great event, though, 'as yet he knew not the Scripture, that Christ was to rise from the dead.' (John xx. 9.) He was one of those to whom our Saviour appeared at the sea of Galilee: and he was afterwards, with the other ten apostles, a witness of his ascension into heaven. (Mark xvi. 19. Luke xxiv. 51.) John continued to preach the Gospel for some time at Jerusalem: he was imprisoned by the Sanhedrim, first with Peter only, (Acts iv. 1, &c.) and afterwards with the other apostles. (Acts v. 17, 18.) Some time after this second release, John and Peter were sent by the other apostles to the Samaritans, whom Philip the Deacon had converted to the Gospel, that through them they might receive the Holy Ghost. (Acts viii. 14, 15.) John informs us in the Revelation, that he was banished to Patmos, (Rev. i. 9.) an island in the Ægean Sea.

This banishment of John to the isle of Patmos is mentioned by many of the early ecclesiastical writers, all of whom, except Epiphanius in the fourth century, agree in attributing it to Domitian. Epiphanius says, that John was banished by command of Claudius; but he deserves the less credit, because there was no persecution of the Christians in the time of that emperor, and his edicts against the Jews did not extend to the provinces. Sir Isaac Newton was of opinion that John was banished to Patmos in the time of Nero; but even the authority of this great man is not of sufficient weight against the unanimous voice of antiquity. Dr. Lardner has examined and answered his arguments with equal candour and learning. It is not known at what time John went into Asia Minor. Lardner thought that it was about the year 66. It is certain that he lived in Asia Minor the latter part of his life, and principally at Ephesus. He planted churches at Smyrna, Pergamos, Laodicea, and many other places; and by his activity and success in propagating the Gospel, he is supposed to have incurred the displeasure of Domitian, who banished him to Patmos at the end of his reign. He himself tells us, that he 'was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ;' and Irenæus, speaking of the vision which he had there, says, 'It is not very long ago that it was seen, being but a little before our time, at the latter end of Domitian's reign.' On the succession of Nerva to the empire in the year 96, John returned to Ephesus, where he died at an advanced age, in the third year of Trajan's reign, A.D. 100. An opinion has prevailed that he was, by order of Domitian, thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil at Rome, and came out unhurt; but this account rests almost entirely on the authority of Tertullian, and seems to deserve little credit.

The genuineness of St. John's Gospel has always been unanimously admitted by the Christian church. It is universally agreed that St. John published his Gospel in Asia, and that when he wrote it he had seen the other three Gospels. It is, therefore, not only valuable in itself, but also a tacit confirmation of the other three, with none of which it disagrees in any material point. The time of its publication is placed by some rather before, and by others considerably after, the destruction of Jerusalem. If we accede to the opinion of those who contend for the year 97, this late date, exclusive of the authorities which support it, seems favoured by the contents and design of the Gospel itself. The immediate design of St. John in writing his Gospel, as we are assured by Irenæus, Jerome, and others, was to refute the Gnostics, Cerinthians, Ebionites, and other heretics, whose tenets, though they branched out into a variety of subjects, all originated from the erroneous opinions concerning the person of Christ, and the creation of the world. These points had been scarcely touched upon by the other Evangelists, though they had faithfully recorded all the leading facts of our Saviour's life and his admirable precepts for the regulation of our moral conduct. St. John, therefore, undertook, at the request of the true believers in Asia, to write what Clement of Alexandria called a spiritual Gospel; and accordingly we find in it more of doctrine, and less of historical narrative, than in any of the others. Let it be remembered, that this book, which contains so much additional information relative to the doctrines of Christianity, and which may be considered as a standard of faith for all ages, was written by that apostle, who is known to have enjoyed, in a greater degree than the rest, the affection and confidence of the Divine Author of our religion, and to whom was given a special revelation concerning the state of the Christian church in all succeeding generations.

We have three epistles by this apostle. The first has been sometimes cited by the name of the epistle to the Parthians, and was never contested. The other two have been disputed. The first of these is addressed 'Ἐκλεκτῇ Κυρίᾳ, concerning the meaning of which words there has been a variety of opinions. Our translators have rendered the words, To the Elect Lady, which is the common acceptation of them. The third epistle is directed to Caius, whom St. John praises for hospitality to the faithful, and exhorts to continue his pious practice. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 328, 491, &c.; Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. pp. 124, &c.; Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. iv. pp. 272, 273, &c.

JO'NAH, יוֹנָה, יוֹנָה, signifies a dove, otherwise, he that oppresseth. Jonah, son of Amittai, the fifth of the minor prophets, was born at Gath-hepher in Galilee. He is generally considered as the most ancient of the prophets, and is supposed to have lived 840 years before Christ. The book of Jonah is chiefly narrative. He relates that he was commanded by God to go to Nineveh, and preach against the inhabitants of that capital of the Assyrian empire; that through fear of executing this commission, he set sail for Tarshish, and that in his voyage thither a tempest arising, he was cast by the mariners into the sea, and swallowed by a large fish; that while he was in the belly of this fish, he prayed to God, and was, after three days and three nights, delivered out of it alive; that he then received a second command to go and preach against Nineveh, which he obeyed; that, upon his threatening the destruction of the city within forty days, the king and people proclaimed a fast, and repented of their sins; and that, upon this repentance, God suspended the sentence which he had ordered to be pronounced in his name. Upon their repentance, God deferred the execution of his judgment till the increase of their iniquities made them ripe for destruction, about 150 years afterwards. The last chapter gives an account of the murmuring of Jonah at this instance of divine mercy, and of the gentle and condescending manner in which it pleased God to reprove the prophet for his unjust complaint. The style of Jonah is simple and perspicuous, and his prayer in the second chapter is strongly descriptive of the feelings of a pious mind under a severe trial of faith.

Our Saviour mentions Jonah in the Gospel. (Matt. xii. 41. Luke xi. 32.) He says, that the Ninevites should rise in judgment against the Jews, and condemn them; because they repented at the preaching of Jonah. And when the Pharisees required from him a sign, his answer referred them to that of the prophet Jonah, namely, his resurrection. The Scripture says, that Jonah fled out of Judea from the presence of the Lord, and embarked at Joppa for Tarshish. Perhaps he imagined that God would no more think of sending him to Nineveh, but would order some other to go thither; because it was not usual with God to pour forth the spirit of prophecy out of the Holy Land. See DAGON, FISH, GOURD. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 123, 124.

JON'ATHAN, יְהוֹנָתָן, signifies, given of God, or the gift of the Lord. JONATHAN, son of Saul, a prince of an excellent temper, and in all varieties of fortune a most faithful friend to David. (1 Sam. xiv.) Jonathan gave proofs of courage and conduct during the war between Saul and the Philistines. One day when the Philistines were encamped at Michmash with a powerful army, and Saul's army of not more than six hundred men were at Gibeah of Benjamin, Jonathan said to his armour-bearer, Let us go to the camp of the Philistines. But he told not his father nor the people. There was a narrow pass between two rocks, which led to the camp of the Philistines. As soon, therefore, as the Philistines on guard perceived them, they said, Behold the Hebrews come like rats out of the holes where they had hid themselves, and they cried out to them, Come up to us, and we will show you something. Jonathan, therefore, said to his armour-bearer, Follow me, for the Lord hath delivered them into the hands of Israel. They went up, and began to kill all that fell into their hands. The camp of the Philistines was soon in disorder; and the noise and tumult increasing, the Hebrews hastily advanced nearer to them, and discovered that the Philistines killed one another. Saul, therefore, pursued the runaways, and said before the whole army, Cursed be the man that eateth any food this day.

Jonathan, who was absent when Saul spake in this manner, found a quantity of honey in a wood, into which he dipped the end of his staff, and ate of it; for which, afterwards, Saul would have slain him; but the people opposed the king's resolution, and preserved him.

Some years after, David having overcome Goliath, Jonathan conceived so perfect a friendship for him, that he loved him as himself. He stripped himself of the robe which he wore, and gave it to David. He made David likewise a present of his sword, his bow, and his belt. And when David incurred Saul's displeasure, Jonathan continued always zealous in his friend's interests. He gave him intelligence of his father's determination to kill him, advised him to retire, and so wrought upon Saul, that he promised him with an oath not to kill David. Saul having again resolved on the death of David, Jonathan dissuaded the king from his design; but perceiving that the destruction of his friend was determined, he informed David, who lay concealed in a field; when on a signal agreed on between them, they met, conversed, and confirmed their friendship and covenant with an oath.

The year following, while David was concealed in a forest in the wilderness of Ziph, and Saul was in pursuit of him with his troops, Jonathan went secretly to his friend, and they renewed their covenant. The war breaking out between the Hebrews and Philistines, Saul and Jonathan encamped on Mount Gilboa with the army of Israel; but their camp was forced, their troops and themselves killed. The news being brought to David, he mourned for a year, and composed a funeral song to their honour, wherein he evidenced his tenderness towards his friend Jonathan. Jonathan had a son named Mephibosheth, to whom David did great favours. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

JONATHAN, surnamed Apphus, was son of Mattathias, and brother to Judas Maccabæus. After the death of Judas, he was appointed general of the troops of Israel. Bacchides, general of Demetrius Soter, his enemy, was soon informed of it. Jonathan went immediately into the country bordering on the lake Asphaltites: at last he passed the river Jordan, and observing that Bacchides was advancing towards him with a powerful army in order to give him battle on the sabbath day, and being posted in such a manner, that he had the enemy before him, Jordan at his back, and woods and marshes at his right and left, he exhorted his people to implore the assistance of Heaven, and represented to them the necessity they were under, of either conquering or dying, since there was no way for escape. He therefore immediately gave battle, and being within reach of Bacchides, he stretched out his arm, meaning to run him through ; but Bacchides dexterously avoided the blow by retiring backwards. At length Jonathan and his people having laid a thousand of their enemies dead upon the spot, and being apprehensive that they should be overwhelmed with numbers, threw themselves into the river Jordan, and swam over it in the presence of their enemies, who, not daring to pursue them, retreated to Jerusalem.

After various other fightings Jonathan made proposals of peace, which Bacchides accepted, returned to Syria, and came no more into Judea. Jonathan dwelt at Michmash, not at Jerusalem, because the troops of Demetrius Nicator were in possession of the citadel. Some years afterwards, Alexander Balas and Demetrius Soter, who contended for the kingdom of Syria, wrote to Jonathan desiring his friendship ; each endeavouring to engage him in their party. Jonathan declared for Alexander Balas against Demetrius. The first time of his putting on the high-priest's ornaments was on the Feast of Tabernacles, in the year 160 of the Greeks, about A.M. 3852, ante A.D. 152. After his receiving Alexander Balas's letter, who gave him this dignity, the people importuned him to accept it, and he solemnly performed the functions belonging to it.

Two years after, Alexander Balas celebrating his marriage with the king of Egypt's daughter at Ptolemais, Jonathan was invited thither, and appeared with royal magnificence. Some of his enemies attempting to accuse him to the king, he would not hear them, but clothed him in purple, and seated him near himself. Jonathan returned to Jerusalem, and there abode some time in peace. But at the end of two years Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, king of Syria, whom we have mentioned, coming into Syria, sent Apollonius, general of his troops, to Jamnia in Palestine to defy Jonathan, telling him, that he trusted only to his rocks and mountains, where he kept close without daring to descend into the plain. Jonathan, stung with these reproaches, assembled ten thousand chosen men, besieged Joppa, and took it with ease. From thence he marched against Apollonius, defeated him, killed eight thousand of his men, and returned loaded with booty to Jerusalem.

Alexander Balas was killed some years after ; whereupon Demetrius Nicator was advanced to the throne of Syria. Jonathan, taking advantage of the troubles in Syria, besieged the citadel of Jerusalem. Some time after, Jonathan having desired Demetrius to recall his troops from the citadel of Jerusalem, that prince answered him, that he would not only do what he requested, but more, provided he would send him succours to reduce the inhabitants of Antioch. Jonathan sent him three thousand chosen men, who rescued him from his danger, for his people had besieged him in his palace. The city of Antioch was obliged to solicit his clemency, and desire peace.

Demetrius was not so grateful as he might have been, but shortly after he quarrelled with Jonathan. His ingratitude was the cause of Jonathan's declaring for young Antiochus, whom Tryphon had set on the throne of Syria. Jonathan fought several battles with Demetrius's generals. About the same time he renewed his alliance with the Romans and Lacedemonians. Jonathan marched against the Zabadean Arabians, or Nabathæans, defeated them, and returned to Jerusalem with great booty. He undertook to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and to raise a wall between the fortress (which was in the hands of the Syrians) and the city. Tryphon having conceived the design of dispatching young Antiochus, and stepping into his throne, thought it necessary to secure the person of Jonathan. He persuaded him to come to Ptolemais, and, having not above a thousand men with him, the inhabitants, when he was entered into their city, shut the gates, killed the Jews who attended Jonathan, seized him, and put him in chains. Tryphon killed Jonathan and his sons some time after at Bascama, perhaps Besek, not far from Bethsan. Simon procured the bones of Jonathan his brother, and buried them at Modin, in a magnificent mausoleum. There was a general and great mourning over all Israel for Jonathan many days.

JOPPA, יֹפּוֹ, signifies beautiful or fair. By all accounts, the port of this town scarcely deserves the name of fair, being exposed to troublesome winds ; but if the name implies decorated, as it probably does, the town might answer to this description. It appears, however, that the situation of this town is pleasant, and the prospects from it, and in the country around it, are engaging. It was on the border of the tribe of Dan, Josh. xix. 46. 2 Chron. ii. 16. Jonah i. 3.) In Ezra (iii. 7.) it is written, Jappua ; and in Greek Joppe. (Acts ix. 36.)

Joppa, or, as it is now called, Jaffa, was situated in a fine plain between Jamnia south, Cæsarea of Palestine north, and Rama, or Ramula east. According to tradition and fable, Joppa was one of the most ancient cities in the world. Report says it was built before the Deluge ; that here reigned Cepheus, the father of Andromeda ; and the rock to which his daughter was chained, and from which she was delivered by Perseus, was shown here, together with the ribs of the monster which would have devoured her. This history probably refers to a vessel of considerable bulk, which ravaged the coast, and being driven on shore by superior force, was here wrecked, and the country delivered from the exactions of the corsair or pirate who commanded it.

Jaffa stands on a circular eminence, close to the sea shore. The houses are white, and are all of them provided with domes and square towers. Near Jaffa is a white sandy soil, the heat reflected from which is very oppressive. The sea breeze constantly prevails during the day time. Nearly in the centre of the town is an old ruinous building called the citadel, on the top of which is a round casemated tower, provided with one or two wretched pieces of cannon. The city is surrounded by a stone wall, provided, at certain distances, with towers alternately square and round.

'Joppa, called also Japha, and now universally Jaffa,' observes Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'owes all the circumstances of its celebrity, as the principal port of Judæa, to its situation with regard to Jerusalem. As a station for vessels, its harbour is one of the worst in the Mediterranean. Ships generally anchor about a mile from the town, to avoid the shoals and rocks of the place. In ancient times it was the only place resorted to as a sea-port, in all Judæa. Higher Solomon ordered the materials for the temple to be brought from Mount Libanus, previously to their conveyance by land to Jerusalem.'

Joppa is frequently mentioned both in the Old and New Testament. Tabitha, whom Peter raised from the dead, dwelt at Joppa. It appears that the Gospel was received here soon after Christ's ascension; and Peter was at Joppa when God showed him a sheet full of creeping things, no longer making any distinction between Jews and Gentiles, if disposed to receive the word. (Acts ix. 36, 37.; x. 5.) From this place it was that the prophet Jonah, many centuries before, had embarked for Tarshish, when commanded to preach repentance to the inhabitants of Nineveh. (Jonah. i. 3.)

D'Arvieux is of opinion that the port of Jaffa was anciently much superior to what it is at present. He remarked in the sea, south of the present port, the vestiges of a wall, which extended to a chain of rocks at some distance from the shore, by which the port was formed and protected against the violence of the south-west wind. 'This port,' he says, 'was, no doubt, sufficiently good before it was filled up, although its entrance was exposed to the winds from the north. At present it is so shallow, that only insignificant vessels can enter it. There was a quay, faced with hewn stone, fronting the port. It has been ruined purposely; what remains of it at each end, shows that it was very handsome.'

'Jaffa,' says Mr. Buckingham, 'as it is now seen, is seated on a promontory jutting out into the sea, and rising to the height of one hundred and fifty feet above its level, having a desert coast to the north and south, the Mediterranean on the west, and fertile plains and gardens behind it on the east. It is walled around on the south and east towards the land, and partially so on the north and west towards the sea. There are not more than a thousand habitations in all the town, and the number of three mosques, one Latin convent, and one Greek church, will afford a guide to estimate the relative proportions of these religious bodies to each other. There is a small fort near the sea on the west, another on the north, and a third near the eastern gate of entrance, mounting in all from fifty to sixty pieces of cannon; which, with a force of five hundred horse, and nearly the same number of infantry, would enable the town to be defended by a skilful commander. The port is formed by a ledge of rocks running north and south before the promontory, leaving a confined and shallow space between these rocks and the town. Here the small trading vessels of the country find shelter from south and west winds, and land their cargoes on narrow wharfs running along before the magazines. When the wind blows strong from the northward, they are obliged to warp out, and seek shelter in the small bay to the north-east of the town, as the sea breaks in here with great violence, and there is not more than three fathoms water in the deepest part of the harbour; so accurately do the features of the place correspond with those given of it by Josephus.' Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. i. pp. 245, 246, octavo edition of 1822; Dr. Wittman's Travels, p. 125; Sacred Geography; Dr. Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 441-443.

JO'RAM, יִרְמְיָהוּ, also written יִרְמְיָהוּ, Jehoram, signifies to cast; otherwise, elevated. Joram, son of Ahab, succeeded his eldest brother Ahaziah, who died without children. (2 Kings iii. 1, &c.) He did evil before the Lord, but not like Ahab his father, and Jezebel his mother. He removed the statues of Baal, which his father had erected; but he continued to worship the golden calves. Mesha, king of Moab, having refused to pay his tribute, Joram warred against him, and invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to accompany him, who also brought the king of Edom his tributary. These princes advanced through the wilderness of Edom, but soon were in danger of perishing for want of water, which Elisha procured.

Elisha performed very important services to Joram during his wars with Syria, and discovered to him the designs of Benhadad. Benhadad having besieged Samaria, the famine was so terrible, that a woman ate her own son. Joram, being informed of such calamities, rent his clothes, and all the people saw that he wore sackcloth. He ordered a servant to go and cut off Elisha's head, as if the cause of these distresses had been in his power. Elisha, who was then in his house, desired his friends to shut the door, and to prevent such a person from entering; observing that Joram was close at his heels, coming to revoke the order. Accordingly, the king came almost at the same time, and complained to Elisha, who comforted him, and foretold a great plenty on the morrow, which came to pass. Some time after, the king conversing with Gehazi about Elisha's miracles, the Shunamite woman, whose son Elisha had raised from the dead, solicited the king for restitution of her estate, which had been confiscated while she was absent in some foreign country during the famine. Gehazi informed the king that this was the very woman whose son had been restored to life by Elisha. Joram immediately gave directions for the restitution of all her property.

About that time Joram took the city of Ramoth-Gilead, but was dangerously wounded, and obliged to return to Jezreel for cure. He left Jehu, who commanded his army, to reduce the citadel, which still held out. In the mean time Jehu, having been anointed king by a young prophet, made haste to destroy king Joram at Jezreel. (2 Kings ix.) This took place in the twelfth year of Joram, and in the year of the world 3120.

JO'RDAN, יַרְדֵּן, signifies river of judgment; otherwise, demonstration, or projection of judgment; otherwise, descending, or, from the Hebrew and Syriac, cauldron of judgment. Some derive its name from יָרֹךְ Jor, a spring, and דָּן Dan, a small town near the source of this river; others derive it from two rivulets, Jor and Dan. But these etymologies are dubious.

The true source of this river is in two fountains at Paneas (a city better known by its subsequent name of Cæsarea Philippi,) at the foot of Anti-Libanus; its apparent source flows beneath a cave at the foot of a precipice, in the sides of which are several niches with Greek inscriptions.

The Jordan from Cæsarea Philippi runs about fifty leagues, till it discharges itself into the Dead Sea. In its course it forms the lake Semehon, at five or six leagues' distance from its spring. From thence it enters and passes the lake of Tiberias. It overflows its banks about the time of barley harvest, or the feast of the passover. The banks of Jordan are covered with rushes, reeds, willows, and other trees; so that there are, as it were, two banks of the Jordan. The first, is that of this river in its natural state, the second is that of its overflowings.

On each side of the Jordan a great plain extends from the Dead Sea. Josephus says, this plain is 1200 furlongs in length, and 600 wide; extremely dry in summer, and unwholesome, by reason of the excessive heat. The banks of the Jordan may be said only to have any moisture; the rest is a wilderness.

D'Arvieux says, 'the Jordan is bordered with trees, which render its course very agreeable; it is pretty rapid; but its waters are thick, because its bed is of fat earth. Nevertheless, they are wholesome, and it is pretended they are incorruptible, or, at least, that they continue good many years.'

'The Jordan is extremely full of fish, because nobody catches them. What the fishes have to avoid, as well as the trees on the banks of the stream, is not to suffer themselves to be carried into the Dead Sea; because the former would die instantly, and the others would become as light as cork.'

'As we approach the Jordan,' says Volney, 'the country becomes more hilly, and, better watered; the valley through which this river flows abounds, in general, in pasturage, especially in the upper part of it. As for the river itself, it is very far from being of that importance which we are apt to assign to it. The Arabs, who are ignorant of the name of Jordan, call it El Sharia. Its breadth, between the two principal lakes, in few places exceeds sixty or eighty feet, but its depth is about ten or twelve. In winter it overflows its narrow channel, and, swelled by the rains, forms a sheet of water, sometimes a quarter of a league broad. The time of its overflowing is usually in March, when the snows melt on the mountains of the Shaik; at which time, more than any other, its waters are troubled, and of a yellowish hue, and its course is impetuous. Its banks are covered with a thick forest of reeds, willows, and various shrubs, which serve as an asylum for wild boars, ounces, jackals, hares, and different kinds of birds.'

Viscount Chateaubriand found the Jordan to be six or seven feet deep close to the shore, and about fifty paces in breadth. Messrs. Banks and Buckingham, who crossed it in January 1816, pretty nearly at the same ford over which the Israelites passed on their first entering the Promised Land, found the stream extremely rapid; and as it flowed at that part over a bed of pebbles, its otherwise turbid waters were tolerably clear, as well as pure and sweet to the taste.

The passage of this deep and rapid, though not wide river, by the Israelites, at the most unfavourable season, when augmented by the dissolution of winter snows, was more manifestly miraculous, if possible, than that of the Red Sea; because here was no natural agency whatsoever employed; no mighty winds to sweep a passage, as in the former case; no reflux of the tide, on which minute philosophers might fasten to depreciate the miracle. It seems, therefore, to have been providentially designed to silence cavils respecting the former; and it was done at noon-day, in the face of the sun, and in the presence, we may be sure, of the neighbouring inhabitants; and it struck terror into the kings of the Amorites and Canaanites, westwards of the river, 'whose hearts melted, neither was there any spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.' (Josh. v. 1.) The place where the Israelites thus miraculously passed this river, is supposed to be 'the fords of Jordan.' JOSEPH, יוסף, signifies increase, addition. JOSEPH, son of Jacob and Rachel, was born in Mesopotamia, in the year of the world 2256. Joseph was favoured by God in his youth with prophetic dreams. His father Jacob loved him tenderly, and gave him a coat of divers colours. His brothers became jealous of such little marks of affection. But what most incensed his brethren was, his relating certain dreams, in one of which he had seen twelve sheaves, belonging to them, bow before his sheaf, which stood upright in the field, &c. Jacob heard this without remark, but Joseph's brethren could not bear the allusion.

Joseph being sent by his father to visit his brethren, they conspired against him, and at first would have slain him; but Reuben opposing this resolution, they threw him into an old well, which had no water: soon after, perceiving a caravan of Midianite merchants going into Egypt, they sold Joseph to them, and deceived Jacob into a belief of his destruction by a wild beast.

The merchants took Joseph into Egypt, and sold him as a slave to Potiphar, captain of Pharaoh's guards. Joseph obtained his master's confidence so greatly, that he made him steward of his house, and committed to him all his domestic affairs. (Gen. xxxix. 1, 2, 3, &c.) But Potiphar's wife, conceiving a criminal passion for this young slave, solicited him to gratify that passion, and at last pressed him so closely, that he could escape only by leaving his cloak in her possession. Seeing herself thus despised, she began to cry out, and complained that the young Hebrew had offered her violence. Showing his cloak as evidence against him, she easily persuaded her husband Potiphar, who therefore put Joseph in prison.

Two of the king of Egypt's officers, his butler, and his baker, having incurred their master's displeasure, were put into the same prison with Joseph. Each of them had a dream in reference to himself, which he related to Joseph, who explained it to him: the butler dreamed favourably, the baker fatally. Joseph's interpretation of both dreams was fulfilled; the butler was restored to his dignity, but did not remember Joseph. Two years after this event, Pharaoh had dreams which none of his wise men were able to explain to him. This making him very uneasy, his butler at last remembered Joseph, and told the king of him. Pharaoh commanded Joseph to be brought before him. The king related his dreams, and Joseph interpreted them, foretelling a prodigious plenty, succeeded by distressing famine.

Pharaoh also said to Joseph, Since you have discovered futurity to us, where can I find a more proper person than yourself for the government of my house, and of Egypt? My people shall obey you; and I will be your superior only on the throne. He then put his own ring upon Joseph's hand, clothed him in fine linen or cotton, put a chain of gold about his neck, made him ride in the chariot next to his own, and gave orders to proclaim him governor of all Egypt. He changed his name to Zaphnath Paaneah, which in Egyptian signifies a revealer of secrets. He married him to Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On or Heliopolis, by whom Joseph had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

During the seven years of plenty, Joseph accumulated great stores of corn and grain. After this abundance came the famine, which did not afflict Egypt only, but also Canaan, where Jacob lived with his sons. Jacob therefore sent his sons into Egypt to buy provision, retaining only Benjamin. Joseph knew his brethren, though they did not discover him. He spoke roughly to them, called them spies, detained Simeon in bonds, probably because he had been the warmest of his enemies, and would not let the rest depart, except on condition that they should bring their youngest brother with them; whom they had mentioned to him. When he dismissed them, he ordered their sacks to be filled with corn, and every man's money to be put in his sack, without their perceiving it.

Jacob was constrained by the famine, notwithstanding his reluctance, to send his sons again into Egypt, and Benjamin with them. When Joseph saw his brother Benjamin, he ordered an entertainment for these strangers that day at noon: when he came in, his brethren prostrated themselves before him, and offered him presents from Jacob. Having saluted Benjamin, he immediately went out, being unable to restrain his tears. Joseph directed his brethren to be placed at table according to their age, and sent to Benjamin a portion five times larger than the rest, which very much raised their admiration.

The next morning, the corn they had purchased was loaded, and Joseph's cup was privately conveyed into Benjamin's sack. They were scarcely out of the city, when Joseph sent in great haste after them, reproaching them bitterly for this theft. Benjamin's sack was opened, and Joseph's cup was found in it! All in confusion at this accident, they returned with Benjamin to the city. Judah entreated Joseph to receive him for his slave instead of Benjamin, remonstrating that if he returned to his father, without bringing back his favourite son, he would die with grief. Joseph then discovered himself, and asked if his father were living? After this, he embraced them all, and principally Benjamin, and sent them with a message to their father, proposing his removal into Egypt. To this Jacob agreed. Joseph, therefore, gave Jacob and his sons the land of Goshen, where the city of Rameses was situated, that they might dwell there with their flocks.

The famine increasing, Joseph drained all the money of the Egyptians into the king's coffers; then he obtained their cattle, afterwards their lands, and lastly their persons. He restored to the Egyptians their lands and cattle, with corn for seed, on condition that they paid the fifth part of the crop to the king. Jacob having spent seventeen years in Egypt, sent for Joseph, and made him promise to bury him in the land of Canaan, in the sepulchre of his fathers. Some time after, Joseph was informed that his father grew very ill; wherefore taking his two sons with him, Manasseh and Ephraim, he went to visit him. Jacob adopted his two sons, embraced them, and blessed them; putting his hands on their heads. Joseph observing his left hand to be placed on Manasseh's head, though he was the eldest, and his right on Ephraim, who was the youngest, was desirous to remove them, but Jacob told him, he knew what he did. After this, Jacob gave to each of his children a particular blessing. Of Joseph he said, 'Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well, whose branches run over the wall.' (Gen. xlix. 22, 23, &c.)

As soon as Jacob expired, Joseph fell on his face, and melted into tears. Afterwards, he had him embalmed, and then buried him in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham had purchased of Ephron the Hittite. After Joseph was returned to Egypt, his brethren, fearing some resentment might remain latent in him, solicited his favour, which he promised them. Joseph after he had lived an hundred and ten years, and seen his grand-children of the third generation, fell sick, and made his brethren promise with an oath to carry his bones with them, when they should depart from Egypt. After his death, his body was put into a coffin in Egypt; and Moses carried it away with him at the Exodus. (Exod. xiii. 19.) It was committed to the tribe of Ephraim, and was by them buried near Shechem, in the field which Jacob a little before his death had given to Joseph. (Josh. xxiv. 32.)

shipped Joseph as Osiris, Apis, and Serapis, and even under the names of Hermes, Tammuz, and Adonis.

JOSEPH, son of Jacob, and grandson of Matthan, spouse of the Virgin Mary, and reputed father of Jesus Christ. (Matt. i. 15, 16.) The Gospel says, that Joseph was a just man. He lived by labour, and worked at a trade, but at what trade is not agreed. Some say he was a carpenter, some a locksmith, and others a mason.

The incarnation of the Son of God was not at first discovered to Joseph; but being informed that Mary his espoused wife was pregnant, and not knowing to what to attribute it, he inclined to dismiss her privately, by giving her a bill of divorce, instead of publicly dishonouring her. But while he was under this embarrassing uncertainty, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and encouraged him to take home Mary. See ANNUNCIATION.

About six months after, Joseph went to Bethlehem, there to be registered with Mary his wife, in pursuance of an edict from Augustus. While they were in this place, the time of Mary's delivery came. Forty days after the child's birth, Mary and Joseph carried him to Jerusalem, and performed what the law appointed. While here, the angel of the Lord directed Joseph, in a dream, to carry the child into Egypt, because king Herod sought to kill him. How long they continued in Egypt we cannot tell; probably not long, since Herod died about the passover, some few months after the massacre of the innocents. The angel again informed Joseph, that he might return to Judea; but, learning that Archelaus succeeded Herod, Joseph retired to Nazareth in Galilee, which was not subject to Archelaus, but to Herod Antipas. He took Jesus, at the age of twelve, with Mary, to the passover at Jerusalem, where they lost him for three days, but at length found him in the temple. (Luke ii. 42—51.)

It is believed, with great probability, that Joseph died before Jesus began his public ministry. Joseph does not appear at the marriage of Cana, or in any other instance; and Jesus upon the cross recommended his mother to St. John, which, without doubt, he would not have done, had her husband been living.

JOSH/UA, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, Ἰησοῦς, Jesus, Ἰωσὺε, the Lord, the Saviour. Joshua, the son of Nun, by the Greeks called Jesus the son of Nave, was of the tribe of Ephraim, and was born in the year of the world 2460. His first name was Hosea, or Oshea. (Numb. xiii. 8. 16.) Some believe that Moses changed his name by adding that of God to it.

Hoseah signifies Saviour, Jehosua, the salvation of God, or he will save. There is some dispute concerning the time when Joshua began to be so called. Some think it was after the defeat of the Amalekites, others not till after the return of the commissioners appointed to survey the promised land.

Joshua signalized his valour against the Amalekites, whose whole army he routed. When Moses went up Mount Sinai, to receive the law, and remained there forty days and forty nights, Joshua abode with him, though in all probability, not in the same place, nor with the same abstinence; and when Moses descended from the mountain, Joshua heard the noise of the people playing about the golden calf, and thought it was the cry of battle. (Exod. xxxii. 17.) Joshua was very constant at the tabernacle of the congregation; he had the care and custody of it, (Exod. xxxiii. 11.) and seems to have dwelt in, or near it. When the people came to Kadesh-barnea, Joshua, with others, was deputed to survey the land of Canaan; and when these deputies returned, and represented the difficulties of conquering it as extremely great, Joshua and Caleb maintained the attempt to be easily practicable, provided the Lord were with them. The murmurers were all excluded from the land of promise; but God promised Joshua and Caleb that they should enter it.

When Moses was near his end, God commanded him to lay hands on Joshua, to communicate to him part of his spirit and glory, that the people might obey him. After the death of Moses, he took the command of the Israelites; and God favoured him. He sent spies to the city of Jericho, and ordered the army of Israel to pass the river Jordan. Joshua took twelve stones out of the midst of the river, which he placed at Gilgal, and set up twelve likewise in the midst of Jordan, as monuments of Israel's miraculous passage.

Some few days after the passage of the Jordan, Joshua caused to be circumcised all those who being born in the wilderness, by reason of their changing place frequently, had not received circumcision. After this, they kept the passover on the 14th of Nisan, in the year of the world 2553. While Joshua was before Jericho, he saw a man standing before him with a naked sword in his hand. He went to him, and said, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? The man answered, I am captain of the host of the Lord, and I am come here to thy assistance. Joshua fell with his face to the earth: and the angel said to him, Take off thy shoes, for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

A few days after, he received orders from the Lord to besiege Jericho. Some think this siege was carried on during the seven days of the passover. The first six days, the army of Israel, with the priests and ark at their head, marched round the city once; on the seventh day they marched seven times round it, and at the seventh time, the priests sounding the sacred trumpets, the people shouted, and the walls of the city fell, so that each man entered at the place opposite to him. Joshua then uttered his imprecation against Jericho; which prophecy was accomplished many ages after. See HIEL. Joshua sent 3000 men against Ai; but this small army was repulsed with the loss of thirty-six men. Joshua complained to the Lord, who told him, that Israel had violated the anathema pronounced against Jericho. The people, therefore, were convened; and the lot fell on Achan the son of Carmi. After this, Joshua took Ai.

God had commanded, that after the Israelites had passed the Jordan, they should erect an altar upon Mount Ebal. Joshua fulfilled this order.

About the same time, the Gibeonites came to Joshua, and pretended they were from a distant country, and not of the people of Canaan, who were devoted to the curse. Joshua and the elders of Israel made a covenant with them, without consulting the Lord; but three days after, they understood that they were Canaanites, and dwelt in the cities of Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim. The people murmured against the elders; and it was resolved, that their lives should be preserved, since they had been promised this in the name of the Lord; but that they should be condemned to cut wood and carry water. Upon this Adonibezek, king of Jerusalem, confederated with four other kings of Canaan, to attack Gibeon. But Joshua, being informed of it, marched all night, and in the morning fell upon them so briskly, that he put the five kings to flight, and as they fled along the way to Beth-horon, the Lord poured a shower of large hail-stones upon them as far as Azekah, which killed many. Then Joshua said, Sun, stand thou still over against Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon. And the sun and moon stood still, till the people of the Lord had taken vengeance on their enemies.

This miracle of the sun and moon standing still cannot be accounted for on philosophical principles, but must be resolved wholly into the power of God, who hearkened to the voice of a man, to stop the luminaries in their diurnal courses, or perhaps the earth's rotation, and by prolonging the day of battle to make them fight for Israel. From the circumstances of the narrative we may collect the time of the day and of the month when it happened, namely, soon after sun-rise, and when the moon was rather past the full. Joshua, when summoned by the Gibeonites to come to their succour against the confederate kings, went up from Gilgal all night, and came suddenly (we may conclude about day-break) upon the enemy, whom he discomfited with great slaughter, and chased along the way from Gibeon to Beth-horon, in a westerly direction, the Lord co-operating in their destruction by a tremendous shower of great hail-stones, which slew more than the sword of the Israelites, but did not touch the latter. In this situation, the sun appeared to rise over Gibeon eastward, and the moon to set over Ajalon westward, near the Mediterranean Sea, in the tribe of Dan, when Joshua, moved by a Divine impulse, uttered the invocation in the sight of Israel; 'Sun, stand thou still over Gibeon, and thou Moon in the valley of Ajalon.' 'So the sun stood still in the hemisphere (at his rising), and hastened not to go down at his setting) about a whole day;' which in that climate, and soon after the vernal equinox, might be about thirteen hours long; thus giving Joshua day-light for the destruction of his enemies during twenty-six hours. The object of this miracle was of the most important and impressive nature. The sun and the moon, the two principal gods of the idolatrous heathen nations, were commanded to yield miraculous obedience to the chief servant of the true God; and thereby to contribute to the more effectual conquest of their own worshippers. It was a miracle of the same description as those which had been wrought in Egypt. With respect to the objections to the probability of this miracle, which originate in a consideration of its supposed consequences, it is justly observed by Bishop Watson, that 'the machine of the universe is in the hand of God: he can stop the motion of any part or of the whole, with less trouble than either of us can stop a watch!' How absurd, then, are the reasonings of those men who believe in the existence of an omnipotent God, yet deny the possibility of the exertion of his power in other ways, than those which are known to their limited experience!

The five kings having fled into a cave near Makkedah, Joshua ordered great stones to be rolled against the mouth of it, till the army had entirely dispersed the enemy. Towards the close of the day, the army returned to Makkedah. Joshua killed these five kings, and hung their dead bodies upon gibbets, where they remained till evening. Joshua, taking advantage of the consternation of the Canaanites, attacked and took several cities belonging to their country. He pillaged all the land from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, and all the land of Gozen as far as Gibeon, that is, all the southern part of Palestine.

The year following, the king of Hazor confederated with several kings of Canaan, to endeavour, if they could, to oppose the Israelites with their great numbers. They met at the waters of Merom, south of Mount Carmel. Joshua marched against them; and, charging them suddenly, defeated and pursued them to great Zidon. The Hebrews killed all that fell into their hands: they hamstringed their horses, and burnt all their chariots. Joshua returned to Hazor, which he took and burnt. He took and destroyed in like manner all the cities round about, and killed their kings. All this was not done in a day. Some years were necessary to reduce the country; for he was obliged to make war with all these kings, none surrendering without a battle.

In the sixth year after the Israelites had entered the land of Canaan, they began to divide the conquered lands; Caleb first demanded his portion in the mountains of Judah and Hebron. After this, a division was made to every tribe by lot; first to Judah, then to Ephraim and the half tribe of Manasseh, which hitherto had not received its partition. After this the people assembled at Shiloh, to allot the portions of the other tribes. Joshua sent surveyors throughout the country; and the tribes of Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan, had their portions assigned them. And lastly they gave to Joshua for his inheritance Timnath-serah, in the mountains of Ephraim. They then appointed six cities of refuge for those who had committed casual and involuntary murder, and forty-six cities as residences of the priests and Levites. The tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, having assisted their brethren in conquering the land of Canaan, returned to beyond Jordan their inheritance. On the banks of Jordan, they erected a monument as a memorial to future generations, that they were the same people with the tribes on the other side of the river. Joshua, fearing lest it might be made an idolatrous monument, sent to inquire their intentions by it. But the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, having declared their real intentions to the deputies, they returned in peace to Joshua.

This great man drawing near his end, summoned all Israel at Shechem, and ordered the ark of the covenant to be brought thither. After he had represented to the Israelites the favours they had received from God, and exhorted them to continue faithful, he made a covenant on the part of God with the people, and the people reciprocally engaged to serve the Lord. Joshua reduced the act of it into form, and wrote it in the book of the law of the Lord; and, to preserve the memory of this transaction, he erected a very large stone, under the oak, near Shechem. After this he died, aged a hundred and ten, in the year of the world 2570.

The Book of Joshua is generally attributed to this great man. It comprehends the history of about thirty years; and it contains an account of the conquest and division of the land of Canaan, the renewal of the covenant with the Israelites, and the death of Joshua. Two passages in this book show that it was written by a person contemporary with the events which it records. In the first verse of the fifth chapter the author speaks of himself as being one of those who had passed into Canaan: 'And it came to pass when all the kings of the Amorites, which were on this side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea, heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over, that their hearts melted.' It appears also from the 25th verse of the following chapter, that the book was written before the death of Rahab: 'And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day; because she hid the messengers which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho.' In the last chapter it is said, that 'Joshua wrote these words in the Book of the law of God,' which expression seems to imply, that he subjoined this history to that written by Moses. The last five verses, which give an account of the death of Joshua, were added by one of his successors, probably by Eleazar, Phinehas, or Samuel. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 81; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 290; Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. p. 557; Townsend's Arrangement of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 463, note.

JOSIAH, יְשַׁיָּה, יוֹסִיָּהוּ, signifies the Lord burns, or the fire of the Lord. Josiah, son of Amon, king of Judah, and of Jedidah, daughter of Adaiah of Boscath, began to reign when he was eight years of age, in the year of the world 3363. (2 Kings xxii. 1, 2, &c.) He did right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of David. He began to seek after God from the eighth year of his reign, which was the sixteenth year of his age; and in the twelfth year of his reign, which was the twentieth of his age, he purged Judah and Jerusalem of the high-places, groves, idols, and superstitious images. He burned the bones belonging to the priests of the false gods upon the altars of their idols. Nor was he satisfied with thus destroying the remains of idolatry in his own dominions, but visited for the same purpose the cities of Ephraim, Manasseh, Simeon, and Naphtali.

After this he made it his business to repair the temple of the Lord, which in the preceding reigns had been neglected. But as they were removing the money which had been offered by the Israelites at the temple, to give it to the workmen, the high-priest Hilkiah found in the treasury chamber a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses. It is thought that this was the original of the law, and that it was found in some wall or chest, or beside the ark; for it appears that it was not then in the sanctuary, since

Josiah commands the priests to restore it to its place, and forbids them to carry it about any more.

Shaphan, the scribe, gave notice to the king of this discovery; and Josiah, having heard it read, rent his clothes, and sent to Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, and asked her advice. The king having convened all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, went up to the temple of the Lord with them.

He read the book to them which he had lately found, and made a covenant with God, thereby engaging himself to walk in his ways, and to observe his precepts and ordinances, and made all the assembly promise the same thing. He afterwards ordered to destroy all remains of superstitious and idolatrous monuments in Jerusalem and Judah. He cut off the soothsayers, those who worshipped the stars, and the Sodomites. He enjoined those priests who had offered sacrifices in the high-places, to forbear all exercise of their sacred functions. He defiled Topheth and the valley of Hinnom, and profaned all the places which had been consecrated to superstition and idolatry, filled them with dead men's bones, and broke down the statues which were in them. He demolished the altar erected by Jeroboam the son of Nebat, at Bethel, dug up the bones of the false prophets and priests of the golden calves, but spared the sepulchre of that prophet whom the Lord sent against Jeroboam. (1 Kings xiii.)

Afterwards, Josiah commanded all his people to keep the passover, according to the law. The Scripture says, that from the time of the judges, and during the reigns of all the kings of Judah and Jerusalem, no passover was ever kept like that of the eighteenth year of Josiah; and that there was no king before him, like unto him, who turned as he did to the Lord with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his strength. Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, desiring to pass through Judea, to attack the city of Carchemish on the Euphrates, Josiah opposed his passage, at Megiddo, at the foot of Mount Carmel. Here this good prince was mortally wounded, and being carried to Jerusalem there died. The people mourned his death very much; and Jeremiah composed an elegy on that occasion. Josiah was buried with the kings his predecessors at Jerusalem. The people of Judah took Jehoahaz, otherwise Shallum, one of Josiah's sons, and made him king in his stead.

Several prophets were in Judah while Josiah reigned; Jeremiah and Baruch, Joel and Zephaniah, and the prophetess Huldah. Many have been of opinion, that the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which are extant, were composed at the death of Josiah; and that these are the Lamentations which were so celebrated, and which all the singing men and singing women continued to sing long after. (2 Chron. xxv. 24, 25.) The mourning of the people on the death of this prince passed, as it were, into a law and a proverb; and the prophet Zechariah, (xii. 11.) speaking of the lamentation of future ages, at the death of the Messiah, alludes to that of Josiah, 'as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.' Josiah had four sons, Jehoahaz, otherwise Shallum, Eliakim or Jehoakim, Zedekiah otherwise Matthanias, and Johanan; but as Johanan the eldest is not noticed after the death of his father, it seems probable that he died before Josiah.

JOTHAM, יוֹחָם, signifies perfection of the Lord. JOTHAM, Gideon's youngest son, escaped the slaughter which the inhabitants of Ophrah made of his seventy brethren, killed in the presence and by the order of Abimelech, Gideon's bastard son. (Judg. ix. 5, 6, &c.) The people of Shechem created this same Abimelech king, because he was their countryman. Jotham, therefore, went up to the top of Mount Gerizim, and thence addressed himself to the inhabitants of Shechem, in the famous fable of the trees, who offered their kingdom, which the valuable trees declined, and at length they elected the bramble. He then fled to Beer. We know not what became of him after this; but his prediction against Shechem and Abimelech was soon accomplished. (Judg. ix. 5, &c.)

JOTHAM, son and successor of Uzziah otherwise Azariah, king of Judah. Azariah having been smitten with a leprosy for attempting to offer incense, (2 Chron. xxvi. 16, 17, &c.) the government was committed to Jotham, his son, in the year of the world 3221. He governed twenty-five years; he then assumed the title of king, and reigned alone till the year of the world 3262. Hence it appears that he governed Judah forty-one years; sixteen years alone, and twenty-five during the life of his father. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and imitated the piety of his father Uzziah. Yet, he did not destroy the high places. He built the great gate of the temple, and other works on the walls of Jerusalem, in Ophel. He caused forts and castles to be erected upon the mountains, and in the forests of Judah. The Ammonites, who had been brought into subjection by Uzziah his father, having shown an inclination to revolt, he defeated them, and imposed on them a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and ten thousand measures of wheat, with as many of barley. Towards the end of his reign, the Lord sent against him Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel. It appears from Isaiah, (i. 1, 2, 3, 4.) that the land of Judah was in a very melancholy condition in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, the son and successor of Jotham.

IRON. Moses forbids to use any stones for forming the altar of the Lord, which had been wrought with iron, as if iron communicated to them some pollution. He says the stones of Palestine are iron, (Deut. viii. 9.) that is, of hardness equal to iron, or that being melted they yield iron. An iron yoke (1 Kings viii. 51.) denotes a hard and insupportable dominion. The wise man says (Prov. xxvii. 17.) 'Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend.' God threatens his ungrateful and perfidious people with making heaven iron and the earth brass, to make the earth barren, and the air to produce no rain. Chariots of iron are chariots armed with iron, with spikes and scythes. The false prophet Zedekiah made himself iron horns, to persuade Ahab that he would overcome Syria. 'Thy neck is an iron sinew,' as hard and inflexible as iron. God said that he would make Jeremiah as stiff as a pillar of iron. (Jerem. i. 18.)

ISAAC, יִצְחָק, or יִצְחָק, signifies laughter, and was the name of the son of Abraham and Sarah. Sarah gave him this name, because when the angel promised that she should become a mother, though she was beyond the age of having children, she laughed at the prediction. And when the child was born, she said, 'God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me.' She suckled him herself. She would not suffer Ishmael to inherit with him, but prevailed with Abraham to turn him and his mother Hagar out of doors.

When Isaac was about twenty-five years of age, the Lord tempted Abraham, and commanded him to sacrifice his son. Abraham therefore took Isaac, and two of his servants, to the place where the Lord should show him. On the third day, ascending this place, he provided wood for the burnt offering, placed it on his son Isaac, and took fire in his hand, and a knife. As they two only, were going together, Isaac said, 'Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?' Abraham answered, 'My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering.' When they were come to the place appointed, which some think was Mount Calvary, Abraham arranged the wood, bound Isaac as a victim, and taking the knife, stretched forth his hand to kill his son. But the angel of the Lord called to him, and said, Lay not thine hand on the lad. He, therefore, unbound Isaac, and in his stead sacrificed a ram which he found entangled in a thicket adjacent.

When Isaac was forty years of age, Abraham sent Eliezer the steward of his house into Mesopotamia, to procure a wife for him from the family of Laban, his brother-in-law. Eliezer succeeded in the object of his journey, and brought Rebekah to Isaac. Rebekah being barren, Isaac prayed for her, and God granted her the favour of conception. She was delivered of twins, Esau and Jacob. Isaac had most inclination for Esau, and Rebekah for Jacob. Some years after, a famine obliged Isaac to retire to Gerar, where Abimelech was king: he reported that Rebekah was his sister; and she was taken from him, by reason of her beauty, to be one of the king's wives. But Abimelech, having observed that Isaac behaved otherwise with Rebekah than he would have done with his sister, restored her to him. Isaac grew very rich, and his flocks multiplying every day, the Philistines of Gerar were so envious that they filled up all the wells that were dug by Isaac's servants. Abimelech himself desired him to depart; which he did, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, where he dug new wells, but was put to some difficulties again. At length he returned to Beersheba, where he fixed his habitation. The Lord appeared to him, and renewed the promise of blessing him. Abimelech, king of Gerar, came thither likewise to make an alliance with him. Isaac when grown very old, (for he was an hundred and thirty-seven years of age,) and his sight was extremely weakened, called Esau his son, and directed him to hunt for him some venison. But while Esau was gone a hunting, Jacob stole the prime, the superior blessing of Isaac, so that afterwards Isaac could only give Esau an inferior blessing. See JACOB and ESAU.

Isaac lived many years after this. He sent Jacob into Mesopotamia to take a wife of his own family. When Jacob returned out of that country, after twenty years, Isaac was living, and continued so twenty-three years longer. He died aged an hundred four score and eight years, in the year of the world 2288, and was buried with his father Abraham, by his sons Esau and Jacob.

ISA'IAH, יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, signifies salvation of the Lord. Isaiah, son of Amos, was, as is said, of the royal family, if it be true that his father was son to king Joash, and brother to Amaziah, king of Judah. 'He was the earliest of the four great prophets, and entered on his prophetic office in the last year of Uzziah's reign, about 758 years before Christ. It is uncertain how long he continued to prophesy: some have thought that he died in the fifteenth or sixteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, and in that case he prophesied about forty-five years; but it appears more probable that he was put to death by command of Manasseh, in the first year of his reign; and in that case he prophesied more than sixty-one years. Isaiah is uniformly spoken of in Scripture as a prophet of the highest dignity. Bishop Lowth calls him the prince of all the prophets, and pronounces the whole of his work, except a few detached passages, to be poetical.

'The style of Isaiah is universally allowed to be remarkable for its elegance, force, and sublimity; and he gives so copious and circumstantial an account of the promised Messiah and his kingdom, that he has been emphatically called the Evangelical Prophet. This book, however, is not confined to prophecies relative to our Saviour; it contains many other predictions, and likewise several historical relations. It may be considered under six general divisions; the first division consists of the first five chapters, containing a general description of the state and condition of the Jews in the several periods of their history; the promulgation and success of the Gospel, and the coming of Christ to judgment. The second division consists of the next seven chapters, containing the promise to Ahaz, which was predictive of Christ, whose nature, birth, and kingdom, are distinctly described in the 9th chapter; the denunciations of punishment upon the Assyrians in the 10th chapter, seem an interruption to this glorious subject, which is resumed in the 11th chapter, where the prophet breaks out into a hymn of praise, celebrating the future triumphant state of the church. The third division, which reaches from the 13th to the 27th chapter inclusive, begins with a very remarkable prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which is considered as a type of Antichrist; it then describes the fate of the Jews, Assyrians, Moabites, Philistines, Arabians, Syrians, and Egyptians, and concludes in a manner similar to the last. The fourth division, which extends from the 28th to the 35th chapter inclusive, contains predictions relative to the then approaching invasion of Sennacherib; but it is interspersed with severe reproofs and threats against the Jews for disobedience and wilful blindness, and also with consolatory promises to those who should remain faithful in the service of God, alluding frequently to the times of the Gospel. The 36th and two following chapters, which constitute the fifth division, give an historical account of the invasion of Sennacherib, and of the prolongation of Hezekiah's life. The sixth division reaches from the 39th chapter to the end of the book: here the prophet generally addresses his countrymen as being actually in the captivity which he had previously foretold; he predicts the total destruction of the empire of Babylon, and the restoration of the Jews to their own land, by their great deliverer, Cyrus, whom he represents the Almighty as calling upon by name to execute his will, above 100 years before his birth. In this latter part of the book are principally contained the numerous prophecies, already noticed, concerning the birth, ministry, death, and religion, of Christ, together with a variety of circumstances which were to precede and follow his incarnation.'

'These prophecies,' says Dr. Gray, 'seem almost to anticipate the Gospel history, so clearly do they foreshow the divine character of Christ; his miracles; his peculiar qualities and virtues; his rejection and sufferings for our sins; his death, burial, and victory over death; and, lastly, his final glory, and the establishment, increase, and perfection of his kingdom, each specifically pointed out and portrayed with the most striking and discriminating characters.' With these predictions are mixed earnest exhortations to faith and obedience, and positive denunciations of God's wrath against the impenitently wicked; the most comfortable assurances of the constant providence of God, and the fulfilment of all his gracious promises, and descriptions of the glorious state of the Church, when it shall be enlarged by the conversion of the Jews, and the fulness of the Gentiles, in terms inimitably suited to the variety and loftiness of the subjects.

The Scripture mentions two sons of Isaiah, the one called Shear-Jashub, 'the remainder shall return,' the other Hash-baz, 'hasten to the slaughter.' The first name showed, that the captives who should be carried to Babylon, should return from thence after a certain time; the second name implied that the kingdoms of Israel and Syria would be shortly ravaged.

In the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, Sennacherib king of Assyria, warring in Judæa, sent Rabshakeh his cup-bearer with a summons to Hezekiah. Rabshakeh harangued the people of Jerusalem in a very insolent and blasphemous manner, of which Hezekiah being informed by his officers, he rent his clothes, went to the temple, and sent messengers to tell Isaiah: Isaiah answered, 'Fear not the blasphemous words wherewith the king of Assyria's servants have dishonoured me: behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour, and return to his own land, and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.' Accordingly, the Lord caused 18,500 men of Sennacherib's army to perish by the hand of the destroying angel; and this prince was obliged to fly to Nineveh, where he was killed by his own sons.

About that time Hezekiah fell dangerously ill, and Isaiah, coming to visit him, said, 'set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live.' Then Hezekiah prayed to the Lord, and Isaiah was directed to return and comfort him by promising him fifteen years addition of life, as a pledge of which he gave him the sign of the returning shadow. He also directed a lump of figs to be laid on Hezekiah's boil, who was so perfectly cured, that in three days he was in a condition to go to the temple.

Soon after this, Isaiah received orders from the Lord to walk three years bare-foot and naked, to denote the approaching captivity of Egypt and Cush, or Ethiopia. It is the constant tradition both of the Jews and Christians, that Isaiah was put to death by a saw in the beginning of the reign of Manasseh king of Judah. It is said, that the pretence of this impious prince for thus executing him, was an expression, (vi. 1.) 'I saw the Lord sitting on a throne;' which he affirmed to be a contradiction to Moses, (Exod. xxxiii. 20.) 'No man shall see me and live.' Calmet's Dictionary; Gray's Key to the Old Testament; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. p. 105, &c.

ISH'BOSHETH, איש-בשת, signifies man of shame, otherwise, the retarding of the man. Ishbosheth is the same as Ishbaal, the man of Baal. Ishbosheth, or Ishbaal, was the son and successor of Saul. Abner, Saul's kinsman and general, so managed, that Ishbosheth was acknowledged king by the greater part of Israel, whilst David reigned at Hebron over Judah. Ishbosheth resided at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan. He was forty-four years of age when he began to reign, and he reigned two years pretty peaceably. Afterwards, there was war between the house of David and that of Saul; but whilst the former continued to increase in strength, the latter became weaker every day. (2 Sam. ii. 8, &c.)

Saul had had a concubine named Rizpah. Abner was accused of having made too free with her. Ishbosheth, therefore, said to Abner, 'Why hast thou come near my father's concubine?' Abner, provoked at this reproach, swore he would endeavour to transfer the crown from the house of Saul to David; but he was treacherously killed by Joab. When Ishbosheth was informed of the death of Abner, he lost courage; and all Israel fell into great disorder: Ishbosheth almost at the same time was assassinated in his own house, by two captains of his troops, who coming into his palace, while he was sleeping on his bed during the heat of the day, stabbed him with their poniards. Then cutting off his head, they came and presented it to David at Hebron, thinking to receive a considerable reward. But he commanded these two murderers to be killed, and their hands and feet to be cut off, and hung up near the pool in Hebron. He placed the head of Ishbosheth in Abner's sepulchre at Hebron. With Ishbosheth ended the royalty of Saul's family.

ISH'MAEL, ישמעאל, signifies God that hears, and was the name of the son of Abraham and Sarah. Sarah, Abraham's wife, being barren, desired her husband to take her handmaid Hagar, that by her means she might have children. (Gen. xvi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Hagar, having conceived, despised her barren mistress Sarah, who using Hagar harshly, she fled from her. An angel of the Lord appeared to her in the wilderness, and bid her return to her mistress, adding, 'Thou hast conceived, and shalt bring forth a son, and call his name Ishmael (the Lord hath hearkened), because the Lord hath heard thee in thy affliction. He shall be a fierce and savage man, whose hand shall be against all men, and the hands of all men against him.' Hagar returned, therefore, to Abraham's house, where she had a son named Ishmael. Fourteen years after, the Lord having visited Sarah, and Isaac being born to Abraham, Ishmael, who till then had been considered as Abraham's sole heir, saw his hopes disappointed.

One day Isaac being about five or six years old, Ishmael teased him in a manner displeasing to Sarah, who, therefore, said to Abraham, Expel this servant with her son Ishmael. Abraham thought this expulsion was hard; but the Lord confirming it, he sent away Hagar with Ishmael, who, quitting that part of the country, wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba, and her stock of water failing, she left her son under a tree hard by, and went to a distance to lament. While here, she heard a voice from Heaven which said, 'Fear not, the Lord hath heard the child's voice. Rise, and take him up, for I will make him the father of a great people.' She rose, and God having shown her a well, she drew water out of it, gave some to her son, and carried him farther into the wilderness of Paran, where he abode. He became a very expert archer: and his mother married him to an Egyptian woman. He had twelve sons, viz. Nebajoth, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphtish, and Kedemah. He had also a daughter named Mahalath, or Bashemath, (Gen. xxxvi. 3.) who married Esau. (Gen. xxviii. 9.) From the twelve sons of Ishmael are derived the tribes of the Arabians, which are still subsisting; and their descendants inhabited the country between Havilah and Shur.

Ishmael died in the year of the world 2231, 'in the presence of all his brethren,' agreeably to the promise of God, that he should 'dwell in the presence of all his brethren' (Gen. xvi. 12.); and to show that this promise had been strictly fulfilled, it is remarked that his lot or inheritance was assigned him, by divine Providence, contiguous to that of the other branches of his family.

From Ishmael, as we have observed, proceeded the various tribes of Arabs (also called Saracens by the Christian writers,) who anciently were, and still continue to be, a very powerful people. They might, indeed, be emphatically styled a great nation, when the Saracens made their rapid and extensive conquests during the middle ages, and erected one of the largest empires that ever existed. 'He will be a wild man,' (Gen. xvi. 12.) literally, 'a wild ass-man;' that is, as wild as a wild ass; and the account of that animal in Job affords the best possible description of the wandering, lawless, and free-booting lives and manners of the Arabs. 'Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing.' (Job xxxix. 5—8.) God himself has 'sent them out free,' and 'has loosed them' from all political restraint. The same 'wilderness,' in which their ancestor Ishmael dwelt more than three thousand seven hundred years ago, is still their habitation, and in the barren land, 'where no other human beings could live, they have 'their dwellings.' They 'scorn the city,' and therefore have no fixed habitations. For their 'multitude,' they are not afraid. When they make their depredations on cities, towns, or caravans, they retire into the desert with such precipitancy that all pursuit is eluded; and in this respect 'the crying of the driver is disregarded.' They may be said to have no lands, and yet 'the range of the mountains is their pasture;' they pitch their tents, and feed their flocks, wherever they please; and they 'search after every green thing,' are continually looking after their prey, and seize every kind of property that comes in their way. It was further foretold, that Ishmael's 'hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against him.' Sesostris, Cyrus, Pompey, Trajan, and other ancient sovereigns, vainly attempted to subjugate the wandering Arabs; but, though they had temporary triumphs over some tribes, they were ultimately unsuccessful. From the commencement of the Ishmaelites to the present day, they have maintained their independency; and if there were no other argument to evince the divine origin of the Pentateuch, the account of Ishmael, and the prophecy concerning his descendants, collated with their history and manner of life during a period of nearly four thousand years, would be sufficient: it may indeed be pronounced absolutely demonstrative. Horne's Introduction, vol. i. pp. 308, 309; Dr. A. Clarke's Comment. on Gen. xvi. 12.; xxv. 18.

IS'RAEL, יִשְׂרָאֵל, signifies who prevails with God; otherwise, the man that sees God. This name was given by the angel to Jacob, after having wrestled with him at Mahanaim, or Peniel. (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2, 28, 29, 30. Hosea xii. 3.) See JACOB.

By the name Israel is sometimes understood the person of the patriarch Jacob; sometimes, the people of Israel, the race of Jacob; sometimes, the kingdom of Israel, the ten tribes, distinct from the kingdom of Judah; and sometimes, the called of God, from the world—the Church.

ISRAELITES, the descendants of Israel, at first called Hebrews, a name derived, as some think, from Abraham, who came from the other side of the Euphrates, or, as others are of opinion, from Heber, a progenitor of that patriarch; afterwards Israelites, from Israel or Jacob; and, lastly, Jews, particularly after their return from the captivity of Babylon, because the tribe of Judah was then most numerous, and foreigners knew scarcely any other. See JEWS.

IS/SACHAR, יִשָּׁכָר, signifies price, or recompence. Issachar, the fifth son of Jacob and Leah, conceived after Rachel had purchased the mandrakes which Reuben brought to his mother Leah, (Gen. xxx. 14—18.) was born about the year of the world 2255. He had four sons; Tola, Phuvah, Job, and Shimron. (Gen. xli. 13.) We know nothing particular of his life. Jacob, blessing him, said, 'Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens: And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant: and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.' The Chaldee translates in a quite contrary sense, 'He shall subdue the provinces of the people, and drive out their inhabitants, and those who are left shall be his servants and his tributaries.' Grotius understands it nearly in the same way. The pusillanimity which is generally attributed to this tribe certainly does not agree with the light in which they are represented in Scripture. It appears that they were a laborious, hardy, valiant tribe, patient in labour, and invincible in war; bearing both these burdens with great constancy, whenever it was found necessary.

The tribe of Issachar had its portion in one of the best parts of the land of Canaan, along the great plain, or valley of Jezreel. Calmet says, that it was bounded on the south by Manasseh, on the north by Zebulun, on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the east by the Jordan, with the extremity of the sea of Tiberias; but Dr. Wells observes, that as it is plainly said, (Josh. xvii. 10.) that the lots of Ephraim and Manasseh 'met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east,' it seems necessarily to follow, that Issachar could not reach westward to the sea. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 316.

ITUREA, Ἰτρούρα, signifies keepings; in the Syriac, mountains, or mountainous. Iturea was a province of Syria or Arabia, beyond Jordan, east of the Batanea, and south of Trachonitis. Philip, one of Herod's sons, was tetrarch, or prince of Iturea, when John the Baptist entered on his ministry. (Luke iii. 1.)

JUBILEE, in Hebrew, Jobel. The jubilee year was the fiftieth year which occurred after seven weeks of years, or seven times seven years: 'And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year; it shall be a jubilee unto you.' (Levit. xxv. 10.) Notwithstanding the clearness of the text, several commentators maintain that the jubilee was celebrated in the forty-ninth year, the last year of the seventh week of years. Moses favours this opinion: 'Thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years, and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years.' (Levit. xxv. 8.) They who maintain this, show the inconvenience of celebrating the jubilee in the fiftieth year, immediately after the sabbatical rest of the forty-ninth year. These two years of rest following each other might be attended with dangerous consequences in any country, and might produce a famine. If the civil year began at a different time from the ecclesiastical year, this might solve the difficulty: that is, the fiftieth year, by one account, might begin before the forty-ninth year, by the other account, was fully completed. Besides, it is probable, that any part of a year was commonly reckoned for a whole year among the Jews, as it was, and still is, among some of the eastern nations.

The etymology of the Hebrew word jobel, (whence our jubilee is derived) has not been well ascertained. Some think that it signifies a ram's horn, because the trumpets which were used in proclaiming this solemnity were made out of rams' horns. The most probable opinion, however, is that of Calmet, who deduces it from the Hebrew verb hobil, to bring or call back; because estates, &c. which had been alienated, were then brought back to their original owners. Such appears also to have been the meaning affixed to the word by the Septuagint, who render the Hebrew word jobel, by ἀφεσις, remission, and by Josephus, who says that it signifies liberty.

The jubilee year began on the first day of Tisri, the first month of the civil year, and about the autumnal equinox. In this year no one either sowed or reaped; but all were satisfied with what the earth and the trees produced of themselves. Each took possession again of his inheritance, whether it had been sold, mortgaged, or alienated. Hebrew slaves, with their wives and children, were set free; even they who had renounced that privilege, which the sabbatical year gave them of recovering their liberty. Even all foreign slaves enjoyed the right of the jubilee. The first nine days were spent in festivity, nearly similar to that of the Romans in the Saturnalia. On the tenth of Tisri, the day of solemn expiation, the trumpets were sounded; and at that instant the slaves were declared free, and the lands returned to their ancient owners. This law was designed to hinder the rich from oppressing the poor, and reducing them to perpetual slavery, and that they should not obtain possession of all the lands of the whole nation, by purchase, mortgage, or usurpation; that debts should not be too much multiplied; and that slaves, with their wives and children, should not always continue in servitude. Besides, Moses intended to preserve, as much as possible, the liberty of persons, equality of fortunes, and the order of families. He also wished that the people should be attached both by enjoyment and prejudice to their country, their lands, and inheritances; that they should have an affection for them, as estates descended to them from their ancestors, and designed for their posterity.

Several privileges were attached to the jubilee year, which did not belong to the sabbatical year; and the sabbatical year possessed also some advantages over the jubilee year. Houses and other edifices built in walled towns did not return to the proprietor in the jubilee year.

After the captivity of Babylon, the jubilee, as it was instituted with a design only to prevent the utter destruction of that partition which had been made by Joshua, and the confusion of tribes and families, could no longer be observed, as before the dispersion of the tribes; those Jews who returned from the captivity settling as they could, and a great number of families, and perhaps whole tribes, remaining in the place of their captivity.

Usher places the first jubilee in the year of the world 2609, before Christ, 1395; the second in the year of the world 2658, &c.

The law concerning the sabbatical year, and especially the year of jubilee, affords a decisive proof of the divine legation of Moses. No legislator, unless he was conscious that he was divinely inspired, would have committed himself by enacting such a law; and nothing like it can be found among the systems of jurisprudence of any other nation, ancient or modern. 'How incredible is it that any legislator would have ventured to propose such a law as this, except in the fullest conviction on both sides, that a peculiar Providence would constantly facilitate its execution. When this law, therefore, was proposed and received, such a conviction must have existed in both the Jewish legislator and the Jewish people. Since, then, nothing could have produced this conviction, but the experience or the belief of some such miraculous interposition as the history of the Pentateuch details, the very existence of this law is a standing monument that, when it was given, the Mosaic miracles were fully believed. Now this law was coeval with the witnesses themselves. If, then, the facts were so plain and public, that those who witnessed them could not be mistaken as to their existence or miraculous nature, the reality of the Mosaic miracles is clear and undeniable.' 'It is not easily believed,' says Stillingfleet, 'that a nation, whose subsistence was derived from agriculture and pasturage, would have submitted to laws apparently so contrary to their interest, as those relating to the sabbatical and jubilee years, unless they had been convinced that miraculous plenty and security would be the certain consequence of obedience.'

'The reason and design of the law of the jubilee was partly political, and partly typical. It was political, to prevent the too great oppression of the poor, as well as their liability to perpetual slavery. By this means the rich were prevented from accumulating lands upon lands, and a kind of equality was preserved through all the families of Israel. Never was there any people so effectually secure of their liberty and property, as the Israelites were: God not only engaging so to protect those invaluable blessings by his providence, that they should not be taken away from them by others; but providing, in a particular manner by this law, that they should not be thrown away through their own folly; since the property, which every man or family had in their dividend of the land of Canaan, could not be sold or alienated for above half a century. By this means, also, the distinction of tribes was preserved, in respect both to their families and possessions; for this law rendered it necessary for them to keep genealogies of their families, that they might be able, when there was occasion, on the jubilee year, to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. By this means it was certainly known of what tribe and family the Messiah sprung. Upon which Dr. Allix observes, that God did not suffer them to continue in their captivity out of their own land for the space of two jubilees, lest by that means their genealogies should be lost or confounded. A further civil use of the jubilee might be for the readier computation of time. For, as the Greeks computed by olympiads, the Romans by lustra, and we by centuries, the Jews probably reckoned by jubilees; and it might be one design of this institution, to mark out these large portions of time for the readier computation of successive years of ages.

'There was also a typical design and use of the jubilee, which is pointed out by the prophet Isaiah, when he says, in reference to the Messiah, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.' (Isa. lxi. 1, 2.) Where 'the acceptable year of the Lord,' when 'liberty was proclaimed to the captives,' and 'the opening of the prison to them that were bound,' evidently refers to the jubilee; but, in the prophetic sense, means the Gospel state and dispensation, which proclaims spiritual liberty from the bondage of sin and satan, and the liberty of returning to our own possession, even the heavenly inheritance, to which, having incurred a forfeiture by sin, we had lost all right and claim.' That our Lord began his public ministry on a jubilee, Dr. Hales thinks, is evident from his declaration: 'The Lord hath anointed me (as the Christ) to preach the Gospel to the poor: he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to proclaim deliverance to the captives, and restoration of sight to the blind; to set at liberty the bruised; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.' (Luke iv. 18, 19.) The same learned author also observes, that it appears to have been a jubilee from the following argument: 'to the first general sabbatical year, before Christ 1589, add the year of our Lord's public ministry, A. D. 28, and divide the sum 1617 years, by the jubilee period, 49 years, it leaves no remainder. Therefore A. D. 28 was the last year of the period, or a jubilee itself.'

The jubilee was likewise typical of the general resurrection. 'It was,' says Mr. Parkhurst, 'a most lively and animating prefiguration of the grand consummation of time, which will be introduced in like manner by the trump of God, (1 Cor. xv. 52.) when the children and heirs of God shall be delivered from all their forfeitures, and restored to the eternal inheritance allotted to them by their Father; and thenceforth rest from their labours, and be supported in life and happiness by what the field of God shall supply.' Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 267; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 279; Horne's Introduction; Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book iii. cap. 10.

JU'DAH, or JEHUDAH, יהודה, 'Yôdâh, signifies the praise of the Lord, and was the name of the fourth son of Jacob and Leah, born in Mesopotamia, in the year of the world 2249. He advised his brethren to sell Joseph to the Ishmaelite merchants, rather than imbrue their hands in his blood. He married Shuah, the daughter of a Canaanite, whose name was Hirah, and by whom he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. (Gen. xxxviii. 2—6.) He married Er to a young Canaanitess, named Tamar. Er behaved wickedly, and was slain by God. Judah required Onan his second son to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to his brother; but Onan eluded the purpose of this connexion. Therefore the Lord punished him also with death. Judah was afraid of giving Shelah his third son to Tamar, and amused her with promises which he did not perform. Tamar, therefore, disguised herself, and placed herself in the way which Judah was to pass. Judah went in unto her, and she had by him two sons, Pharez and Zarah. (Gen. xxxviii. 27, 28, 29.)

Judah was always considered as the chief of Jacob's children. His tribe was the most powerful and numerous. The privileges of the first-born seem to have been transferred from Reuben to him, after the incest of Reuben with Bilhah, his father's concubine. The blessing given by Jacob on his death-bed to Judah was as follows: 'Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee. Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey my son thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until SHILOH come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.' This place contains a promise that the regal power should not go out of his family, and that the Messiah should derive his birth from him.

The southern parts of Palestine fell to Judah's lot; and the tribes of Simeon and Dan possessed many cities, which at first were given to Judah. This tribe at the Exodus contained 74,600 men, capable of bearing arms. The crown passed from Benjamin, (from Saul and Ishbosheth) into Judah, which was David's tribe, and that of the kings his successors, until the Babylonish captivity. And after the return from that captivity, although this tribe did not reign, it gave the sceptre to those who did reign, and in some sort combined in itself the whole Hebrew nation, who from that time were known only as Jews, descendants of Judah. Judah, when named in opposition to Israel, or the kingdom of the ten tribes, or Samaria, denotes the government and country of Judah and of David's descendants. One of the principal prerogatives of this tribe was, that it preserved the true religion, and the public exercise of the priesthood, with the legal ceremonies in the temple of Jerusalem; while the ten tribes gave themselves up to idolatry and the worship of the golden calves.

JUDAISM, the religious doctrines and rites of the Jews, the descendants of Abraham. With Abraham, Judaism may be said, in some sense, to have begun; but it was not till the promulgation of the law upon Mount Sinai, that the Jewish economy was established, and that to his posterity was committed a dispensation which was to distinguish them ever after from every other people on earth. Their history, both before and during their settlement in Canaan, the land of promise, is contained in the Old Testament, and in the writings of Josephus, their countryman and historian, who was present at the last siege of their city. The miseries which they sustained from famine, from pestilence, from the assaults of the Romans, and from the implacable fury of contending parties among themselves, during the last siege of their city, far surpass, in horror, every account of every other siege in the records of the world. The city was taken, burned to the ground, and razed from its foundations. Eleven hundred thousand Jews perished during the siege; and, of ninety-seven thousand captives, some were reserved to grace the triumphal return of Titus to Rome, and the rest dispersed as slaves, or as criminals, throughout the empire. During the continuance of the Roman empire, they experienced from different emperors various degrees of oppression or forbearance. Sometimes they indulged their inveteracy against the Christians, in tumultuous and sanguinary outrages; at other times they suffered many grievous cruelties from the spirit of bigotry and retaliation. From Julian, who equalled them in enmity towards the Christians, they received many marks of favour. His abortive endeavours to rebuild the temple and city of Jerusalem are well known; a terrible earthquake, and flames of fire issuing from the earth, killed the workmen, and scattered the materials. They soon became known as divided into the Western and Eastern Jews. The Western were those who inhabited Egypt, Judea, Italy, and other parts of the Roman Empire;—the Eastern, those who were settled in Babylon, Chaldæa, Persia, &c. The head of the Western Jews was known by the name of Patriarch; the head of the Eastern Jews was called Prince of the Captivity. The office of Patriarch was abolished by the imperial laws about the year 429; from which time the Western Jews were solely under the rule of the chiefs of their synagogues, whom they called Primates. The Princes of the Captivity had a longer and more splendid sway. They resided at Babylon or at Bagdad, and exercised their authority over all the Jews who were established there, or in the adjacent country, or in Assyria, Chaldæa, or Parthia; and they subsisted as late as the 12th century. About the year 1038, the Jews were expelled from Babylon, when some of the most learned of them passed into Africa, and thence into Spain, where great bodies of them settled, and soon after assisted the Saracens in their conquest of that kingdom. Upon that event, an intimate connexion took place between the disciples of Moses and those of Mahomet, which was cemented by their common hatred of the Christians, and subsisted till their common expulsion.

The Mosaic dispensation consisted of three parts; the religious faith and worship of the Jews, their civil polity, and precepts for the regulation of their moral conduct. Their civil government, as well as their sacred polity, was of divine institution; and, on all important occasions, their public affairs were conducted by the Deity himself, or by persons bearing his commission. The tenets of the Jews, as long as they retained their national existence, are known, or ought to be known, by all Christians. With respect to those of the more modern Jews, Moses Maimonides, an Egyptian, and one of the most illustrious of their Rabbins, drew up for them, in the eleventh century, the following confession of faith, which all Jews at this day admit. It consists only of these thirteen articles, of which the seventh affirms the authenticity, and the eighth the genuineness of the books of Moses. 1. I believe, with a true and perfect faith, that God is the creator, (whose name be blessed) governor, and maker of all creatures; and that he hath wrought all things, worketh, and shall work, for ever.—2. I believe, with perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is one; and that such an unity as is in him can be found in none other; and that he alone hath been our God, is, and for ever shall be.—3. I believe with a perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is not corporeal, not to be comprehended with any bodily properties; and that there is no bodily essence that can be likened unto him.—4. I believe, with a perfect faith, the Creator (whose name be blessed) to be the first and the last, that nothing was before him, and that he shall abide the last for ever.—5. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the Creator (whose name be blessed) is to be worshipped, and none else.—6. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the words of the prophets are true.—7. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the prophecies of Moses (our master, may he rest in peace!) were true; that he was the father and chief of all wise men that lived before him, or ever shall live after him.—8. I believe, with a perfect faith, that all the law, which at this day is found in our hands, was delivered by God himself to our master Moses, (God's peace be with him!).—9. I believe, with a perfect faith, that the same law is never to be changed, nor any other to be given us of God (whose name be blessed).—10. I believe, &c. that God (whose name be blessed) understandeth all the works and thoughts of men, as it is written in the prophets; he fashioneth their hearts alike, he understandeth all their works.—11. I believe, &c. that God will recompense good to them that keep his commandments, and will punish them who transgress them.—12. I believe, &c. that the Messiah is yet to come; and although he retard his coming, yet I will wait for him till he come.—13. I believe, &c. that the dead shall be restored to life, when it shall seem fit unto God, the Creator (whose name be blessed, and memory celebrated, world without end. Amen.)

The laws of the Jews, religious and moral, civil, political, and ritual, that is, a complete system of pure Judaism, are contained in the books of the Old Testament, and chiefly in the five Books of Moses, whose writings are at this day revered, and considered as divinely inspired, by almost two-thirds of the inhabitants of the world. But for the system of the Rabbinists, who have long been the most numerous party among the Jews, and who, in regard to doctrine, seem to be of 'the sect of the Pharisees,' recourse must also be had to their Mishna, Gemaras, Talmuds, and Targums.

The religion of the ancestors of the Jews, before the time of Moses, was the simplest and purest in the world, consisting in the worship of the one living and true God, under whose immediate direction they were; in a firm reliance on his promises under all difficulties and dangers; and in a thankful acknowledgment for all his blessings and deliverances. In that early age, we find the religious custom of tithes; we likewise read of altars, pillars, and monuments raised, and sacrifices offered to God; which last are now generally believed to have been of Divine institution. They used circumcision, not so much as a religious act, as a seal of the covenant which God had made with Abraham. As to the mode and circumstances of Divine worship, they were much at liberty till the time of Moses; but their legislator, by the direction and appointment of God himself, prescribed an instituted form of religion, and regulated ceremonies, feasts, days, priests, and sacrifices, with the utmost exactness. The rites and observances of their religion under the law were numerous, and its sanctions severe. Notwithstanding that God's prophets, and oracles, and ordinances, and the symbol of his presence, were among them, the Jews were ever very prone to idolatry, till the Babylonish furnace thoroughly purified them from that corruption. After their seventy years' captivity, they turned indeed from idolatry, and have never again been guilty of the crime; yet they turned not to true and pure religion, but to superstition, formality, hypocrisy, and schism. Such, in a great measure, was their religious worship and character in our Saviour's time; and such, many seem to think, it still continues to be, in a greater or less degree, at the present day.

In the wilderness, the tabernacle was constructed for the worship of God; and the Jewish temple, afterwards built by Solomon, was the grandest structure in the world. The second temple, built by Zerubbabel and the Jews, on their return from Babylon, and afterwards repaired by Herod, was far inferior to the former, and wanted several things which the other contained.

Ancient Judaism, compared with all religions except the Christian, was distinguished for its purity and spirituality; and the whole Mosaic ritual was of a typical nature. As formerly, whilst they enjoyed an established religion, they still have liturgies, in which are all the prescribed forms of their synagogue-worship; and those who have not time to go to the synagogue, must say their prayers at home, three times every day, that is, in the morning, in the afternoon, and at night. At present, the Jewish church is governed by a presiding rabbi in the city or town where they may be settled, who attaches to himself two other rabbies; and these three combined form a kind of tribunal in sacred or religious causes, and frequently determine private disputes. This tribunal is termed Beth Din, or the House of Justice. As the priesthood ceased with the temple, and is at present totally abrogated, the term high-priest is an exploded name. No presiding rabbi now exercises the functions of high-priest, which were applicable to the temple only. Hence the choice of rabbi is not confined to the tribe of Levi, though that tribe is the only one that, as they conceive, can now be at all distinguished. At present, its members are all considered as laymen. Yet, they have some trifling distinctions paid them in the service of the synagogue.

It is reckoned that there are as many Jews now in the world as formerly, or even more than since they became a nation. Some have computed them at three millions, and others at more than double that number. 'It is impossible,' says Basnage, 'to fix the number of persons this nation is at present composed of. But yet, we have reason to believe, there are still nearly three millions of people, who profess this religion, and, as their phrase is, are witnesses of the unity of God in all the nations of the world.' The author of a late work observes, that their present number 'is computed to be 3,000,000, one of which resides in the Turkish empire; 300,000 in Persia, China, India, on the east and west of the Ganges, or Tartary; 1,700,000 in the rest of Europe, Africa, and in America.' Mr. Adam says, 'I believe I am not quite singular in my opinion, that their whole number at present, exclusive of the posterity of the ten tribes, to whose numbers, state, and situation, we are entire strangers, does not exceed 2,500,000.' Who could foretell such a wonderful increase and propagation of a branch only of one man's family, but the same Divine Person whose power could effect it? The number of Jews in Judea has for many ages been inconsiderable, whilst they abound every where else. Agreeably to the prediction respecting them, (Deut. xxviii. 65.) they have been so far from finding rest, they have been banished from city to city, and from country to country. Their land itself seems to lie under a never-ceasing curse. Pagans, Christians, Mahometans; in a word, all nations have by turns seized and held Jerusalem and Judea. To the Jew only hath God refused the possession of this small tract of ground, so supremely necessary for him, since he ought to worship upon this mountain.

The dispersion, preservation, and present state of the Jews, are remarkable particulars respecting this people, and furnish a strong argument in favour of our religion, even in the opinion of its boldest adversaries. They are admitted and fixed, but never incorporated with any nation under heaven. Mr. Bryant well observes, that 'rivers run downwards through many outlets to the sea, and are soon blended and lost in the ocean; but the Jews are like the waters of Styx, which remain unmixed, wherever they flow.' They are every where distinct and unconverted; nor will their prejudices against Christianity allow them to examine, with coolness and impartiality, its genuine doctrines. Though nothing can be more clear and express than our best and most esteemed writers are on the unity of the Godhead, yet the Jews still persist in believing that Christians would destroy that unity, and are the direct supporters of Tritheism. Not satisfied with having rejected and crucified the Lord that bought them, they insist, with Socinians, that the Holy Ghost is not a Person, but an energy, operation, quality, or power. The Jews 'ought to be looked upon as one of those prodigies which we admire without comprehending; since, in spite of evils so durable, and a patience so long exercised, they are preserved by a particular Providence. The Jew ought to be weary of expecting a Messiah, who so unkindly disappoints his vain hopes; and the Christian ought to have his attention and regard excited towards men whom God preserves, for so great a length of time, under calamities which would have been the total ruin of any other people.'

The Jews comfort themselves with the hope, that their hour of triumph is at hand, when the long expected Messiah will come, —will gather them from the corners of the earth,—will settle them in the land of their fathers, and subject all the nations of the earth to his throne. Whilst they believe, that they shall ever continue in the profession of their religion, Christians look for their general conversion, and acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as the true Messiah. This event, from some remarkable signs of the times, has been supposed by some learned men to be at no great distance. Most Christian divines suppose that they shall actually be called to inhabit their own land; but others contend that there will be only a general conversion of the Jews in the countries where they respectively dwell, without emigration. See Jews. Adam's Religious World, vol. i. p. 2—78.

JUDAS MACCABE'US, son of Mattathias, succeeded his father as captain of the Jewish people, during the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes. He had before given proofs of his valour, conduct, and zeal for God's law, by opposing those who forsook the Lord, and sacrificed to idols. One of the first expeditions of Judas Maccabeus was against Apollonius, general of the Syrian troops in Palestine. Judas killed him, and destroyed his army; he took Apollonius's sword, which he commonly used in battle during the remainder of his life.

Antiochus, king of Syria, surprised at the valour of Judas, sent three generals against him, Nicanor, Georgias, and Ptolemy. Judas attacked Nicanor alone, and routed his army. Georgias coming afterwards, and seeing Nicanor's camp on fire, made haste back again, without engaging. The year following, Lysias, regent of the kingdom, came into Judea with 60,000 men, and 5000 horse. Judas went to meet them to Bethoron, and defeated them.

Judas, being thus master of the field, went up to Jerusalem, where he found the holy places deserted, the altar profaned, the courts filled with briars, and the chambers adjoining the temple destroyed. Judas employed part of his people in cleansing the holy places. They laid aside the stones of the altar which had been profaned, built a new one of rough stones, rebuilt the holy place and the sanctuary, made new sacred vessels, and on the 25th of Casleu, in the year 148 of the Greeks, and in the year of the world 3840, they offered the morning sacrifice on the altar of burnt-offerings, and restored public worship in the temple, which had been interrupted three years. They made a new dedication of the temple with all the pomp they could, according to the present state of their affairs, and celebrated this feast during eight days. (1 Macc. iv. 53. 54. 55, &c.) The memorial of this dedication is spoken of, (John x. 22.) where it is said that Jesus came to the temple of Jerusalem at the feast of the dedication, in winter.

In a little time after, and probably the same year, Judas again defeated two Syrian generals, Timotheus and Bacchides. Bethsura likewise was fortified by his order, being a sort of barrier, which covered Jerusalem on the side of Idumea. Judas attacked the Idumeans, the inhabitants of the Acrabatane, the sons of Bean, the Ammonites, and Timotheus; and he dispersed all his enemies. Judas afterwards made war against the Idumeans, took Hebron, entered the country of the Philistines, took Azotus, over-ran Samaria, and returned, laden with booty, into the land of Judah. In the mean time, Lysias came a second time into Judea, at the head of a powerful army, but was forced to save himself with dishonour, and to make peace with Judas. Eupator, who succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, permitted the Jews to live according to their own laws, and to perform all their offices in the temple at Jerusalem.

This treaty having been concluded, Lysias returned to Antioch. But Timotheus, Apollonius, Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicator, who stayed in the country, sought all opportunities of interrupting the peace. The inhabitants of Joppa having invited the Jews of their city to come on board their vessels, as if to divert themselves on the sea, drowned all of them, together with their wives and children. Judas, to revenge this treachery, burnt their ships and their harbour; he would have done the same to their city, if he had not received the news that the people of Jamnia designed likewise to extirpate the Jews of their city. Judas prevented them, and burnt their harbours and their vessels. Thence he went beyond Jordan, attacked Caspis or Esebon, took it, sacked it, and there was so great a number slain, that the water of a neighbouring lake was dyed with their blood. He advanced as far as Characa in the land of the Tubienians, but not finding Timotheus there, of whom he was in pursuit, he met him soon after at the head of 120,000 foot, and 2,500 horse. Though Judas had only 6000 soldiers, yet he dispersed this army, and killed 30,000 men.

After Pentecost he marched against Georgias, who escaped with great difficulty. Judas gathered his people together at Odollam, to celebrate the sabbath; and the day after, when they came to bury the Jews who had been killed in the battle, they found under the clothes of the dead, some things which had been consecrated to idols in Jamnia. All imputed their death to the concealing what was so impure and profane. Judas collected twelve thousand drachms of silver, which he sent to Jerusalem, that sacrifices might be offered for the sins of the dead.

Antiochus Eupator came himself into Judea, attended by Lysias, with an army of 100,000 foot, 20,000 horse, and thirty-two elephants. He besieged Bethsura, and the small number of troops which Judas had with him, being unable to make head against the king's forces, retired to Jerusalem. Eupator followed them, and besieged the city, particularly the temple, which Judas had fortified, and to which he had retreated. The siege continuing a long time, Lysias, fearing lest Philip, who had been declared regent of the kingdom by Antiochus Epiphanes, might make himself master of Antioch, concluded a peace with Judas, and returned speedily to Syria. Demetrius, son of Seleucus, Eupator's uncle, and lawful heir to the kingdom of Syria, gave the high-priesthood of the Jews to Alcimus, and sent Bacchides with him into Judea to establish him. Demetrius sent Nicanor with troops into Judea, who dispatched to Judas proposals of peace, which Judas laid before the people and senators, and all were of opinion to accept them. Nicanor continued afterwards at Jerusalem in the citadel, and Judas in the city. Nicanor conceived a very great esteem for Judas, and they lived together with familiarity.

Alcimus, observing this good understanding between them, told Demetrius that Nicanor betrayed his interests. The king, exasperated by these calumnies, wrote to Nicanor, that he took very ill his friendship with Judas, and commanded him to send him instantly in chains to Antioch. Nicanor sought an opportunity for this purpose, but Judas, perceiving his familiarity to be grown cold, distrusted him; and collecting troops he stole away privately from Nicanor, who attacked him at Caphar-Salama, but was repulsed with loss, and obliged to retreat to Jerusalem. He threatened to destroy the temple, if Judas was not put into his hands, and departed to Bethoron, where the Syrian army joined him; but Judas attacked him with so much impetuosity, that he routed his troops, and Nicanor himself was one of the first that was killed. Nicanor's head and right hand were hung up over against Jerusalem, and a feast was instituted on the 13th of Adar to celebrate the memory of this victory.

Demetrius being informed that Nicanor was killed, and his army defeated, sent again Bacchides and Alcimus into Judea, with the right wing of his troops. They came first to Jerusalem, and thence to Berea, a city of Benjamin. Judas was at Eleasa, with three thousand chosen men. His people were terrified at so great an army; and many fled; so that not above eight hundred remained with him. Judas, finding himself forsaken, was discouraged, and said, Let us go, and, if we can, engage the enemy! His people remonstrated that he should wait for reinforcements. He said, God forbid that we should do so; if our hour be come, let us die courageously. After a long and obstinate fight, Judas himself fell, and the rest fled. Jonathan and Simon carried off their brother's body, and laid it in their sepulchre at Modin. All Israel greatly lamented his death.

JUDAS ISCARIOT, (Heb. ISH KARIOTH, that is, a man of Karioth, or Carioth,) or Judas the Traitor, being chosen by Jesus Christ into the number of his apostles, and appointed their treasurer, was so wicked as to betray his Lord into the hands of his enemies. Mary, sister of Lazarus, having poured a precious perfume on our Saviour's feet, and another woman, whose name is not mentioned, having on another day anointed his head with costly and fragrant spikenard, Judas was one that murmured most at these actions. Soon after, he went to the chief priests, and undertook to deliver Jesus to them. They promised him thirty pieces of silver, or thirty shekels, about 3*l.* 15*s.* or, according to Dr. Prideaux, 4*l.* 10*s.* After the paschal supper, and before the institution of the eucharist, Judas left the room, to inform the priests that he would that night give up Jesus to them, because he knew the place whither he designed to retire.

'The treachery of Judas Iscariot, his remorse, and suicide, are occurrences altogether so strange and extraordinary, that the motives by which he was actuated require to be developed as far as may be done, where the Evangelists are, in a great measure, silent concerning them, from the circumstances of the history itself, and from the feelings of human nature. Judas, the leading trait in whose character was covetousness, was probably induced to follow Jesus at first, with a view to the riches, honours, and other temporal advantages which he, in common with the rest, expected the Messiah's friends would enjoy. The astonishing miracles he saw him perform, left him no room to doubt of the reality of his Master's pretensions, who had, indeed, himself, in private, actually accepted the title from his apostles; and Judas must have been much disappointed when Jesus repeatedly refused the proffered royalty from the people in Galilee, after the miracle of feeding the five thousand, and again after his public procession to Jerusalem. He might naturally have grown impatient under the delay, and dissatisfied also with Jesus, for openly discouraging all ambitious views among his disciples; and, therefore, he might have devised the scheme of delivering him up to the Sanhedrim, or great council of the nation, (composed of the chief priests, scribes, and elders) in order to compel him to avow himself openly as the Messiah before them, and to work such miracles, or to give them the sign which they so often required, as would convince and induce them to elect him in due form, and by that means enable him to reward his followers. Even the rebukes of Jesus, for his covetousness, and detection of his treacherous scheme, although they unquestionably offended Judas, might only serve to stimulate him to the speedier execution of his plot, during the feast of the passover, while the great concourse of the Jews, from all parts assembled, might powerfully support the Sanhedrim, and their Messiah, against the Romans. The success of this measure, though against his Master's will, would be likely to procure him pardon, and even to recommend him to favour afterwards. Such might have been the plausible suggestions, by which Satan tempted him to the commission of this crime. But when Judas, who attended the whole trial, saw that it turned out quite contrary to his expectations, that Jesus was capitally convicted by the council, as a false Christ, and false prophet, notwithstanding he had openly avowed himself; and that he had wrought no miracle, either for their conviction, or for his own deliverance, as Judas well knew he could, even from the circumstances of healing Malchus, after he was apprehended; when he further reflected, like Peter, on his Master's merciful forewarnings of his treachery, and mild and gentle rebuke, at the commission of it; he was seized with remorse, and offered to return the paltry bribe of thirty pieces of silver, to the chief priests and elders, instantly on the spot, saying, I sinned, in delivering up innocent blood, and expected that on this they would have desisted from the prosecution. But they were obstinate, and not only would not relent, but threw the whole load of guilt upon him, refusing to take their own share: for they said, 'What is that to us? see thou to that;' thus, according to the aphorism, loving the treason, but hating the traitor, after he had served their wicked turn. Stung to the quick, at their refusal to take back the money, while they condemned himself, he went to the temple, cast down the whole sum in the treasury, or place for receiving the offerings of the people; and after he had thus returned the wages of iniquity, he retired to some lonely place, not far, perhaps, from the scene of Peter's repentance, and in the frenzy of despair, and at the instigation of the devil, hanged himself; crowning with suicide, the murder of his master and his friend; rejecting his compassionate Saviour, and plunging his own soul into perdition! In another place it is said, that 'falling headlong he burst asunder, and all his bowels gushed out.' (Acts i. 18.) Both these accounts might be true: he might first have hanged himself from some tree on the edge of a precipice; and the rope or branch breaking, he might be dashed to pieces by the fall.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. pp. 877, 878.

JUDAS, or JUDE, surnamed Lebbeus and Thaddeus, was the son of Alpheus or Cleophas, the brother of James the Less, the cousin-german of our Saviour, and one of the twelve apostles. His call to be a disciple of Jesus is not recorded; and, except in the catalogue of the apostles, he is mentioned only once in the Gospels. After Christ's interesting discourse to his disciples not long before his crucifixion, 'Judas saith unto him, (not Iscariot,) Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world?' (John xiv. 22.) From this question it is inferred, that at this time Judas had the common prejudice of the Jews concerning the kingdom of the Messiah. Jude is not mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, nor does any ancient author record of him a single circumstance on which we can depend. He is generally reckoned among those apostles who did not suffer martyrdom.

The Epistle of St. Jude was considered as genuine by several of the ancient fathers; Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and Epiphanius. Jerome says, 'Jude, brother of James, left a short Epistle, which is one of the seven called catholic. But because of a quotation from a book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by many; however, at length it has obtained authority, and is reckoned among the sacred Scriptures.' Upon this subject it has been remarked, that Jude does not in fact quote any book of Enoch; he only says, that 'Enoch prophesied,' and that prophecy might have been traditional. To whatever Jude refers, it does not afford a sufficient reason for setting aside the genuineness of this epistle, in opposition to the authorities of the ancient fathers. As it is evident that this Epistle was written some time subsequent to St. Peter's Epistles, and St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy, in which are contained certain prophecies referred to by Jude; the date of this Epistle has been placed by many commentators about the year 70. Bishop Watson's Theological Tracts, vol. ii. pp. 480, &c.; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 501.

JUDEA, a province of Asia, called anciently the Land of Canaan, or Palestine, the Land of Promise, the Land of Israel. Judea may be considered as divided into four parts; 1. the western district, Palestine, inhabited by Philistines; 2. on the east of this, the mountainous district called the hill country, (Josh. xxi. 11. Luke i. 39.) which the Rabbins affect to call the king's mountain, for what reason is not known, except that upon the northern part of this ridge Jerusalem is situated; 3. east of these mountains was the Wilderness of Judea, along the shore of the Dead Sea; and 4. the valleys, &c. west of Jerusalem, towards the Mediterranean.

Judea no doubt derived its name from Judah, which tribe was settled in the south of the Promised Land, and maintained its kingdom after the northern tribes had been expatriated. This circumstance, together with that of Judah being principally peopled with Israelites after the return from captivity, and being first settled, on account of the temple being established in it, accounts for the general name of Jews being given to the Hebrew nation. Judea was one of the principal divisions of the Holy Land in the days of Christ: it included from the Mediterranean Sea west, to the Dead Sea east. It was bounded north by Samaria, and south by Edom or the desert. It is extremely mountainous in some parts, as from Hebron to Jerusalem. West of these mountains is the principal extent of country; but this has many hills. East of the mountains is the Wilderness of Judea, stretching to the Dead Sea.

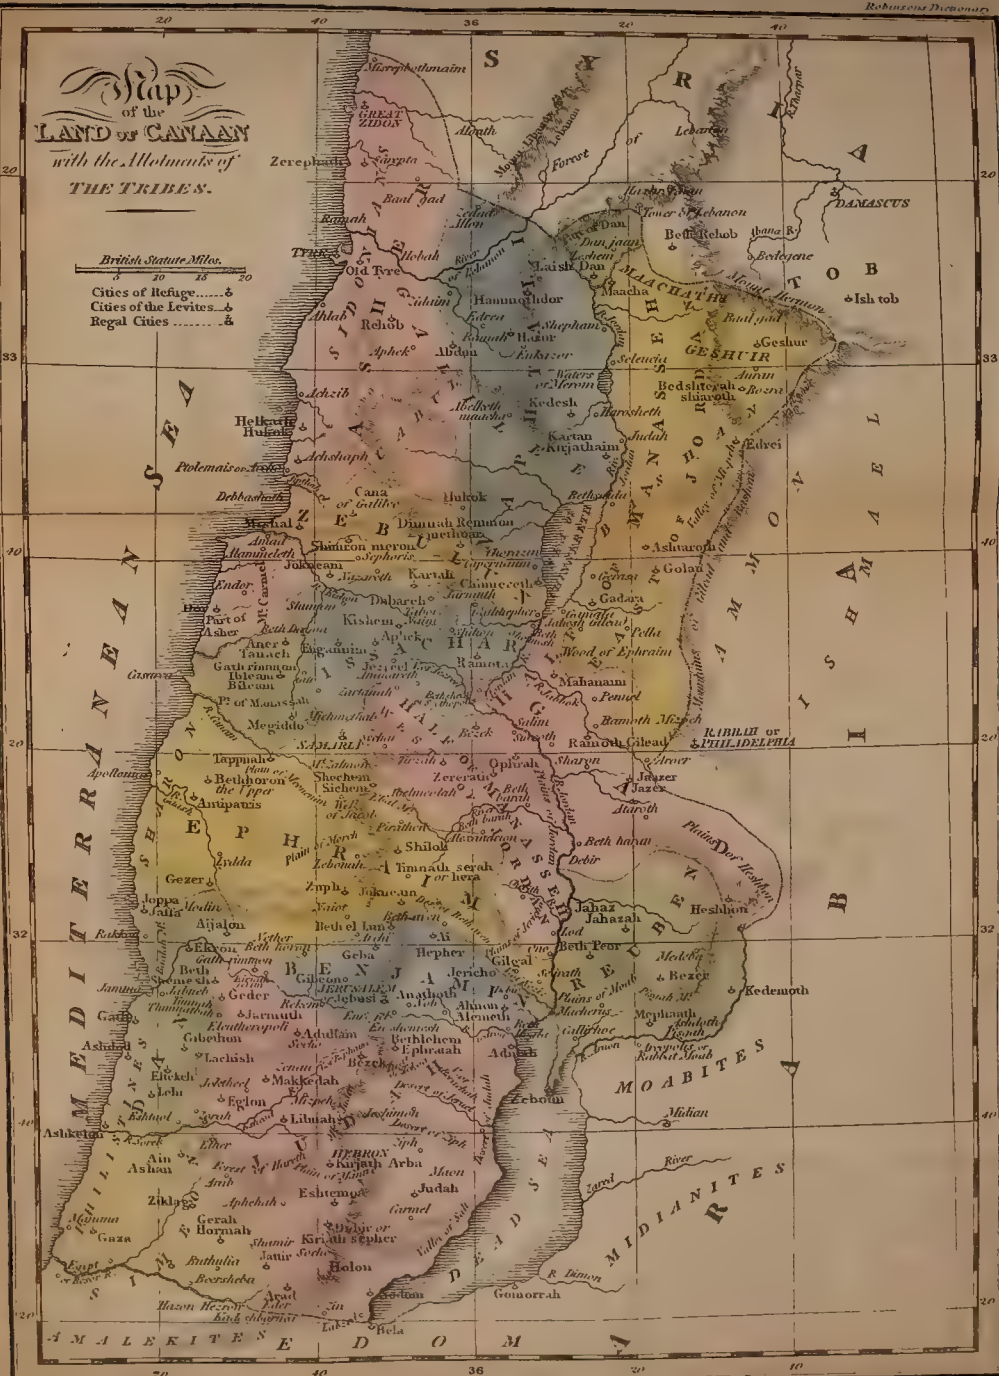

In the Wilderness of Judea John the Baptist first taught, (Matt. iii. 1.) and Christ was tempted probably towards the north of it, not far from Jericho. Some parts of the Wilderness were not absolutely barren, nor uninhabited; of other parts the following is the latest description which has reached us. Mr. Carlyle visited the monastery of St. Saba in the Wilderness of Judea. He says, the valley of St. Saba is an immense chasm in a rifted mountain of marble. It is not only destitute of trees, but of every other species of vegetation; and its sole inhabitants, except the wretched monks in the convent, are eagles, tigers, and wild Arabs. The monastery joins to the rocks on the right, and stretches itself half-way across the valley. You enter from the top, and descend by several flights of stairs and iron doors, to the platform where the church is situated. Sacred Geography; Professor Carlyle's Poems.

JUDGES, the name given to those supreme magistrates who governed the Israelites from Joshua to Saul. Some are of opinion that the Archons among the Athenians, and the Dictators among the Romans, were almost the same as the judges among the Hebrews. Grotius compares the government of the Hebrews under the judges, to that of Gaul, Germany, and Britain, before the Romans changed it. The office of judge was not hereditary in Israel. These governors were no more than God's vice-gerents, for he was their only true monarch.

The dignity of judges was in some cases for life, but not always; and their office was not hereditary, neither was their succession constant. There were anarchies, or intervals, during which the common-wealth was without rulers and judges. There were likewise pretty long intervals of servitude and oppression, under which the Hebrews groaned, and during which they were without either judges or governors. Although God himself did regularly appoint the judges of the Israelites, nevertheless the people, on some occasions, chose him who appeared to them most proper to deliver them from their immediate oppression. Thus the Israelites beyond Jordan chose Jephthah. As it often happened, that the oppressions, which occasioned a recourse to the assistance of judges, were not felt equally over all Israel, so the power of those judges, who were chosen to procure deliverance from such servitudes, did not extend over all the people, but over that district only which they had delivered; as we do not find that Jephthah exercised his authority on this side Jordan, or that Barak exercised his authority beyond that river.

The authority of judges was not inferior to that of kings; it extended to peace and war. They decided causes with absolute authority; but they had no power to make new laws, nor to impose new burdens on the people. They were protectors of the laws, defenders of religion, and avengers of crimes, particularly of idolatry; they were without pomp or splendour, without guard, train, or equipage, unless their own wealth might enable them to make an appearance answerable to their dignity. The revenue of their employment consisted in presents; they had no regular profits, and levied nothing on the people. The period of the Judges from Joshua to Saul was three hundred and thirty-nine years.

A list of the JUDGES in chronological order.

Year of the world.

- 2570 The death of Joshua.
 2585 The government of the elders for about fifteen years.
 2592 An anarchy of about seven years. The history of Micah, the conquest of the city of Laish by part of the tribe of Dan, and the war undertaken by the eleven tribes against Benjamin, are all referred to this time.
 2591 The first servitude under Cushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia, began in 2591, and continued eight years, to 2599.
 2599 Othniel delivered Israel in the fortieth year after peace was established in the land by Joshua.
 2662 A peace of about sixty-two years, from the deliverance procured by Othniel, in 2599, to 2662, when the second servitude under Eglon king of the Moabites happened. It continued eighteen years.
 2679 Ehud delivers Israel. After him Shamgar governed, and the land was in peace till the eightieth year after the first deliverance procured by Othniel.
 2699 The third servitude under the Canaanites, which continued twenty years, from 2699 to 2719.
 2719 Deborah and Barak deliver the Israelites: from the deliverance procured by Ehud to the end of Deborah and Barak's government were forty years.

- 2768 Abimelech, the natural son of Gideon, is acknowledged king by the Shechemites.
 2771 He died at the siege of Thebez in Palestine.
 2772 Tola after Abimelech governs for three-and-twenty years, from 2772 to 2795.
 2795 Jair succeeds Tola, and governs two-and-twenty years, from 2795 to 2816.
 2799 The fifth servitude under the Philistines, which continued eighteen years, from 2799 to 2817.
 2817 The death of Jair.
 2817 Jephthah is chosen head of the Israelites beyond Jordan, and defeated the Ammonites who oppressed them. Jephthah governs six years, from 2817 to 2823.
 2823 The death of Jephthah.
 2830 Ibzan governs seven years, from 2823 to 2830.
 2840 Elon succeeds Ibzan. He governed from 2830 to 2840. Abdon judged Israel eight years, from 2840 to 2848.
 2848 The sixth servitude under the Philistines, which continued forty years, from 2848 to 2888.
 2849 The birth of Samson.
 2887 The death of Samson, who was judge of Israel during the judicature of Eli the high-priest.
 2888 The death of Eli, and beginning of the government of Samuel, who succeeded him.
 2909 The election and anointing of Saul, first king of the Hebrews.

ORDINARY JUDGES for civil and religious affairs. Moses ordained (Deut. xvi. 18.; xvii. 8, 9.: see also Ezek. xlv. 24.; and Joseph. Antiq. l. x. cap. ult.) that judges and magistrates should be appointed in every city, to terminate differences among the people, and that affairs of greater consequence should be removed to the place which the Lord should choose, in order to submit the difficulty to the priest of Aaron's family, and to the judge (or prince of the people) established at that time by the Lord; and he requires all to acquiesce in their judgment on pain of death. When Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, resolved on reforming his dominions, (2 Chron. xix. 5, 8, &c.) he settled judges in all the cities, to whom he recommended vigilance and justice, as exercising the authority of God himself. He likewise set up two courts at Jerusalem, one consisting of priests and Levites, the other of the heads of the families of Israel. The first had cognizance of the affairs which related to the law and religion; the second of the king's matters, that is, of civil affairs, and private interests. Such was the polity of the Hebrews before the captivity, as far as can be collected from the sacred books.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES treats principally of those illustrious persons, who, under the name of judges, governed Israel in the intermediate time between Joshua and the establishment of the regal government. This book has been ascribed to Phinehas, to Hezekiah, and to Ezekiel; and some learned men have thought that it was compiled by Ezra, from memoirs left by the respective judges of their own judicatures. But the best founded opinion seems to be, that it was written by Samuel, the last of the judges. That it was written before the reign of David, is proved by the following passage: 'The Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day,' (Judg. i. 21.); for it is certain that the Jebusites were driven out of that city early in the reign of David. (2 Sam. v.) The beginning of the book of Judges gives an account of the farther conquests of the Israelites in the land of Canaan; of their disobedience to the commands of God, and of their consequent subjection to the king of Mesopotamia; it then states the appointment of Othniel, the first judge of Israel, and continues the history to the death of Samson. These events are contained in the first sixteen chapters; and in the seventeenth and remaining chapters are recorded several remarkable occurrences, which were omitted in their proper places, that they might not interrupt the course of the general history of the judges. This book includes a period from the death of Joshua to that of Samson; but there is great difficulty in settling the precise chronology of the several facts related in it, because many of them are reckoned from different æras, which cannot be exactly ascertained. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. p. 82.

JU'DITH, יהודית, signifies who praises God; or Judea. According to the apocryphal book which bears her name, Judith, of the tribe of Reuben, daughter of Merari, and widow of Manasseh, was celebrated for the deliverance of Bethulia, besieged by Holofernes.

This apocryphal BOOK OF JUDITH is thought by Grotius, and by many other learned Protestants, to be a parabolical rather than a real history. In the judgment, however, of Dr. Prideaux, this book seems to carry with it the air of a true history in most particulars, except that of the long continued peace which is said to be procured by Judith: for, according to the account given in this book, it must have lasted eighty years, which is what the Jews never enjoyed since they were a nation, and what scarcely any other people did enjoy; which therefore he allows to be a fiction, though he inclines to think the book in other respects a true history. Jerome informs us, that by the ancient Jews, the book of Judith, and apparently that of Tobit also, were read along with the Hagiographa, on account of their being annexed to that class of sacred books, but were not ranked as of equal authority. It, therefore, clearly follows, that those books were not only universally known to the ancient Jews, but were also held in high esteem as histories, though not inspired, just as in the case of the historic book of Maccabees. Nor is this the most early testimony extant given to the book of Judith, by the ancient Jews, as a history; for the same follows again from the mere fact of a translation of it into Greek by Jews in still more ancient times. We can conceive no other reason for the ancient Christians having received Judith as a canonical book, except that the first Christians, who had been Jews themselves, continued to that book the same esteem, which it had ever before obtained among them. It was, however, read only as a credible history, together with Tobit and others. Such, accordingly, is the book of Judith, so far as respects the historic events and dates connected with her own actions; which latter whether altogether true or not, yet any exaggerations of these will not derogate from the authenticity of the accounts there given of other historic facts, and of the times when they took place.

In opposition to the opinion of Dr. Prideaux, it has been contended by Heidegger, Moldenhawer, and others, that, if it were a true history, some notice of the victory which it records would have been taken by Josephus, who on no occasion is deficient when an opportunity presents itself of magnifying the achievements of his countrymen. Philo is equally silent concerning this book and its author. The time when, and the place where he lived, are totally unknown. Dr. Prideaux refers the book to the time of Manasseh; Jahn assigns it to the age of the Maccabees, and thinks it was written to animate the Jews against the Syrians. Grotius refers it to the same period, and is of opinion that it is wholly a parabolical fiction, written in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, when he came into Judæa to persecute the Jewish church, and that its design was to confirm the Jews, under that persecution, in their hope that God would send them a deliverer.

The book of Judith was originally written in Chaldee, and translated into Latin. Besides this translation there are two others, one in Greek, and the other in Syriac. The Syriac version was made from the Greek, whence also our present English translation was made. Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 245; Critical Observations on Books, Ancient and Modern, No. xvi. p. 150, et seq.; Grotii Præfatio ad Annotationes in Librum Judith; Prideaux's Connection, part i. b. i. p. 59.

JUNIPER-TREE, is mentioned in the English version of the Bible in three places. Elisha flying from Jezebel, towards Beersheba, was overwhelmed with fatigue, and sat down under a juniper-tree. (1 Kings xix. 4, 5.) This is the rendering of the Hebrew word rothim or retem, by the Rabbin Kimchi and Jarchi. Levi Ben Gerson says broom. The Septuagint in verse 5, simply say a plant; in Job xxx. 4, wood; in Psalm cxx. 4, coals of the Desert, or coals of juniper. From these differences it would appear, that they did not know the true tree in question. The juniper is only a bush in England, and it is not large in Germany; but in Spain, in the country between Segovia and Madrid, beams and boards are made of it, and of some kinds of juniper the trunk is the size of a man's body.

Several circumstances mentioned by authors seem favourable to the juniper, as the retem of Scripture; but Job, (xxx. 4.) speaks of eating its roots, of which we find no example, neither can we find any example of eating the roots of broom, which is the other rendering. What other trees occur in the deserts or uncultivated wilderness of Syria? Hasselquist mentions 'frutex foliis triangularibus splendentibus.' This plant is very common in the deserts of Palestine. May such a frutex, larger than a shrub, yet not equal to a tree, be comprehended among the class of retem in ancient Hebrew? Scripture Illustrated, Eapros. Index, pp. 110, 111.

IVORY, Heb. ṣen, Schen, signifies a tooth; ivory being an elephant's tusk. Ezekiel, (xxvii. 15.) calls it horns of teeth, because the elephant's tooth is in the shape of a horn. In the first book of Kings, (x. 22.) it is said, that Solomon had ivory brought him from Ophir; in Hebrew Schen-habbim. Bochart is of opinion, that Schen-habbim is put for Schen-kehabim, affirming that kehabim signifies elephants, of which he produces no proof. Calmet thinks that these words should be read separately, Schen habenim, 'teeth and ebony,' as habenim signifies. (Ezek. xxvii. 15.) It is certain that we do not read of elephants in the west of Asia, so early in any profane author. Mention is made of the throne of Solomon, decorated with ivory, and inlaid with gold, (1 Kings x. 18.); the beauty of these materials relieving the splendour, and heightening the lustre of each other. The houses of ivory built in Samaria, (Amos iii. 15. 1 Kings xxii. 39.) can only mean that they were adorned with, not constructed of ivory. Scripture Illustrated.

JUSTIFICATION, in the language of Scripture, signifies the being accounted just or righteous in the sight of God; or the being placed in a state of salvation. When God justifies a man, it is by forgiving him his trespasses, and accepting, esteeming, and rewarding him as a righteous person, although he is not really and strictly such. To justify, in the common spiritual notion of it, is to absolve from guilt, to discharge from punishment. Hence justification implies, that the party has been, or is charged with some matter of complaint against him, from which he vindicates himself, or is vindicated by another, either by producing proofs of his innocence, or of his having suffered the penalty of that transgression formerly, or referring to some other person who has allegations on his behalf, which will effect his justification. Justification then is a law term, used in ancient times, and greatly analogous to our term acquittal. When sinners are charged with their sins before God, they cannot in any degree prove their innocence, since they are accused of only bond fide crimes: they cannot say they have been formerly acquitted in any other sense than by reference to an expected pardon through God's grace, and his proposals of mercy; though some sins are evidently punished in this life, all are not, as is equally evident; but the allegations which may be offered by a mediator-party, remain in full force. When an Israelite had transgressed against any divine law, he acknowledged his transgression, brought his sacrifice to the altar, confessed over it his fault, thereby symbolically transferring his guilt, and the victim was the substituted sufferer, which being sacrificially offered, the offerer had complied with the appointments of the law; so that, should he be afterwards charged with that crime, he might plead a discharge in times past: but sacrifices were not in their nature capable of making absolute reconciliation between God and man; they could only refer to a nobler blood, which should accomplish that perfectly which they did imperfectly, should effectually vindicate the guilty from the consequences of their guilt, and should justify, when appealed to, from accusations of conscience, of the world, of human laws, or of the divine law, through the gracious acceptance of the divine Lawgiver.

Such is the general corruption of human nature, and such the imperfection of the best of men, that if God were to enter into judgment with his servants upon the strict ground of their own works or deservings, no man living would be justified; and therefore we are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith. This is the express declaration of Scripture. 'Justification,' says Bishop Hopkins, 'is a gra- cious act of God, whereby, through the righteousness of Christ's satisfaction imputed, he freely remits, to the believing sinner, the guilt and punishment of his sins: and (moreover,) through the righteousness of Christ's perfect obedience imputed, he accounts him righteous, and accepts him into love and favour, and unto eternal life. This is justification, which is the very sum and faith of the whole Gospel, and the only end of the covenant of grace. For wherefore was there such a covenant made with us, through Christ, but, as St. Paul tells us, (Acts xiii. 39.) that by him, all that believe might be justified from all things which they could not be justified from by the law of Moses? He proves that justification is equivalent to salvation, by the following syllogism: If the righteousness of Christ be made thine, thou shalt be saved; if thou believest, the righteousness of Christ shall be made thine; therefore, if thou believest (from first to last,) thou shalt be saved. 'When, therefore, a sinner, being on one hand thoroughly convinced of his sins, of the wrath of God due to him for them, (Rom. ii. 8, 9.) of his utter inability either to escape, or bear his wrath, (Rom. vii. 24.) and, on the other hand, being likewise convinced of the sufficiency, willingness, and designation of Christ to satisfy justice, and to reconcile and save sinners, (Rom. vii. 25.) doth hereby yield a firm assent unto these truths revealed in the Scriptures, and doth also accept and receive Jesus Christ in all his offices, as his Prophet, resolving to attend to his teaching, as his Lord and King, resolving to obey his commands, and as his Priest, resolving to rely upon his sacrifice alone, and doth accordingly submit to him, and confide in him sincerely and perseveringly; this is that faith which doth justify, and will certainly save all those in whom it is wrought.'

The profound Hooker gives a similar explanation of the doctrine, in his Discourse on Justification by Faith: 'The best things,' says he, 'which we do, have something in them to be pardon'd. How then can we do any thing meritorious, or worthy to be rewarded? Indeed, God doth liberally promise whatsoever appertaineth to a blessed life to as many as sincerely keep his law, though he be not exactly able to keep it. Wherefore we acknowledge a dutiful necessity of doing well; but the meritorious dignity of doing well we utterly renounce. We see how far we are from the perfect righteousness of the law; the little fruit which we have in holiness, it is, God knoweth, corrupt and unsound: we put no confidence at all in it, we challenge nothing in the world for it, we dare not call God to reckoning, as if he were our debtor: our continual suit to him is, and must be, to bear with our infirmities, and pardon our offences.' 'Our doctrine, in truth, is no other than that we have learned at the feet of CHRIST; namely, that God doth justify the believing man, yet not for the worthiness of his belief, but for the worthiness of HIM which is believed; God rewardeth abundantly every one which worketh, yet not for any meritorious dignity which is, or can be, in the work, but through his mercy, by whose commandment he worketh.'

It may be proper to explain some passages in the Epistles of St. Paul and St. James relative to justification, which at first sight appear to be contradictory to each other. St. Paul says, that 'a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law,' (Rom. iii. 28.) and that 'a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ,' (Gal. ii. 16.) St. James says, 'a man is justified by works, and not by faith only,' (James ii. 24.) We are to remember that St. Paul, when he makes the above declarations, is arguing, as clearly appears from the context, against those judaizing Christians, who contended that circumcision, and an observance of the whole ritual of the Mosaic institution, were necessary for salvation in all who embraced the Gospel. St. Paul, therefore, is usually understood to mean, in these passages, the ceremonial works of the law of Moses, circumcision, sacrifices, &c.; but that he also intended to include the moral works, both of the law of Moses, and of the law of nature, is evident from his reckoning all under sin, both Jews and Gentiles, for their gross violation of moral and religious duties. The tenor of his argument necessarily also includes evangelical works; for if justification could come even of such, without taking in faith in the meritorious sufferings and satisfaction of a Mediator, then might we have of which to boast, or to glory: Christ might be justly said to have died in vain. (Ephes. ii. 9. Rom. iv. 2. Gal. ii. 21.) The obvious sense of these passages was soon perverted; and hence arose the opposite error of an affected humility, that justification was by faith alone, not only without works, but exclusive of works, and that faith in Christ without works or deeds of any kind, that is without the practice of moral virtue, was of itself sufficient to procure salvation. This most unwarrantable interpretation is reprobated and refuted by St. James, who proves that a man is justified by his works, and not by faith only. When, therefore, he says, that a man is not justified by faith only, he means that a man is not justified by a bare belief of the divine mission of Christ, that belief must be accompanied by obedience, or it will be ineffectual, that is, as he says in another place, 'faith without works is dead.' (James ii. 20.) The inseparable connexion of faith and works was diligently inculcated by our early divines, one of whom thus quaintly expounds the doctrine, Justificamur per fidem solam, sed non per fidem solitariam, or according to his own translation, 'We are justified by faith alone, but not by that faith which is alone,' or exclusive of good works. Burkitt also well observes, 'What God hath joined, none must divide; and what God hath divided, none must join. He hath separated faith and works in the business of justification; and He hath joined them in the lives of justified persons,' or in the business of sanctification. Indeed, as is well expressed in the twelfth article of our church, good works do spring necessarily out of a true and lively faith; inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known, as a tree discovered by the fruit. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. pp. 998—1003; Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, vol. iii. pp. 440, 482. KAD

KA'DESH-BAR'NEA, קדש-ברנע, signifies holiness of the son of instability, or holiness of corn, or the purity of commotion, or of instability. Kadesh-barnea, a station of the Israelites, to which they returned again after thirty-eight years, is said to be in the wilderness of Zin (Numb. xiii. 21.; xx. 1. Deut. xxxii. 51.); but in the wilderness of Paran (Numb. xii. 16.) In the Itinerary it is simply called Rithmah, 'the wilderness.' Dr. Hales observes, that Wells, Shaw, the authors of the Universal History, &c. have greatly perplexed and obscured the geography of this Itinerary, by supposing that there were two places of this name distinct from each other. They consider the latter of them as situated on the western side of Mount Hor, towards the land of Canaan, and thus confound it with that Kadesh, in the land of the Philistines, where Abraham sojourned. (Gen. xvi. 14.; xx. 1.) But that it lay on the east side of Mount Hor is evident; for why should Moses send messengers from Kadesh to the king of Edom, requesting permission to pass through his territories, in the way to Canaan, if they were already at the verge of Palestine? (Numb. xx. 14.) This application, however, was necessary, if his territories were situated between Canaan and the Israelites. The true situation of Kadesh is ascertained beyond a doubt, from its lying between Mount Hor and Eziongaber, on the Elanitic Gulf. (Numb. xxxiii. 35—37.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 401, 402.

KAD'MONITES, קדמוני, signifies ancient, first men, orientals. It is most likely that this name expresses the situation of the Kadmonites, Easterns. We may, therefore, perhaps, safely place this people either on the east of Judea, adjoining the Dead Sea, or east of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab. It is possible that both ideas may be true: they might reside, before the formation of the Dead Sea, west of the Jordan, and, after that event, east of their former establishment. The Kadmonites were descended from Canaan, the son of Ham. It has been conjectured that the celebrated Cadmus, the founder of Thebes in Bœotia, was originally a Kadmonite, and that his wife, Hermione, was so named from Mount Hermon. Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 162.

KED'EMOTH, קדמו, signifies ancient places, or things, antiquities, or original things, or places, or orientals, or burning, or bending of death. Kedemoth was a town of Reuben, east of the brook Arnon. (Josh. xiii. 18.) It was also the name of one of the Hebrew stations in the wilderness, (Deut. ii. 26.) given to the sons of Merari, the Levite. (1 Chron. vi. 79.)

KEHEL'ATHAH, קהלטה, μακελλάθ, signifies the assembly, or collection (of men). Kehelathah was a station of the Israelites. (Numb. xxxiii. 22.) Some have thought that the gathering and revolt of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, happened at this place. Sacred Geography.

KEI'LAH, קעילה, signifies their dissolution, or divisions, or cuttings; otherwise his fixed abode. It was a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 44.) and was a walled town. (1 Sam. xxiii. 7.) It adjoined the country of the Philistines, west or south-west of the tribe of Judah. Wells's Geography.

KE'NATH, קנה, signifies purchase, or possession, or lamentation. It was a city in Manasseh, beyond Jordan, (Numb. xxxii. 42.) and was also called Nob, from Nobah who conquered it.

KEN'ITES, קני, signifies his nest, or his lamentation, or possession, or purchase. The Kenites were a people who dwelt west of the Dead Sea, and extended themselves pretty far into Arabia Petræa. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, and a priest of Midian, was a Kenite. Hence it appears probable, that the Kenites were a branch of the Midianites. In the time of Saul, the Kenites were mingled with the Amalekites. (1 Sam. xv. 6.) Though the Kenites were among those people, whose lands God had promised to the descendants of Abraham, yet in consideration of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, all of them who submitted to the Hebrews, were suffered to live in their own country. The rest fled, in all probability, to the Edomites and Amalekites. The lands of the Kenites were in the lot of Judah.

Balaam, when invited by Balak, king of Moab, to curse Israel, stood upon a mountain, whence he addressed the Kenites, and said, 'Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou putt'st thy nest in a rock; nevertheless, the Kenite shall be wasted until Ashur shall carry thee away captive.' (Numbers xxiv. 21, 22.) The Kenites dwelt in mountains and rocks, almost inaccessible. They were conquered and carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar. After Saul, the Kenites are not mentioned; but they subsisted, being mingled among the Edomites and other nations of Arabia Petræa.

KEN'IZZITES, ancient people of Canaan, whose land God promised to the descendants of Abraham. (Gen. xv. 19.) It is believed that they dwelt in the mountains south of Judea, and between the Kenites and the Kadmonites. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 160.

KETURAH, קטורה, signifies he that burns, or makes the incense to fume; or otherwise, perfumed or odoriferous; and was the name of Abraham's second wife. Abraham married Keturah when he was one hundred and forty years of age; and by her he had six sons, Zimram, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. Some chronologers, as Bishop Clayton, Hallet, &c. thinking it improbable that Abraham should marry again at such an advanced age, have dislocated the chronology of this period, by supposing that Abraham took Keturah as a concubine, in consequence of his wife Sarah's barrenness, even before he left Charran; and that Keturah's children were among the souls born to him and Lot during their residence in that country. But it seems evident from the whole tenor of the history, that Abraham was childless until the birth of Ishmael (Gen. xv. 2, 3.); that he had no other son than Ishmael when he received the promise of Isaac (Gen. xvii. 18.); and that Isaac and Ishmael jointly, as his eldest sons, celebrated his funeral. (Gen.

xxv. 9.) His second marriage, at the age of one hundred and forty years, shows his faith in the divine promise, that he should be 'a father of many nations;' for which purpose his constitution might be miraculously renewed, as Sarah's was. Besides, Abraham himself was born when his father Terah was one hundred and thirty years of age. Abraham settled the sons of Keturah in the east country of Arabia, near the residence of Ishmael. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 146.

KEY is frequently mentioned in Scripture, as well in a natural, as in a figurative sense. The keys of the ancients were very different from ours; because their doors and trunks were closed generally with bands, and the key served only to loosen or fasten these bands in a certain manner. The keys used in the east are very different from ours. Chardin says, that a lock in the east is like a little harrow, which enters half way into a wooden staple; and the key is a wooden handle with points at the end of it, which are pushed into the staple, and so raise this little harrow.

In a moral sense, key has many significations. 'And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so he shall open and none shall shut: and he shall shut and none shall open.' (Isaiah xxii. 22.) He shall be grand master and principal officer of his prince's house. Christ promises to St. Peter, that he should first open the gate of his kingdom both to Jew and Gentile, in making the first converts among them. (Matt. xvi. 19.) It is observable that no supremacy is here given to St. Peter; as the power of binding and loosing belonged equally to all the apostles. (Matth. xvi. 18.) The term binding and loosing was customarily applied by the Jews to a decision respecting doctrines or rites, establishing which were lawful and which unlawful; and it may also denote, to bind with sickness, and to loose by restoring to health. Isaiah remarks, that Eliakim should wear his key upon his shoulder, as a mark of distinction. These keys were made of wood, and pretty long and large, as at present in the east. Callimachus says, that Ceres carried a key upon her shoulder. This custom of carrying keys upon shoulders appears strange to us. The ancients had their keys made very large, and in the form of a sickle, and the weight and shape of them were such that they could not otherwise be conveniently carried, but as we see our reapers carry their sickles.

Jesus Christ reproaches the Scribes and Pharisees with having taken away the key of knowledge; that is, with reading and studying the Scriptures, without advantage to themselves, and without discovering to others the truth, which in some sort they held captive in unrighteousness. (Rom. i. 18.)

Jesus Christ (Rev. i. 18.) says, that he has the key of death and hell: that is, it is in his power to bring to the grave, or to deliver from it; to appoint to life or to death.

KIB'ROTH-HATTA'AVAH, קברות הרמור, signifies the graves of lust. (Numb. xi. 34, 35.) This was one of the encampments of Israel in the wilderness, where they desired of God flesh for their sustenance, declaring that they were tired with manna. God sent them quails in great quantities; but whilst the meat was in their mouths, (Psal. lxxviii. 30.) God smote so great a number of them, that the place was thence called the graves of lust.

By a fortunate discovery, the exact site of Kibroth-hattaavah seems to have been ascertained by Niebuhr. In his way from Suez to Mount Sinai, he was brought by his guides to a lofty and steep mountain in the district of Beni Legat, about nineteen German miles from Suez, and eleven from the convent of St. Catherine's at Mount Sinai. After an hour and a half spent in climbing to the summit, he was surprised to see there a superb Egyptian cemetery, as he supposed it, in which were a number of stones of a fine and hard grit, from five to seven feet long, and a foot and a half or two feet broad, loaded with hieroglyphics, as beautiful as those of Egypt. Some of these stones were standing upright, others overturned or broken. The inscriptions on three of these stones, copies of which are given by Niebuhr, consisted of birds, serpents, fishes, hares, and tots, or human figures, sitting on their hams, some with human, and others with dogs' heads. But he observes, as remarkable, that though the figures of hares were numerous, which abound in these deserts, none were to be found of oxen, so often to be met with on the obelisks of Egypt. Besides these, there was an oblong rectangular edifice, about fifty geometrical paces long, and about ten broad, whose walls were standing, containing in its area several of these stones covered with hieroglyphics. In this edifice were also found busts in the Egyptian style, and architectural ornaments like those which Norden copied in Upper Egypt. At the larger end was a small chamber, the roof of which was still subsisting, supported by a square pillar; and this pillar, as well as the walls around, was covered with hieroglyphics. Niebuhr asks, whether these might not be the graves of lust, (Numb. xi. 34.); or else Mount Hor, where Aaron was buried? (Numb. xxxiii. 38.) No traces exist in ancient history of any city formerly subsisting in this part of the desert, which, though not destitute of inhabitants, could never be populous from its barren and sequestered situation. It could not be the tomb of Aaron, which was at Mount Hor, at a considerable distance; it was, therefore, most probably at or near Kibroth-hattaavah, erected by the Israelites during their long stay in the neighbourhood of Kadesh-barnea, from which it was removed only two stages. The inscriptions on these tomb-stones are strikingly Egyptian, like them engraved on hard granite, and abounding in Egyptian tots, among the hieroglyphic symbols. However, the remarkable omission of the ox, so frequent in Egypt, intimates that they were not the work of Egyptians, properly speaking, but rather of the Israelites, who were still smarting with the recollection of the severe chastisement which they had received not long before for their idolatry of the golden calf at Sinai, and who durst not introduce that ominous symbol among the other Egyptian hieroglyphics. These, therefore, might have been the tomb-stones of the princes of the congregation who perished there. (Psal. lxxviii. 31.) Indeed, the minute coincidence of this cemetery, in every respect, with the occurrence at Kibroth-hattaavah, raises the conjecture almost to a certainty, that this could be no other than that remarkable station, which was not more than three stages from Mount Sinai. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 403—406.

KID'RON, קירון, signifies obscurity, obscure, and is the name of a brook which runs in the valley east of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mount of Olives, and discharges itself into the Dead Sea. It has generally but little water, and often none. However, after storms, or great rains, it swells exceedingly, and runs with great impetuosity. This brook answered the purpose of a drain to the lands around the city of Jerusalem after rains; and possibly it might answer the same purpose to some of the suburbs of the city, and receive their underground discharges. Hence, perhaps, its name 'black.' Sacred Geography.

KINGS. The Israelites had no national king till Saul. They were governed at first by elders, as in Egypt; then by rulers of God's appointment, as Moses and Joshua; then by Judges, as Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, Samuel; and, lastly, by kings, as Saul, David, Solomon, &c.

A CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF THE KINGS OF THE HEBREWS. Saul, the first king of the Israelites, reigned forty years, from the year of the world 2909 to 2949.

Ishbosheth, son of Saul, succeeded him, and reigned over part of Israel six or seven years, from 2949 to 2956.

David was anointed king by Samuel in the year of the world 2934, but did not enjoy the regal power till the death of Saul in 2949; nor was he acknowledged king of all Israel till the death of Ishbosheth in 2956. David died in 2990, at the age of seventy.

He was succeeded by his son Solomon, who received the royal unction in 2989, and reigned alone after the death of David. Solomon died in 3029.

After the death of Solomon the kingdom was divided; and the ten tribes having chosen Jeroboam king, Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, reigned only over the tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

Kings of Judah.—Rehoboam, son and successor of Solomon, reigned seventeen years, from the year 3029 to 3046.

Abijam reigned three years, from 3046 to 3049.

Asa, one-and-forty years, from 3049 to 3090.

Jehoshaphat, five-and-twenty years, from 3090 to 3115.

Jehoram, four years, from 3115 to 3119.

Ahaziah, one year, from 3119 to 3120.

Athaliah, his mother, reigned six years, from 3120 to 3126.

Joash was placed on the throne by Jehoiada the high-priest, in 3126, and reigned forty years, till the year 3165.

Amaziah reigned twenty-nine years, from 3165 to 3194.

Uzziah, otherwise called Azariah, reigned twenty-seven years, till the year 3220, when, attempting to offer incense in the temple, he was struck with a leprosy, and obliged to resign the government. He lived after this twenty-six years, and died in 3246.

Jotham, his son, assumed the government in the year of the world 3221. He reigned alone in 3246, and died in 3262.

Ahaz succeeded Jotham in 3262, and reigned sixteen years, till 3278.

Hezekiah reigned twenty-eight years, from 3278 to 3306.

Manasseh reigned fifty-five years, from 3306 to 3361.

Amon, two years, from 3361 to 3363.

Josiah reigned thirty-one years, from 3363 to 3394.

Jehoahaz reigned three months.

Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, eleven years, from 3394 to 3405.

Jehoiachin, or Jechoniah, reigned three months and ten days, in the year 3405.

Mattaniah, or Zedekiah, reigned eleven years, from 3405 to 3416. In the last year of his reign Jerusalem was taken, the temple burnt, and Judah carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates.

Kings of Israel.—Jeroboam reigned twenty-two years, from 3029 to 3051.

Nadab reigned one year, and died in 3051.

Baasha reigned twenty-two years, from 3052 to 3074.

Elah reigned two years, and died in 3075.

Zimri, seven days.

Omri reigned eleven years, from 3075 to 3086, and was succeeded by his competitor Tibni, the time of whose death is uncertain.

Ahab reigned twenty-one years, from 3086 to 3107.

Ahaziah reigned two years, from 3106 to 3108.

Jehoram, the son of Ahab, succeeded him in 3108, reigned twelve years, and died in 3120.

Jehu usurped the kingdom in 3120, reigned twenty-eight years, and died in 3148.

Jehoahaz reigned seventeen years, from 3148 to 3165.

Joash reigned fourteen years, from 3165 to 3179.

Jeroboam II. reigned forty-one years, from 3179 to 3220.

Zachariah reigned twelve years, from 3220 to 3232.

Shallum, a month, and was killed in 3233.

Menahem reigned ten years, from 3233 to 3243.

Pekahiah reigned two years, from 3243 to 3245.

Pekah reigned twenty years, from 3245 to 3265.

Hoshea reigned eighteen years, from 3265 to 3283; when the kingdom of Israel terminated, after it had existed two hundred and fifty-three years.

The Jews, after their return from the captivity in 3468, lived under the dominion of the Persians two hundred and four years, till the reign of Alexander the Great, who came to Jerusalem in 3672. After his death in 3681, Judea was at first subject to the kings of Egypt, and afterwards to those of Syria. At length, Antiochus Epiphanes having obliged the Jews to take up arms in defence of their religion in the year 3836, the Maccabees gradually recovered their ancient liberty, and lived in a state of independence, from the government of John Hyrcanus in 3874, till Judea was reduced into a province by the Romans.

The Maccabees or Asmonean Princes, who governed the Jewish Commonwealth as princes and high-priests, till the reign of Herod the Great.—Mattathias, father of Judas Maccabæus, died in 3638, in the beginning of the persecution by Antiochus Epiphanes. Judas Maccabæus governed five years, till his death in 3843.

Jonathan Maccabæus governed seventeen years, from 3843 to 3860.

Simon Maccabæus governed nine years, from 3860 to 3869.

John Hyrcanus governed twenty-nine years, from 3869 to 3898. He enjoyed perfect liberty after the death of Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, in 3874.

Aristobulus assumed the title of king, reigned one year, and died in 3899.

Alexander Jannæus reigned twenty-seven years, from 3899 to 3926.

Salome, or Alexandra, wife of Alexander Jannæus, governed nine years; and her eldest son Hyrcanus exercised the office of high-priest. She died in 3935.

Hyrcanus, king and high-priest of the Jews, began to reign after his mother's death, and reigned peaceably three months only.

Aristobulus, brother of Hyrcanus, made himself master of the kingdom and high-priesthood, which he enjoyed three years and three months, till 3940; when Pompey took Jerusalem, and re-instated Hyrcanus, but did not permit him to wear the diadem, though he allowed him the quality of king. Aristobulus was carried to Rome by Pompey.

Hyrcanus did not quietly enjoy the honours and dignities which had been restored by Pompey. Antigonus, his nephew, the son of Aristobulus, sent for the Parthians to Jerusalem, and made himself master of the crown and high-priesthood in 3964. The ears of Hyrcanus were cut off, to render him unfit for the priesthood: and he was carried to Babylon, whence he did not return till 3968. He was put to death by Herod in 3974.

Antigonus, his nephew, who had possessed himself of the crown and high-priesthood, enjoyed them only about two years and seven months. He was taken in Jerusalem by Sosius, in 3967, and beheaded the same year at Antioch, by order of Mark Antony.

Herod the Great, son of Antipater, and an Idumæan by extraction, was declared king of the Jews by the Roman senate, in 3964. He died after a reign of six or seven-and-thirty years, at the age of seventy, in the year of the world 4001, and the first of Jesus Christ, three years before the vulgar æra.

His dominions were divided among his three sons, Archelaüs, Herod-Antipas, and Philip.

Herod-Antipas had Galilee and Petræa. He was banished to Lyons in the year of Jesus Christ 39, and afterwards into Spain, where he died, after having reigned from the year of the world 4001 to the thirtieth year of the vulgar Christian æra. His tetrarchy was given to Agrippa.

Philip possessed Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and died in the thirty-seventh year of the Christian æra; and his tetrarchy was reduced to a province.

Archelaüs possessed the kingdom of Judea, under the title of ethnarch, from the year 4001, to the year of Christ 6. Judea was then reduced to a province, and subjected to governors till the year of Christ 37.

Agrippa I. received part of Judea from Caius, with the title of king, in the year of the vulgar æra 37; and four years after, the emperor Claudius gave him the remainder. Agrippa died in the forty-fourth year of the Christian æra, when Judea again reverted to the Romans, who placed it under the administration of governors, till its utter ruin in the seventieth year of the Christian æra.

Agrippa II. son of the preceding Agrippa, obtained from the emperor Claudius some authority over the temple and sacred treasury, with the power of appointing or deposing the high-priest; which he enjoyed till the destruction of Jerusalem.

BOOKS OF KINGS, two canonical books of the Old Testament, containing the history of the kings of Israel and Judah, from the beginning of the reign of Solomon to the Babylonish captivity. The first book of Kings commences with an account of the death of David, and contains a period of 126 years, to the death of Jehoshaphat; and the second book of Kings continues the history of the kings of Israel and Judah through a period of three hundred years, to the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. In the Greek and Latin Bibles the two books of Samuel are called the first and second books of Kings; and hence in these copies are four books of Kings. Anciently these four were only two in the Hebrew Bibles, the first of which was called Samuel, and the others Kings or Kingdoms. At present, in the Hebrew copies, the first of these books is called the first and second books of Samuel, and the other the first and second of Kings, as in our English version.

It is probable that the two books of Kings were compiled by Ezra from the records which were regularly kept, both in Jerusalem and Samaria, of all public transactions. These records appear to have been made by the contemporary prophets, and frequently derived their names from the kings whose history they contained. They are mentioned in many parts of Scripture; thus we read, (1 Kings xi. 41.) of the book of the Acts of Solomon, which is supposed to have been written by Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo. (2 Chron. ix. 29.) We also read that Shemaiah the prophet, and Iddo the seer, wrote the Acts of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii. 15.); that Jehu wrote the Acts of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 34.); and Isaiah those of Uzziah and Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxvi. 22.; xxxii. 32.). Hence we may conclude, that from these public records, and other authentic documents, the two books of Kings were composed; and the uniformity of their style favours the conclusion that they were put into their present shape by the same person.

The King's Rights. The Israelites having desired Samuel to give them a king, such as the neighbouring nations had, he told them, that the king who should govern them would have the following prerogatives, (1 Sam. viii. 11, &c.): 'He will take your sons to guide his chariots,' &c. It has been disputed whether Samuel only foretold what should happen to the Israelites from their king, or whether he declared to them the real privileges of a king, and the lawful use of his authority. Commentators in general, however, think that the prophet here describes in what manner the prince would abuse his power, and what would be his excessive pretensions, rather than the just and legal exercise of his rights. Grotius De jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 1; Schicardus de Jure Regni.

KINGS. This word does not always imply the same degree of power, nor the same degree of importance; nor does it imply the magnitude of the dominion or territory of this officer. In Scripture many persons are called kings, whom we should rather denominate chiefs or leaders; and many single towns, or, at most, together with their adjacent villages, are said to have had kings. Not aware of this lower sense of the word king, or unwilling to adopt it, many persons have been embarrassed by the following passage, (Deut. xxxiii. 5.): 'Moses commanded us a law—he was king in Jeshurun—or king among the upright,' that is, he was the principal among the assembly of the superiors of the Israelites. Some refer this to Jehovah. Moses was the chief, the leader, the guide of his people, fulfilling the duties of a king; but he was not king in the same sense as David, or Solomon, was afterwards. This remark reconciles the following observation (Gen. xxxvi. 31.): 'These kings reigned in Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel;' for Moses, though he was king in an inferior sense, did not reign, in the stronger sense, over the children of Israel, their constitution not being monarchical under him.

Besides, we find in Joshua, that almost every town in Canaan had its king; and we know that the territories of these towns must have been very inconsiderable. (Josh. xii. 9—24.) Adonizedek, himself no very powerful king, mentions seventy kings, whom he had subdued and mutilated.

KISHON, קִישׁוֹן, signifies hard, or stubble, or cucumber-bed; or, as some think, curved, or winding. From Mount Tabor flow waters on two sides of it: the stream on the one side runs westward to the Mediterranean Sea; that on the other, eastward to the sea of Galilee. Both these might be called Kishon, one the Greater Kishon running west, the other the Lesser Kishon running east. Certain it is, that the Kishon mentioned in Scripture ran westward to the Mediterranean Sea. (1 Kings xviii.) Mr. Maundrell informs us, that this river flows through the middle of the plain of Jezreel, or Esdraelon, and, pursuing its course close by Mount Carmel, falls into the sea at a place called Caïpha. When he saw the Kishon, its waters were low and inconsiderable; but in passing along the side of the plain, he observed the marks of many lesser torrents, which, falling into it from the mountains, cannot fail of swelling the river exceedingly in sudden rains. Wells's Geography, vol. i. p. 336; Carne's Letters, p. 250.

KNEADING-TROUGHS. The kneading-troughs of the Israelites, at least those which they carried with them out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 34.) were not the cumbersome articles now in use among us, but only small wooden bowls, like those of the modern Arabs, who, after kneading their flour in them, employ them as dishes out of which they eat their victuals. Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. pp. 375, 376.

KO'RAH, קֹרַח, signifies bold, frozen, icy. Korah was the son of Izhar, of the race of Levi, and father of Asher, Elkannah, and Aliasaph, and head of the Korites, a celebrated family among the Levites. Korah, being dissatisfied with the rank he held among the sons of Levi, and envying the authority of Moses and Aaron, formed against them a party, in which he engaged Dathan, Abiram, and On, with two hundred and fifty of the principal Levites. (Numb. xvi. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Korah, at the head of the rebels, went to Moses and Aaron, and complained that they alone arrogated to themselves all the authority over the people of the Lord. Moses, falling with his face on the earth, answered them as follows: 'To-morrow in the morning the Lord will discover who are his. Let every one of you take, therefore, his censer, and to-morrow he shall put incense into it, and offer it before the Lord: and he shall be acknowledged priest whom the Lord shall choose and approve.'

The next day, Korah, with two hundred and fifty of his faction, presenting themselves with their censers before the Lord, the glory of the Lord appeared visibly over the tabernacle; and a voice was heard to say, 'Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment.' Upon this Moses and Aaron, falling with their faces to the ground, said, 'O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?' And the Lord said unto Moses, 'Command all the people to depart from about the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. When, therefore, the people were retired, Moses said, If these men die the common death of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me: but if the earth open and swallow them up quick, ye shall know that they have blasphemed the Lord. As soon as he had spoken, the earth opened from under their feet, and swallowed them up with what belonged to them.

There was one thing which added to this surprising wonder, and that was, that when Korah was thus swallowed up in the earth, his sons were preserved from his misfortunes. We know not the exact year in which the death of Korah and his companions happened. The sons of Korah continued, as before, to serve in the tabernacle of the Lord. David appointed them their office in the temple, to guard the doors, and sing the praises of God.

Eleven psalms, namely xlii. xlv. xlv. xlv. xlvii. xlviii. xlix. lxxxiv. lxxxv. lxxxvii. and lxxxviii. are inscribed 'For the sons of KORAH;' but such is the uncertainty of the prepositional prefix, that it is not easy to decide whether these Psalms were written by them, or were composed for them, and to be performed by them with music in the temple. As the names of the musical instruments, with which these Psalms were to be accompanied, are specified in the titles of Psalms xlv. and lxxxviii. to which last is added the name of Heman, it is most probable that they were directed to the sons of Korah; but by whom they were composed is not now known. Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 107.

LAB

LA'BAN, לבן, signifies white; otherwise, a brick; also a place. Laban, son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, was brother to Rebekah, and father to Rachel and Leah. When Jacob came into Mesopotamia, in the year of the world 2245, he was well received by his uncle Laban. (Gen. xxviii, &c.) A month after his arrival, Laban said to him, Must you, because you are my nephew, serve me without recompence? Jacob proposed to serve him seven years for his youngest daughter Rachel, and Laban consented. Many are of opinion, that Jacob served him seven years, before he married Rachel; but others assert the contrary, and think that the words, 'My time is accomplished,' signify I am of age to marry, to support a family. Jacob was then seventy years of age. Jacob said to Laban, Give me my wife, for my time is accomplished. Laban, therefore, made a wedding feast; but conveyed Leah into Jacob's chamber, so that Jacob did not perceive the fraud. The next morning he complained sharply of it. Laban replied, that it was unlawful to marry the younger daughter before the elder; but if he would serve seven years more, he would give him Rachel. To this Jacob consented.

When Jacob had spent fourteen years in the service of Laban, he was desirous of returning into Canaan. Laban, however, wished to continue him in his service, and said, Ask what recompence you please. Jacob demanded all the young which his flocks should produce that were of a brown colour, spotted and speckled, that is, such as seemed least desirable for their wool and their fleece. Laban agreed, and committed all that were spotted and of divers colours to the keeping of his own sons; fearing, in all probability, that Jacob would use art to produce cattle of divers colours, by a mixture of spotted sheep and goats with those not spotted. Jacob, however, accomplished his purpose another way.

After remaining twenty years with Laban, Jacob perceived that Laban did not regard him with the same kindness as formerly, and resolved to depart without the knowledge of Laban, who set out in pursuit of him, and overtook him in Mount Gilead. God appeared to Laban by night, and forbade him to say any thing harsh to Jacob. When, therefore, Laban saw Jacob, he only complained of his sudden retreat, of his not giving him the comfort of embracing his daughters and grand-children, and of conducting them on their journey with cheerful music. On the subject, however, of Jacob's stealing from him his gods, or Teraphim, he made great complaints. Jacob replied with some vehemence, and agreed that whoever committed this theft should be put to death, not knowing that Rachel was that person. Laban searched all the tents of Jacob in vain, for Rachel concealed these images under her. See RACHEL and TERAPHIM.

Jacob in his turn remonstrated with Laban respecting his conduct towards him, and his having changed the rewards due to him. Laban answered, Behold my daughters and my grand-children. All that is yours is as dear to me as what belongs to myself. Let us make a covenant together, and set up a monument of it. They swore, therefore, reciprocal friendship and alliance. Laban called this pile of stones Jegar-sahadutha, the heap of testimony; but Jacob called it Galeed, the heap of witness; each according to his language, Laban using the Chaldee. Having offered sacrifices, they ate and drank together; and the next morning Laban took leave of his daughters and grand-children, and returned to Haran.

LABBADISTS, were so called from their founder John Labbadie, a native of France. He was originally in the Romish communion: but leaving that, he became a member of the reformed Church, and performed with reputation the ministerial functions in France, Switzerland, and Holland. At length, he erected a new community, which resided successively at Middleburg in Zealand, Amsterdam, Hervorden, and at Altona, where he died about 1674. After the death of Labbadie, his followers removed their wandering community to Wiewert in North Holland, where it soon fell into oblivion. If we are to judge of the Labbadists by their own account, they did not differ from the reformed church so much in their tenets and doctrines as in their manners and rules of discipline. Yet it seems that Labbadie entertained some strange notions. Among other opinions, he maintained that God might and did, on certain occasions, deceive men; that the faithful ought to have all things in common; that there is no subordination or distinction of rank in the true Church; that in reading the Scriptures greater attention should be paid to the internal suggestions of the Holy Spirit than to the sense of the words; that the Scriptures are not sufficient to lead men to salvation without certain particular illuminations and revelations from the Holy Ghost; and that the contemplative life is a state of grace and union with God, and the very height of perfection. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. v. pp. 62, 63.

LACEDÆMON, Λακεδαιμών, signifies the lake of dæmons; otherwise, the well of the insane. Lacedæmon, otherwise called Sparta, was a celebrated and very ancient city in the Peloponnesus. It is said to have been called at first Lelegia, from Lelex, its first king, who, they say, was contemporary with Creon and Erichonius. It afterwards took the name of Lacedæmon, from Lacedæmon, the son of Jupiter and Semele: and, lastly, that of Sparta, from queen Sparta, wife to Lacedæmon. The present Misistra is situated nearly on the place where Lacedæmon stood, about a mile distant from it.

It is very remarkable, that the Jews, who were, as a nation, extremely reserved, should claim kindred with the Lacedæmonians, and that these, in return, should allow the kindred after examining their archives. Mr. Bryant supposes that the Lacedæmonians were originally emigrants from the same country as Abraham. Stephanus quotes Cladius Iolaus as deriving the Jews from an ancestor named Judæus Sparton; or the family styled Sparti: if this means a people who were dispersed, or pilgrims, or emigrants, there is no doubt but the character belongs to the posterity of Abraham. Besides, a possibility exists that some of the early kinsmen of the Jewish patriarchs, instead of going east to settle, might settle in the west. If Ishmael, for instance, had done so, his posterity, nevertheless, would have been related to the sons of Isaac; or if Esau had done so, his descendants might have claimed kin to the sons of Jacob. We have no history of such an occurrence; but if Esau, or part of his family, settled in Rome, as the Rabbins affirm, it is not impossible that some other branch of Abraham's posterity should settle in Greece. Sacred Geography.

LAMA, GRAND, a name given to the sovereign pontiff, or high-priest, of the Thibetian Tartars, who resides at Patoli, a vast palace on a mountain near the banks of Barampooter, about seven miles from Lahassa. The foot of this mountain is inhabited by twenty thousand lamas, or priests, who have their separate apartments around the mountain, and, according to their respective quality, are placed nearer, or at a greater distance from, the sovereign pontiff. He is not only worshipped by the Thibetians, but also is the great object of adoration with the various tribes of heathen Tartars who roam through the vast tract of continent which stretches from the banks of the Wolga to Correea, on the sea of Japan. He is not only the sovereign pontiff, the vicegerent of the Deity on earth, but the more remote Tartars are said to absolutely regard him as the Deity himself, and call him God the everlasting Father of Heaven. They believe him to be immortal, and endowed with all knowledge and virtue. Every year they come up from different parts to worship, and make rich offerings at his shrine. Even the emperor of China, who is a Manchou Tartar, does not fail in acknowledgments to him in his religious capacity, and he actually entertains at a great expense in the palace of Pekin an inferior lama, deputed as his nuncio from Thibet. The grand lama, it has been said, is never to be seen but in a secret place of his palace, amidst a great number of lamps, sitting cross-legged on a cushion, and decked in every part with gold and precious stones, where at a distance the people prostrate themselves before him, it not being lawful for any so much as to kiss his feet. He returns not the least sign of respect, nor ever speaks even to the greatest princes; but only lays his hand upon their heads, and they are fully persuaded they receive from thence a full forgiveness of all their sins.

The Sunniassees, or Indian pilgrims, often visit Thibet as a holy place; and the lama always entertains a body of two or three hundred in his pay. Besides his religious influence and authority, the grand lama is possessed of unlimited power throughout his dominions, which are very extensive. The inferior lamas, who form the most numerous, as well as the most powerful body in the state, have the priesthood entirely in their hands; and, besides, fill up many monastic orders, which are held in great veneration among them. The whole country, like Italy, abounds with priests; and they entirely subsist on the great number of rich presents which are sent them from the utmost extent of Tartary, from the empire of the Great Mogul, and from almost all parts of the Indies.

The opinion of those who are reputed the most orthodox among the Thibetians is, that, when the grand lama seems to die, either of old age or infirmity, his soul, in fact, only quits a crazy habitation, to look for another younger or better; and it is discovered again in the body of some child by certain tokens, known only to the lamas or priests, in which order he always appears.

Almost all nations of the East, except the Mahometans, believe the metempsychosis as the most important article of their faith; especially the inhabitants of Thibet and Ava, the Peguans, Siamese, the greatest part of the Chinese and Japanese, and the Monguls and Kalmucks, who changed the religion of Schamanism for the worship of the grand lama. According to the doctrine of this metempsychosis, the soul is always in action, and never at rest: for no sooner does she leave her old habitation, than she enters a new one. The dalai, being a divine person, can find no better lodging than the body of his successor; or the Foe, residing in the dalai lama, which passes to his successor: and this being a god, to whom all things are known, the dalai lama is therefore acquainted with every thing which happened during his residence in his former body.

This religion is said to have been of three thousand years' standing; and neither time, nor the influence of men, has had the power of shaking the authority of the grand lama. This theocracy extends as fully to temporal as to spiritual concerns.

Though in the grand sovereignty of the lamas the temporal power has been occasionally separated from the spiritual by slight revolutions, they have always been united again after a time; so that in Thibet the whole constitution rests on the imperial pontificate in a manner elsewhere unknown. For as the Thibetians suppose the grand lama is animated by the god Shaka or Foe, who at the decease of one lama transmigrates into the next, and consecrates him an image of the divinity, the descending chain of lamas is continued down from him in fixed degrees of sanctity: so that a more firmly established sacerdotal government, in doctrine, customs, and institutions, than actually reigns over this country, cannot be conceived. The supreme manager of temporal affairs is no more than the viceroy of the sovereign priest, who, conformably to the dictates of his religion, dwells in divine tranquillity in a building that is both temple and palace. If some of his votaries in modern times have dispensed with the adoration of his person, still certain real modifications of the Shaka religion is the only faith they profess, the only religion they follow. The state of sanctity which that religion inculcates, consists in monastic continence, absence of thought, and the perfect repose of nonentity.

It has been observed that the religion of Thibet is the counterpart of the Roman Catholic, since the inhabitants of that country use holy water and a singing service: they also offer alms, prayers, and sacrifices for the dead. They have a vast number of convents filled with monks and friars, amounting to thirty thousand: who, besides the three vows of poverty, obedience, and chastity, make several others. They have their confessors, who are chosen by their superiors, and have licences from their lamas, without which they cannot hear confessions or impose penances. They make use of beads. They wear the mitre and cap like the bishops: and their dalai lama is nearly the same among them as the sovereign pontiff among the Romanists. Adams's View of Religions, pp. 333—336.

LA'MECH, לֹמֶךְ, signifies poor, made low; or who is struck. LAMECH, son of Methuselah, and father of Noah, was an hundred and eighty-two years old at the birth of Noah; and he lived after that event five hundred and ninety-five years. His whole life was seven hundred and seventy-seven years, being born in the year of the world 874, and dying in 1651.

LAMECH, of the race of Cain, was the son of Methusael, and father of Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-cain, and Naamah. (Gen. iv. 18, 19, 20, &c.) Lamech is celebrated for his polygamy, of which he is thought to be the author. He married Adah and Zillah. Lamech said to his wives, 'Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech; I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt. If Cain shall be avenged seven fold, truly Lamech seventy and seven fold.' These words present a difficulty. It is supposed, that Lamech had slain a man in his own defence, and that his wives being alarmed lest the kindred of the deceased should seek his life in return, to quiet their fears he makes this speech, in which he endeavours to prove that there was no room for fear on this account, for if the slayer of the wilful murderer, Cain, should suffer a seven-fold punishment, surely he who should kill Lamech for having slain a man in self-defence, might expect a seventy-seven fold punishment. But notwithstanding this and other interpretations which have been given, the passage is perhaps inscrutable. Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on Genesis.

LAMENTATIONS, a mournful poem, composed by Jeremiah. : Josephus, and several other learned men, have referred the Lamentations to the death of Josiah : but the more common opinion is, that they are applicable only to some period subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. But though it be allowed, that the Lamentations were primarily intended as a pathetic description of present calamities, yet while Jeremiah mourns the desolation of Judah and Jerusalem during the Babylonian captivity, he may be considered as prophetically painting the still greater miseries they were to suffer at some future time ; this seems plainly indicated by his referring to the time when the punishment of their iniquity shall be accomplished, and they shall no more be carried into captivity. (iv. 22.)

The Lamentations are written in metre, and consist of a number of plaintive effusions, composed after the manner of funeral dirges. They seem to have been originally written by their author as they arose in his mind, and to have been afterwards joined together as one poem. There is no regular arrangement of the subject, or disposition of the parts ; the same thought is frequently repeated with different imagery, or expressed in different words. There is, however, no wild incoherency, or abrupt transition ; the whole appears to have been dictated by the feelings of real grief. Tenderness and sorrow form the general character of these elegies ; and an attentive reader will find great beauty in many of the images, and considerable energy in some of the expressions. The book of Lamentations is divided into five chapters ; in the first, second, and fourth, the prophet speaks in his own person, or by an elegant and interesting personification introduces the city of Jerusalem as lamenting her calamities, and confessing her sins ; in the third chapter a single Jew, speaking in the name of a chorus of his countrymen, like the Coryphæus of the Greeks, describes the punishment inflicted upon him by God, but still acknowledges his mercy, and expresses some hope of deliverance ; and in the fifth chapter the whole nation of the Jews pour forth their united complaints and supplications to Almighty God. Bishop Tontine's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 112, 113.

LANGUAGE. Several questions are proposed on this subject, as 1. Whether God was the author of the first language ; whether Adam received it from him by infusion, or formed and invented it by his industry and labour ? 2. Whether this language is still extant ? 3. Which is that language ?

It is pretty generally allowed, that man is the only creature in the world that has the use of a regular speech. In ancient writers, indeed, we meet with accounts of birds and beasts speaking ; and the ancient Jewish Rabbinical writers assure us, that one part of Solomon's wisdom consisted in understanding the language of these creatures : but all these are fables, entitled to no regard. Without doubt, the brute creation have a few simple ideas, and a few simple tones by which they can express them, so as to be intelligible to each other ; but with respect to regular language, they certainly have none, as their tones are neither sufficiently varied nor numerous to entitle them to the name of language. Man, therefore, is the only conversable creature in the world. Numerous conjectures have been formed to account for this faculty in man. The following, with all its apparent absurdity, is the most ingenious, and best entitled to attention. Diodorus Siculus and Vitruvius, and after them some modern writers of considerable eminence, have asserted, 'that men at first lived like beasts in woods and caves, forming only strange and uncouth noises, until their fears caused them to associate together ; and that, upon growing acquainted with each other, they came to correspond about things, first by signs, then to make names for them, and in time, to frame and perfect a language ; and that the languages of the world are different, because the different companies of men happening thus to come together in different places would, of course, form different sounds or names of things ; hence would arise the variety observable even in ancient languages.' This ingenious conjecture seems to be the utmost that the human mind, unassisted by a divine revelation, can form on this subject.

The Mosaic history, which gives us an account of the formation and first occupations of man, represents him as being immediately capable of conversing with his Maker ; of giving names to the various tribes and classes of animals ; and of re-soning consecutively, and in perfectly appropriate terms, concerning his own situation, and the relation in which he stood to other creatures. As in man's first attempt at speech, according to this account, there appears no crudeness of conception, no barrenness of ideas, and no inexpressive or inappropriate terms, it is most rational to conclude, that God, who made and endued him with corporeal and mental powers, perfectly suited to his state and condition in life, endued him also not only with the faculty of speech, but with speech or language itself; which latter was as necessary to his comfort, and, indeed, to the perfection and end of his being, as any other power or faculty which his Creator thought proper to bestow upon him.

What the first language was, it is almost useless to inquire; as it is impossible to arrive at any satisfactory information on this point. Some think it must have been the Chinese, because principally composed of monosyllables, forming very simple sounds, which they suppose must have been the grand characteristic of the original language. Some contend for the Hebrew, such as it is found in our Bible; some for the Chaldee, such as that spoken by the father-in-law of Jacob; some give this honour to the Arabic; but Goropius Becanus and Verstegan seem fully persuaded it was the Teutonic, or ancient German! Conjectures of this kind are as useless as they are endless and uncertain. Sir W. Jones has shown that three great branches of language are sufficient to account for all the varieties now extant; and this forms a very strong, as well as a new argument in favour of the Mosaic history of the early postdiluvian ages. The variety of tongues, the copiousness of some, and the scantiness of others, furnish no good objection to the divine origin of language in general; for whether language was at first revealed from Heaven, or in a course of ages invented by men, a multitude of dialects would inevitably arise, as soon as the human race was separated into a number of distinct and independent nations, distant from each other. Dr. Adam Clarke's Supplement to the Bibliographical Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 1—3; Supplementary Addenda to Calmel's Dictionary.

LAODICEA, Λαοδικεα, signifies a just people. There are several cities of this name; but the Scripture mentions only that of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, near Colosse. Its ancient name was Diospolis; and it was afterwards called Rhoas. Lastly, Antiochus the son of Stratonice rebuilt it, and denominated it Laodicea, from the name of his wife Laodice. Laodicea, with Colosse, its neighbour, was enriched by sheep, which produced fleeces exceeding Milesian in softness, and the jetty raven in colour.

This city was often damaged by earthquakes, and restored either by the opulence of the inhabitants, or by the munificence of the Roman emperors. From the researches of modern travellers, it appears to have been seated upon a volcanic hill, of moderate height, but of considerable extent. Its ruins attest that it was large, opulent, and splendid; and there are still to be seen the remains of an amphitheatre, an aqueduct, and many other buildings. In the primitive times of Christianity, as appears from St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians, in which the Laodiceans are frequently mentioned, this place possessed a flourishing church. But the doom of Laodicea seems to have been more severe and terrible than that of the other six apocalyptic churches; and its present condition is in striking conformity with the rebukes and threatenings of God. Not a single Christian resides at Laodicea! No Turk even has a fixed residence on this forsaken spot. The stately edifices of ancient Laodicea are now peopled with wolves and jackals. The prayers of the mosque are the only prayers heard near the still splendid ruins of the city, on which the prophetic denunciation seems to have been fully executed, in its utter rejection as a Church. It is now called Ladik.

St. Paul did not visit this city, and the Laodiceans had 'never seen his face in the flesh.' (Colos. ii. 1.) Yet upon information from Epaphras their apostle, that false teachers had propagated pernicious doctrines in Laodicea and Colosse, he wrote to the Colossians, and desires them, when they had read his letter, to send it to the Laodiceans, and he writes in the like manner that the Laodiceans would send their letter to the Colossians: 'When this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans, and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.' (Colos. iv. 16.) St. Paul's expression, 'the epistle from Laodicea,' is ambiguous, and may signify either the letter which he wrote to Laodicea, or that which the Laodiceans wrote to him. Interpreters have been divided; some taking it in the former, and others in the latter sense. A letter is extant under the name of Paul to the Laodiceans; but it is agreed, that this letter is spurious. What then was the Epistle of the Laodiceans which St. Paul requires the Colossians to read in their assembly? Marcion thought that this was the Epistle to the Ephesians. Grotius, Le Clerc, and Hammond, are of the same opinion. Dr. Paley observes, 'that the epistle from Laodicea was an epistle sent by St. Paul to that Church, and by them transmitted to Colosse. The two churches were mutually to communicate the epistles they had received. This is the way in which the direction is explained by the greater part of commentators, and is the most probable sense that can be given to it. It is also probable, that the epistle alluded to was an epistle which had been received by the church of Laodicea lately.' Hence the doctor argues, from this and other circumstances, that the Epistle to the Ephesians, was that alluded to by St. Paul. He has also judiciously traced the intimate resemblance between the Epistle to the Ephesians and that to the Colossians, both in sentiment and expression; and this resemblance has induced Michaelis and others to conjecture, that the longer and more circumstantial Epistle to the Ephesians was that which was sent or communicated to the church of Laodicea in that neighbourhood, and which the apostle recommended to the perusal of the church of Colosse in Phrygia. Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, pp. 248, 249; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1126; Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. vi. p. 121, &c.; Hartley's Visit to the Apocalyptic Churches in 1826; Arundell's Visit to the Seven Churches, pp. 84—90; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 598.

LATITUDINARIAN, a person not conforming to any particular opinion or standard, but of such moderation as to suppose that persons of different persuasions will be admitted into heaven. The term was more particularly applied to those pacific doctors in the seventeenth century, who offered themselves as mediators between the more violent Episcopalians, and the rigid Presbyterians and Independents, respecting the forms of church government, public worship, and certain religious tenets, more especially such as were debated between the Arminians and Calvinists. The chief leaders of these Latitudinarians were Hales and Chillingworth; but More, Cudworth, Gale, Whichcot, and Tillotson, were also among the number. These men were firmly attached to the church of England; but they did not consider episcopacy as indispensably necessary to the constitution of a Christian church. Hence they maintained, that those who adopted other forms of government and worship, were not, on that account, to be excluded from their communion, or to forfeit the title of brethren. As to the doctrinal part of religion, they took the system of Episcopius for their model, and, like him, reduced the fundamental doctrines of Christianity to a few points. By this manner of proceeding, they endeavoured to show the contending parties, that they had no reason to oppose each other with such animosity and bitterness, since the subjects of their debates were matters of an indifferent nature with respect to salvation. They met, however, with much opposition, and were branded as Atheists and Deists by some, and as Socinians by others; but upon the restoration of king Charles II., they were raised to the first dignities of the church, and were held in great esteem. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 535, 536; Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, vol. i. book ii. p. 188.

LAW, a rule of action; a precept or command from a superior authority, which an inferior is bound to obey. This word, in Scripture, is sometimes taken for the law of Moses, and sometimes for the religion of the Jews in opposition to the Gospel. The law of Moses is the most ancient in the world. The Rabbins pretend, that Noah's sons received certain laws which compose the law of nature, and bind all people, in all countries.

A distinction is generally made between the law of nature, and positive laws. The law of nature is impressed on our hearts—such as our obligation to worship the Supreme Being, to honour our parents, and those in dignities, to obey superiors, to do that to no man which we would not have done to us, &c. Positive laws are of several kinds; moral, civil, and political, or ceremonial. Moral laws are, generally, only consequences, or explanations, of the laws of nature. Judicial, civil, and political laws regard principally the duties of men in society, the order and polity of the state; they restrain the violence of the wicked, defend the weak from the oppression of the strong, and regulate duties, rights, and powers. Ceremonial laws respect the external worship of God, the duties of ministers and people towards God, and their reciprocal obligations to each other, with relation to the Divine Being.

The law was given to the Hebrews by the intervention of Moses, upon Mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt, in the year of the world 2513, and before Christ 1491. The principal laws are those of the Decalogue. (Exod. xx. 1, 2, &c.)

Some learned men have been of opinion, that Moses, in most of his laws, intended either to imitate those of the Egyptians, or to reverse their customs and maxims, or to circumscribe the Hebrews, so as to prevent their falling into those errors, idolatries, and superstitions, which they had seen in Egypt. On the contrary, others have asserted, that the Egyptians imitated the Hebrew laws, at least in part. It would seem, however, that the Hebrews often imitated the Egyptians, and that, reciprocally, the Egyptians sometimes copied the Hebrews; that the Egyptians having a different turn of mind, on many occasions kept at a distance from the Hebrews; and, in like manner, that the practices of the Mosaic laws, which oppose the superstition of Egypt, were not instituted without design, and that the legislator of the Jews intended to cure the Israelites of their prone-ness to idolatry, and to restrain the evil habits which they had contracted in Egypt.

The law of Moses being the shadow only of things to come, and bringing nothing to perfection, as St. Paul says, (Heb. x. 1.; viii. 9.) it was necessary that Jesus Christ should complete what was imperfect in it, reform what abuses it tolerated, and fulfil what it only promised and typified. This he has executed with great precision. He declares in the Gospel, (Matt. v. 17.) that he came not to destroy the law, but to perfect it. He has explained, modified, and restrained the law of Moses, more particularly the explanations which the Rabbins, and masters in Israel, had given of it; explanations, which were rather corruptions, than illustrations. St. Paul has set in their full light the purposes of his Divine Master; as, for instance, that the law of Moses is, in some sort, abrogated by the Gospel; that since the death of the Messiah, the legal observances are no longer of obligation; that we are no longer under the yoke of the law, but under grace; (Rom. vi. 14.) that Jesus Christ has procured for us the liberty of sons, instead of the spirit of bondage, which reigned under the Old Testament; in a word, that it is neither the law, nor the works of it, that justify us, (Rom. viii. 1, 2, &c.) but faith animated by love, and accompanied with good works. (Gal. iv. 31; v. 6. 13.) When we say that the Gospel hath rescued us from the yoke of the law, we understand only the appointments of the ceremonial and judicial law, and not those moral precepts, whose obligation is indispensable, and the observance of which is much more perfect and extensive in the law of grace, than under the old law.

ORAL LAW, is that which the Jews say they have received by tradition from their ancestors. See CABBALA.

LAZARUS, Ἀζάρος, signifies assistance of God. LAZARUS, brother to Martha and Mary, dwelt with his sisters at Bethany, near Jerusalem; and Jesus Christ sometimes lodged with him, when he came to that city. Whilst Jesus was beyond Jordan with his disciples, Lazarus fell sick: his sisters sent information of this to our Saviour, telling him, that he whom he loved was ill. Jesus said, This sickness is not unto death, but for the glory of God. After two days he said to his disciples, that Lazarus was asleep, but that he would go and awake him; meaning that he was dead, and he would restore him to life. Jesus, on his arrival, found that he had been already four days in the grave. Martha, having obtained intelligence that Jesus was coming, went to meet him, and expostulated on his delay.

In a short time after, Mary also went to meet Jesus, who, seeing her weeping, groaned in the spirit, and was himself troubled. Then he asked, Where have ye laid him?

When he was come thither, he said, Take away the stone: and Jesus having returned thanks to his Father, for that he had always heard him, cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. Then he who had been dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, and his face wrapped up in a napkin. This miracle, which was wrought almost at the very gates of Jerusalem, made a great noise; and the priests resolved on the death of Jesus. (John xi. 1, 2, &c.)

Six days before his last Passover, Jesus came again to Bethany, where he had raised Lazarus from the dead; and Lazarus was one of those who reclined at table with him. The Jews, observing that the resurrection of Lazarus had made a great impression on the people's minds, took a resolution to procure the death of both. The Scripture, however, does not inform us what became of Lazarus.

On the nature and credibility of this stupendous miracle of raising Lazarus from the dead the judicious Tittman makes the following general remarks:—'The whole story,' says he, 'is of a nature calculated to exclude all suspicion of imposture, and to confirm the truth of the miracle. A person of Bethany, of the name of Lazarus, and well known, falls sick in the absence of Jesus. His sisters send a message announcing this to Jesus; and while he is yet absent, Lazarus dies, is buried, and kept in the sepulchre for four days, during which Jesus is still absent. Martha, Mary, and all his friends, are persuaded of his death. Our Lord, while yet remaining in the place where he had been hitherto staying, tells his disciples, in plain terms, that it is his intention to go to Bethany for the purpose of raising Lazarus from the dead; that the glory of God may be illustrated, and the faith of his disciples confirmed. At our Lord's approach, Martha respectfully goes forth to meet him, and, in a sorrowful tone, announces the death of her brother, and laments that Jesus had been absent (since, if he had been present, he could have easily healed the disorder, and prevented death) yet not without a faint hope that, by some means or other, Jesus might yet render assistance. Our Lord affirms that her brother shall be raised to life; and, for the removal of her doubt, assures her that to him is given power of granting life to the dead, and therefore of recalling her brother to life. Mary now approaches, bathed in tears, and grieving at the absence of our Lord during her brother's sickness. Her Jerusalem friends also approach, weeping with her. Our Lord himself is seized with heavy sorrow on contemplating the fragility of human happiness, and the afflictions ever attendant on the sons of men. He bids her show him the sepulchre. He approaches, accompanied by the crowd. The stone is removed by other hands. The stench of the corpse is perceived. Our Lord, after pouring forth audible prayers to his Father in heaven, thus calls them to witness that Divine Power dwells in him. He, with a loud voice, calls forth Lazarus from the grave, in the hearing of all. The dead obeys the call, comes forth to public view, in the same dress as that in which he was buried, and, (wonderful to say) though after having experienced putridity, alive and well; and returns home without assistance. All the persons present unanimously agree that Lazarus is raised to life by Jesus, and that a great miracle has been worked, such as had never been heard of from the creation of the world. Some relate to the rulers what Jesus had done, nor do these doubt of the truth; nay, they themselves confess that our Lord, by his wonderful works, was becoming every day more and more famous, and that it required but little to cause him to be received as Messiah by the whole people; and therefore the rulers take counsel how they may put him to death, and also Lazarus, who had been raised by him from the dead. (John xi. 46.; xii. 10.) The people, informed of this prodigious transaction, flock together in great multitudes to Bethany, partly to see Jesus, whose fame had been exceedingly increased, and partly to view Lazarus. No wonder, therefore, that they and the rest of the people, who had heard this wonderful account from them, should, when Jesus soon after came to Jerusalem, go forth to meet him, and, strewing the way not only with boughs of trees, but with their own garments, show him the honour due to the Messiah. (xii. 9, et seq. especially 17, 18.) Now if these circumstances do not establish, beyond all doubt, the truth of the miracle, there is no truth whatever in history.' Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. iii. pp. 441, 442.

LAZARUS. Luke (xvi. 19.) speaks of a poor man, named Lazarus, who lay at a rich man's gate, full of sores, and desired the crumbs which fell from his table, without finding relief or pity; whilst the rich man enjoyed great plenty, was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. Lazarus being dead, was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died; and when in hell, amidst his torments, he saw Lazarus afar off, and cried out, Father Abraham, have pity on me, and send Lazarus that he may dip the end of his finger in water to cool my tongue. But Abraham answered him, Son, thou in thy life-time receivest thy good things, and Lazarus his evil things; now he is happy, and thou art miserable.

Interpreters are divided, whether this is a history or parable; but most modern commentators consider it as a parable.

LEAH, לֵאָה, Leia, signifies wearied, tired. Leah was the wife of Jacob, and Laban's eldest daughter. Her father introduced her into Jacob's chamber, on the wedding night; Jacob thought her to be Rachel, whom he had really married. When Jacob complained of the deception, Laban answered, that the custom of that country forbade to marry the younger daughters before the elder. (Gen. xxix. 23, &c.) The Lord observing Jacob to have more inclination for Rachel than for Leah, made Leah the mother of six sons and one daughter, namely, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah. We know not the year of Leah's death; but she died in the land of Canaan, and was buried in the same cave with Sarah, Abraham, and Isaac. (Gen. xlix. 31.)

LEAVEN. The Hebrews were forbidden by the law to eat leavened bread, or food with leaven in it, during the seven days of the Passover. (Exod. xii. 15—19. Levit. ii. 11.) They were very careful in purifying their houses from all leaven before this feast began. God forbade either leaven or honey to be offered to him in his temple; that is, in cakes or in any baked meats. But on other occasions they might offer leavened bread, or honey.

St. Paul, (1 Cor. v. 7, 8.) expresses his desire, that the faithful should celebrate the Christian Passover with unleavened bread, which, figuratively, signifies sincerity and truth. In this he teaches us two things: first, that the law which obliged the Jews to a literal observance of the Passover is no longer in force; and, secondly, that by unleavened bread, truth and purity of heart were denoted. The same apostle alludes to the ceremony used at the Passover, when he says, 'A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;' that is, a small portion of leaven in a quantity of bread or paste, corrupts the whole, and renders it unclean. Our Saviour in the Gospel, (Matt. xvi. 11.) warns his apostles to beware of the leaven of the Herodians and Pharisees, meaning their doctrines.

LEPER. The law excluded lepers from the conversation of mankind, and banished them into the country and places uninhabited. (Lev. xiii. 45, 46.) Many persons attacked with this disease associated together, and composed a kind of society. We instance the four lepers without the city of Samaria, while Benhadad king of Syria besieged it; (2 Kings vii. 3, &c.) and, the ten lepers who came to Jesus Christ, and desired to be healed. (Luke xvii. 12.) This was observed so punctually, that even kings, under this disease, were expelled their palace, and deprived of the government; as Azariah, king of Judah, who was afflicted with this malady for attempting to offer incense in the temple. (2 Kings xv. 5. 2 Chron. xxvi. 20.)

When a leper was cured, he appeared at the gate of the city, and the priest examined whether he was truly healed or not. (Lev. xiv. 1, &c.) After this he went to the temple, took two pure birds, made a wisp with a branch of cedar, and another of hyssop, tied together with a scarlet ribbon made of wool; an earthen vessel was filled with water, and one of these birds fastened alive to the wisp. The leper who was cured killed the other bird, and let the blood of it run into the vessel filled with water. Then the priest took the wisp tinged with the blood of one of the birds, and sprinkled the leper with it. After this the live bird was let loose, and the person healed and purified in this manner was again admitted to the society of the healthy, and to the use of things sacred.

'This ceremony,' says Dr. Hales, 'seems to be typical of the purification of our sins, by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, (Isai. lii. 15. 1 Pet. i. 2.) which flowed out of his wounded side, mixed with water; (John xix. 34.) while the dismissal of the living bird resembles that of the scape goat into the wilderness, with the sins of the leper upon him. And our Lord expressly commanded the lepers whom he healed, to conform to the law.' (Matt. viii. 4. Mark i. 44. Luke v. 14.; xvii. 14.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. p. 248.

LEPROSY. Moses mentions three sorts of Leprosies: 1. in men; 2. in houses; and 3. in clothes.

1. A leprosy in men affects the skin, and sometimes increases in such a manner, as to produce scurf, scabs, and violent itchings, and to corrupt the whole mass of blood. Lucretius supposed this disease to be generated in Egypt: but if the leprosy of the Jews is the same as that of the negroes, which is extremely probable, it may be affirmed that this disease is endemic in the southern and inland parts of Africa. That it was contagious, all histories, sacred and profane, agree. Pliny acquaints us, that it did not invade Italy till the time of Pompey the Great; and that it was brought from Egypt, and is peculiar to that country. Some have thought that the leprosy of the Arabians, or rather of the Africans, 'was the parent of the venereal disease.'

The Jews considered a leprosy as a disease from God; and Moses prescribes no natural remedy for its cure. He requires only that the diseased person should show himself to the priest, and that the priest should judge of his leprosy; if it appeared to be a real leprosy, capable of being communicated to others, he separated the leper from the company of mankind. He appointed certain sacrifices and particular ceremonies for the purification of a leper, and for restoring him to civil society, to the participation of things holy, and to the conversation of other men. The marks which Moses gives for the better distinguishing a leprosy, are signs of the increase of this disease. An outward swelling, a pimple, a white spot, bright, and rather reddish, created just suspicions that a man was attacked by it. When a bright spot, rather reddish or white, appeared, and the hair of that place was of a pale red, and the place itself rather deeper than the rest of the skin, this was a certain mark of leprosy.

Travellers who have seen lepers in the East say, that this disease attacks principally the feet. Maundrell, who had seen lepers in Palestine, says, that their feet are swelled like those of elephants, or horses' feet with the farcy. Tournefort, who had observed several lepers in his travels, believes a leprosy to be only an inveterate venereal distemper, and that the generality might recover if helped in time. 'The negroes,' says Mungo Park, 'are subject to a leprosy of the very worst kind; it appears, at the beginning, in scurfy spots upon different parts of the body; which finally settle upon the hands or feet, where the skin becomes withered, and cracks in many places. At length, the ends of the fingers swell and ulcerate; the discharge is acrid and fetid; the nails drop off, and the bones of the fingers become carious, and separate at the joints. In this manner the disease continues to spread frequently until the patient loses all his fingers and toes. Even the hands and feet are sometimes destroyed by this inveterate malady, to which the negroes give the name of batta-jou, incurable. Park's Travels in Africa, p. 276.

2. The leprosy of houses (Levit. xiv. 34, &c.) must have been known to the Israelites who had lived in Egypt, and must have been common in the land of Canaan, whither they were going, since Moses says to them as follows: When ye come into the land of Canaan, which I give you for a possession, if there be an house infected with a leprosy, he to whom the house belongs shall give notice of it to the priest, who shall go thither. If he sees as it were little holes in the wall, and places disfigured with pale or reddish spots, which in sight are lower than the wall, he shall go out of the house and direct it to be shut up for seven days. At the end of this time, if he finds that the leprosy is increased, he shall command the stones infected with the leprosy to be taken away, and thrown without the city to some unclean place. New stones shall be put in the room of those which were plucked out, and the wall shall be again rough-cast. If the leprosy does not return, the house shall be thought clean; but if it returns, it is then an inveterate leprosy; the house shall be declared unclean, and immediately be demolished; all the wood, stone, mortar, and dust, shall be cast out of the city into an unclean place.

Calmet is of opinion, that this leprosy of houses was occasioned by certain worms which, like mites in a cheese, infected the materials of the building. Might this be the same as the dry rot in timber?

3. The leprosy in clothes is also noticed by Moses in his time. He says, If any greenish or red spots be observed upon any woollen or linen stuffs, or upon any thing made of skin, they shall be carried to the priest, who shall shut them up for seven days; and if at the end of this time these spots increase and spread, he shall burn them, as infected with a real leprosy. If these spots are not increased, the priest shall command the clothes to be washed; and if he afterwards observe nothing extraordinary in them, he shall declare them to be clean. If the greenish or red spots remain, he shall order the garments so spotted to be burnt as unclean: or, if they spread and increase, he shall order the garment to be burnt; or, if the place suspected of a leprosy be in colour like a singed garment, and deeper than the rest, this part of the garment shall be taken away, and the rest preserved.

Calmet thinks it very credible that the leprosy in clothes and skins mentioned by Moses, was caused by vermin; and others also are of opinion, that as the leprosy infected bodies, clothes, and even the walls of houses, it was occasioned by a species of animalcula, or vermin. Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on Levit. xiii. 13.

LETTERS. The inquiry concerning the origin of letters has given birth to vague and unsatisfactory conjectures. Various writers have attributed their invention to different people. It is impossible to arrive at any certain conclusions on this subject. Some have been of opinion, that God, when he inspired man with reason and speech, also communicated to him writing. By some Thyoth or Mercury is said to have invented and taught the Egyptians the use of letters. Some give the honour of this invention to the Assyrians, Phenicians, &c. Some think they were perfectly known before the confusion of Babel, and imagine them to have been in common use in the Antediluvian world; and that Noah and his family brought them into the new world, in which they have been continued through a vast variety of successive changes until the present time. Some attribute the invention to Moses, some to Abraham, some to Abel, and some to Adam. The Jewish Rabbins say, that 'God created them on the evening of the first sabbath;' and Pliny seems to have thought them eternal! This variety of opinions serves only to show the uncertainty of the subject; for to conjectures on this head, where all direct evidence is wanting, there can be no limits. That there were various symbols and figures used in all ages of the world, to represent the objects of sense, even before a regular written language was necessary, may be easily believed. It seems, however, highly credible, that the use of letters was known in the time of Abraham; and it is not improbable that even Noah practised the art of writing. But as we have no certain account of the existence or use of regular alphabetical characters, previously to the days of Moses, great doubts have been entertained whether this art be more ancient than the intercourse of Moses with the Deity upon Mount Horeb, in the year of the world 2513.

It is observed, that in the Antediluvian world, when the life of man was so protracted, there was comparatively little need for writing of any kind, as past transactions had to pass through only few hands. Tradition would, at that period, answer every purpose to which writing in any kind of characters could be subservient. But after the dispersion of mankind, in the time of Peleg, writing became necessary, not only because of this general dispersion, but because the life of man was so much abridged, and consequently tradition must become less certain, as the facts had to pass through a multitude of hands. Hence alphabetical characters became absolutely necessary, as without these, the records of the world must soon be obliterated from the minds of the swiftly succeeding generations of mankind.

The usefulness of alphabetical characters cannot be sufficiently estimated: without writing, the histories of ancient times had never reached us; and the necessary intercourses of friendship and business must have been greatly retarded in general; and, in many cases, wholly obstructed.—Without it, those living oracles which teach the science of salvation, and make known the God of Truth, could never have existed. When God, therefore, proposed to give a revelation of himself to mankind, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that he graciously taught them the use of alphabetical characters, that these divine and interesting records might be handed down from generation to generation.

As it is thought by many, no sufficient evidence exists, that there was any writing before the giving of the law; as then God is said to have written the Decalogue with his own finger; and as, after this time, writing is always mentioned when a suitable occasion offers, it has been concluded, that God himself first taught the use of alphabetical characters to man. LEVI, לֵוִי, signifies who is tied and associated. Levi, third son of Jacob and Leah, was born in Mesopotamia, in the year of the world 2248. After Sichem, the son of Hamor, had violated Dinah, Jacob's daughter, and sister to Levi and Simeon, these two brothers fraudulently engaged Sichem to receive circumcision, and, on the third day, when the pain was greatest, they entered the town of Sichem, slew all the males, retook their sister Dinah, and pillaged the place. (Gen. xxxiv. 25, 26.) This action was very displeasing to their father Jacob: Simeon and Levi replied, Should they have thus abused our sister? &c. Levi went down into Egypt with his father, having three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. When Jacob blessed his sons, he said to Simeon and Levi: Ye are brethren, and too much united in doing mischief; ye are the instruments of an unjust war. God forbid that I should be a partaker in their evil designs, and that my honour should be concerned in their combinations; for in their fury they killed a man, and in their resentment they pierced a wall. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel. I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel. (Gen. xli. 11.; xlix. 5, 6.) Accordingly, Levi was scattered over all Israel, having no share in the division of Canaan, but only some cities in the portion of other tribes. Yet, he was not the worse provided for, since God chose the tribe of Levi for the service of his temple, and for the priesthood, bestowed many privileges on it, above the other tribes, in dignity, and in the advantages of life; all the tithes, first fruits, and offerings presented at the temple, and several parts of all the victims, &c.

LEVI'ATHAN לֵוִיָּאֲתָן, δρᾱκων, signifies a large fish fastened. The leviathan is now universally allowed to be the crocodile, which, from the scaly nature and hardness of his coat, or because 'his scales' so stick 'together that they cannot be sundered,' is therefore in no danger of 'having his skin filled with barbed irons,' or 'his head with fish spears.' (Job xli.) Job gives an admirable description of the leviathan, which may be very naturally explained of the crocodile. Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. pp. 36, 69.

LEVITES. Under this name may be comprised all the descendants of Levi; but it principally denotes those who were employed in the lowest ministries of the temple, by which they were distinguished from the priests, who, being descended from Aaron, were likewise of the race of Levi by Kohath, but were employed in higher offices.

The Levites were descendants of Levi by Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, excepting the family of Aaron; for the children of Moses had no part in the priesthood, and were only common Levites. God chose the Levites instead of the first-born of all Israel, for the service of his tabernacle and temple. (Numb. iii. 6, &c.) They obeyed the priests in the ministrations of the temple, and brought to them wood, water, and other things necessary for the sacrifices. They sang and played on instruments, in the temple, &c. They studied the law, and were the ordinary judges of the country, but subordinate to the priests.

God provided for the subsistence of the Levites, by giving them the tithe of corn, fruit, and cattle: but they paid to the priests the tenth of their tithes; and as the Levites possessed no estates in the land, the tithes which the priests received from them were looked on as the first-fruits which they were to offer to the Lord. (Numb. xviii. 21, 22, 23, 24.)

God assigned them for their habitations forty-eight cities, with fields, pastures, and gardens. (Numb. xxxv. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Of these, thirteen were given to the priests, six of which were cities of refuge. (Joshua xx. 7.; xxi. 19, 20, &c.) While the Levites were actually employed in the temple, they were subsisted out of the provisions in store there, and out of the daily offerings there made: and if any Levite quitted the place of his abode, to serve the temple, even out of the time of his half-yearly, or weekly, waiting, he was received there, kept and provided for in like manner as his other brethren, who were regularly in waiting. (Deut. xviii. 6, 7, 8.) The consecration of Levites was without much ceremony. They wore no peculiar habit to distinguish them from the other Israelites, and God ordained nothing particularly for their mourning. (2 Chron. xxix. 34.) The manner of their consecration may be seen in Numb. viii. 5, 6, 7, &c.

Josephus says, that in the reign of Agrippa king of the Jews, about A.D. 62, six years before the destruction of the temple by the Romans, the Levites desired permission from that prince to wear the linen tunic like the priests; and this was granted. This innovation was displeasing to the priests; and the Jewish historian remarks, that the ancient customs of the country were never forsaken with impunity. He adds, that Agrippa permitted likewise the families of the Levites, whose office it was to guard the doors, and perform other troublesome offices, to learn to sing, and play on instruments, that they might be qualified for the temple service as musicians.

The Levites were divided into different classes: Gershonites, Kohathites, Me-rarites, and Aaronites or priests. (Numb. iii. &c.) The Gershonites, whose number was 7,500, were employed, in the marches through the wilderness, in carrying the veils and curtains of the tabernacle; the Kohathites, whose number was 8,600, in carrying the ark and sacred vessels of the tabernacle; the Merarites, whose number was 6,200, in carrying the several pieces of the tabernacle which could not be placed upon the chariots; and the Aaronites were the priests who served the sanctuary.

When the Hebrews encamped in the wilderness, the Levites were placed around the tabernacle. Moses and Aaron at the east, Gershon at the west, Kohath at the south, and Merari at the north. Moses ordained, that the Levites should not enter upon the service of the tabernacle till they were five-and-twenty years of age; (Numb. viii. 24, 25, 26.) or, as he says elsewhere, from thirty to fifty years old. (Numb. iv. 3.) But David, finding that they were no longer employed in these grosser offices of transporting the vessels of the tabernacle, appointed them to enter on service at the temple at twenty years of age. The priests and Levites waited by turns, weekly, in the temple. They began their weeks on one sabbath day, and on the sabbath day in the following week went out of waiting. (1 Chron. xxiii. 24. 2 Chron. xxxi. 17. Ezra iii. 8.) When an Israelite made a religious entertainment in the temple, God required that the Levites should be invited to it. (Deut. xii. 18, 19.)

LEVIT'ICUS, the third book in the Pentateuch. It is called Leviticus, because it contains principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests, the Levites, and sacrifices, for which reason the Hebrews called it the priests' law. The Jews term it likewise Vajiera, because in Hebrew it begins with this word, which signifies and he called. The first seven chapters of Leviticus prescribe the ceremonies to be observed in offering burnt sacrifices, meat offerings, bread and cakes, peace-offerings, or thanksgiving, and sin-offerings; they regulate what parts were to be consumed on the fire of the altar, and what were to be given to the priest who offered them. After this are related in what manner the priests were consecrated, and what sacrifices were offered on that occasion; and the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, for attempting to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire. On this occasion Moses appoints the mourning of the priests, and forbids them to drink wine while waiting in the temple.

Chapters xi. to xv. give rules for distinguishing beasts clean and unclean; the leprosy of men, of houses, and of habits; for the purification of men indisposed with a gonorrhea, and of women after child-birth. After this, the ceremonies on the day of solemn expiation are regulated; and the degrees of relation, permitted or forbidden in marriage. Then follow prohibitions of alliances with the Canaanites, of idolatry, theft, perjury, calumny, hatred, the superstitions of the Gentiles, magic, divinations, soothsayings, prostitutions, and adultery; explaining the blemishes which unfitted animals for sacrifice. Chapter xxiii. notices the principal festivals in the year, the Passover, Pentecost, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Great Day of Expiation, the Feast of Trumpets, or beginning of the civil year (including the story of a man who was stoned to death for having blasphemed the name of the Lord), the sabbatical, and the jubilee years; and it contains regulations respecting vows and tithes.

All agree that Leviticus is a canonical book, and of divine authority. It is generally held to be the work of Moses, as well as the rest of the Pentateuch. It contains the history of the eight days of Aaron's and his sons' consecration, in the year of the world 2514. The laws prescribed in it upon other subjects besides sacrifices, have no chronological marks by which we may judge at what times they were given.

LIB'ANUS, לבנון, Libanus, Hebrew Lebanon, signifies white; otherwise, incense, or the filiation of the heart. Libanus, or Lebanon, is a famous mountain which separates Syria from Palestine. It forms a kind of horse-shoe in its length, beginning three or four leagues from the Mediterranean above Smyrna, and extending from north to south towards Sidon, thence bending from west to east towards Damascus, and returning from the south northward, from the Strait of Damascus, as far as Laodicea Scabiosa. The western part of this chain of mountains is properly called Libanus. The other part, eastward, extends from south to north, and is called Antilibanus by the Greeks. Between these two mountains is a long valley called Cœle-Syria, or hollow Syria, and the valley of Lebanon. (Joshua xi. 17.)

Libanus is about an hundred leagues in circumference. It has Mesopotamia east, Armenia north, the Holy Land south, and the Mediterranean west. It is composed of four enclosures of mountains, which rise one on the other. The first is very rich in grain and fruits; the second is barren, abounding in thorns, rocks, and flints; the third, though higher than this, enjoys a perpetual spring, the trees being always green, and the orchards filled with fruit: it is so agreeable and fertile, that some have called it a terrestrial paradise. The fourth is so high, that it is almost always covered with snow, and is uninhabitable by reason of the great cold.

The following is Volney's account of Mount Lebanon:—'A view of the country will convince us that the most elevated point of all Syria is Lebanon, on the south east of Tripoli. Scarcely do we depart from Larneca, in Cyprus, which is thirty leagues distant, before we discover its summit capped with clouds. This is also distinctly perceivable on the map, from the course of the rivers. The Orontes, which flows from the mountains of Damascus, and loses itself below Antioch; the Kasmia, which, from the north of Balbeck, takes its course towards Tyre; the Jordan, forced by the declivities towards the south; prove that this is the highest point. Next to Lebanon, the most elevated part of the country is Mount Akkar, which becomes visible as soon as we leave Marra in the Desert. It appears like an enormous flattened cone, and is constantly in view for two days' journey. No one has yet had an opportunity to ascertain the height of these mountains by the barometer; but we may deduce it from another consideration. In winter their tops are entirely covered with snow, from Alexandretta to Jerusalem; but after the month of March it melts, except on Mount Lebanon, where, however, it does not remain the whole year, unless in the highest cavities, and towards the north east, where it is sheltered from the sea winds, and the rays of the sun. In such a situation I saw it still remaining, in 1784, at the very time I was almost suffocated with heat in the valley of Balbeck. Now, since it is well known that snow, in this latitude, requires an elevation of fifteen or sixteen hundred fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon, and that it is consequently much lower than the Alps, or even the Pyrenees.

'Lebanon, which gives its name to the whole extensive chain of the Kesraouah, and the country of the Druses, presents us every where with majestic mountains. At every step we meet with scenes in which nature displays either beauty or grandeur, sometimes singularity, but always variety. When we land on the coast, the loftiness and steep ascent of this mountainous ridge, which seems to enclose the country, those gigantic masses which shoot into the clouds, inspire astonishment and awe. Should the curious traveller then climb these summits which bounded his view, the wide extended space which he discovers becomes a fresh subject of admiration; but, completely to enjoy this majestic scene, he must ascend to the very point of Lebanon, or the Sannin. There, on every side, he will view an horizon without bounds; while, in clear weather, the sight is lost over the desert, which extends to the Persian Gulf, and over the sea which bathes the coast of Europe. He seems to command the whole world, while the wandering eye now surveying the successive chains of mountains, transports the imagination in an instant from Antioch to Jerusalem.'

'To the north,' says Dr. E. D. Clarke, 'appeared snowy summits, towering beyond a series of intervening mountains, with unspeakable greatness. We considered them as the summits of Libanus: but the Arabs belonging to our caravan called the principal eminence Jebel el Sich, saying it was near to Damascus; probably, therefore, a part of the chain of Libanus. This summit was so lofty, that the snow entirely covered the upper part of it: not lying in patches, as during summer, upon the tops of some very elevated mountains, but investing all the higher part with that perfect white and smooth velvet-like appearance which snow exhibits only when it is very deep; a striking spectacle in such a climate, where the beholder, seeking protection from a burning sun, almost believes the firmament to be on fire.' Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 201, 202; Volney's Travels, vol. i. p. 293. 301. 315, &c.; Taylor's Sacred Geography.

LIBERTINES. A considerable difference of opinion exists among the learned, with respect to the synagogue of the Libertines mentioned in Acts, (vi. 9.) whether these Libertines were the children of freedmen (Italian Jews and proselytes) or African Jews from the city or country called Libertus, or Libertia, near Carthage.

Now since the word Λιβερτινοί denotes not nature (that is country) but state and condition, and since Libertini occurs in the middle of these names of nations, and since Josephus has told us that many Jews were removed by Ptolemy from their country, and placed in the cities of Libya, Beza, Le Clerc, Gothofred, Valcknaer, and others, have, on the authority of Eusebius, conjectured Λιβυστίνων, or those sprung from Libya. To this opinion, Wetstein also seems to incline. All the MSS. and ancient versions, however, agree in the common reading. Hence others understand by the Λιβερτινοί, Jews, inhabitants and citizens of Libertus, or Libertia, in Africa Proper, or Carthage, either a town or a district. It is urged by Bishop Pearce, that Suidas in his Lexicon, on the word Λιβερτινοί, says, that it was ὄνομα τοῦ ἔθνους, the name of a people; and that in a Latin tract published with the works of Optatus, mention is made of Victor, Episcopus Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Libertinensis. From these two passages, he is of opinion, that it appears there was in Libya a town or district called Libertia, whose inhabitants bore the name of Λιβερτινοί, Libertines, when Christianity prevailed there, in the reign of the Roman emperor Honorius. Hence, he observes, it seems probable, that the town or district, and the people, existed in the days of which Luke is here speaking; and that they were without doubt Jews, who came up as the Cyrenian and Alexandrian Jews did, to bring their offerings to Jerusalem, and to worship God in the temple there.

That there was, however, any such town as Libertus or Libertina, cannot be proved. The most probable opinion, and that adopted by most commentators from the time of Chrysostom, is, that the Libertines were Jews, whom the Romans had taken in war, and conveyed to Rome, but afterwards freed; at whose expense this synagogue had been built, which might have been properly called the synagogue of the Romans. Λιβερτινοί is, therefore, a name of Roman origin, and to be explained by Roman customs. This opinion, too, is confirmed by the circumstance that synagogue does not occur in the middle of the nations, but stands first, and has to it added ἡ λεγομένης, whence it clearly appears that Λιβερτινοί is not the name of a region or country. Besides, there were, it seems, many Libertini of the Jewish religion at Rome, as is evident from both Tacitus and Suetonius. Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. iv. pp. 199, 200.

LIBERTINES, a denomination that arose in Flanders about the year 1525. The heads of this party were one Copin, and Quintin, of Picardy. The doctrines they taught are comprised in the following propositions: that the Deity is the sole operating cause in the mind of man, and the immediate author of all human actions; that consequently the distinctions of good and evil, which have been established with respect to these actions, are false and groundless, and that men, properly speaking, cannot commit sin; that religion consists in the union of the spirit, or rational soul, with the Supreme Being; that all those who have attained to this happy union by sublime contemplation and elevation of mind, are allowed to indulge, without exception or restraint, their appetites and passions, as all their actions are then perfectly innocent; and that after the death of the body, they are to be united to the Deity.

This denomination permitted their followers to call themselves either Catholics or Lutherans. Broughton's Histor. Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 543; Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. iv. pp. 122, 123.

LIB'NAH, לבנה, signifies moon, or whiteness; otherwise, incense, or brick. Libnah was a station of the Israelites in the desert. (Numb. xxxiii. 20.) It is usual to consider the Libnah of Judah as forming a second instance of this name; (Josh. x. 29.) but it has been doubted whether this Libnah was not in or near the station of the Israelites, as this white district was of some, if not of considerable extent. Sacred Geography.

LICE. Swarms of lice were the third plague with which God punished the Egypt-tians. (Exod. viii. 16.) The Hebrew word כִּנִּים, Chinnim, which the Septuagint render σκνίφες, some translate flies, and think them the same as gnats. Origen says, that the sciniphe is so small a fly, that it is scarcely perceptible to the eye, but that it occasions a sharp stinging pain. However, the original, according to the Syriac, and several good interpreters, signifies lice.

LION, a beast well known, and frequently mentioned in Scripture. The lion of the tribe of Judah, (Rev. v. 5.) is Jesus Christ, who sprang from the tribe of Judah, and overcame, death, the world, and the devil. The lion from the swelling of Jordan, (Jer. l. 44.) is Nebuchadnezzar marching against Judea, with the strength and fierceness of a lion. The river Jordan, when it overflows its banks, drives away the lions and other beasts which lie among the thickets that cover the banks of this river, during the summer heats. Samson tore a young lion to pieces with his hands on the road to Timnath with his father and mother; and David boasts, that he had killed both a lion and a bear.

Isaiah, (xi. 6, 7.) describing the happy time of the Messiah, says, that then the calf and the young lion, and the fatling, should lie down together, and that a little child should lead them; and that the lion should eat straw like the ox. This signifies the peace and happiness which the church of Christ should enjoy.

LITANY, a solemn form of supplication to God. The word is derived from λυαίνα, 'supplication.' At first the use of litanies was not fixed to any stated time; but they were employed only as exigencies required. They were observed in imitation of the Ninevites, with ardent supplications and fastings, to avert the threatened judgments of fire, earthquake, inundations, or hostile invasions. The days on which they were used were called Rogation days. Several of these days were appointed by the canons of different councils, till the seventeenth council of Toledo decreed that Litanies should be used in every month. Thus, by degrees, these solemn supplications came to be used weekly, on Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient stationary days in all churches.

As to the form in which Litanies are made, namely, in short petitions by the priest, with responses by the people, St. Chrysostom derives the custom from the primitive ages, when the priest began, and uttered by the Spirit, some things fit to be prayed for, and the people joined the intercessions, saying, 'We beseech thee to hear us, good Lord.' When the miraculous gifts of the Spirit began to cease, they wrote down several of these forms, which were the original of our present Litanies. St. Ambrose has left us one, which agrees in many particulars with that of our own church.

About the year 400, Litanies began to be used in processions, the people walking barefoot, and repeating them with great devotion. It is pretended that several countries were delivered from great calamities by this means. About the year 600, Gregory the Great, from all the Litanies extant, composed the famous seven-fold Litany, by which Rome, it is said, was delivered from a grievous mortality. This has served as a pattern to all the western churches since; and to it ours of the church of England comes nearer than that of the Romish Missal, in which later popes have inserted the invocation of saints, which our reformers properly expunged. These processional Litanies having occasioned much scandal, it was decreed that in future the Litanies should be used only within the walls of the church.

The days, appointed by the fifteenth canon of our church, for using the Litany, are Wednesdays and Fridays, the ancient fasting days of the primitive church; to which, by the rubric, Sundays are added, as being the days of the greatest assembly for Divine service. Before the last review of the Common Prayer, the Litany was a distinct service by itself, and used some time after the morning prayer was ended. At present, it forms one office with the morning service, being ordered to be read after the third collect for grace, instead of the intercessional prayers in the daily service. Broughton's Histor. Dict. vol. ii. p. 21.

LITURGY, denotes all the ceremonies in general belonging to Divine service, and is derived from the Greek, λειτουργία, 'service, public ministry.' When the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost ceased, the rulers of the church endeavoured to supply this want by proper forms of their own composition, according to Christian prudence and discretion. This seems to have been the true origin of Liturgies, or stated forms of Divine service. In the first ages every bishop was at liberty to order the form of Divine service in his own church; and, accordingly, each particular church, or diocese, had its proper Liturgy. This privilege the bishops retained for several ages. Afterwards they agreed by consent to conform their Liturgy to the model of the metropolitical councils to which they belonged; and it was then enacted into a law by several councils, that the same order and uniformity should be observed in all churches.

Before the Reformation the public service of the church of England was performed only in Latin, and different Liturgies were used in different parts of the kingdom. These Liturgies consisted of prayers and offices, some of which had been transmitted from very ancient times, and others were of later origin, accommodated to the Romish religion, which was then the established religion of this country. When the nation, in the time of Henry the Eighth, was disposed to a reformation, something was done in liturgical matters for the edification of the people. It was thought necessary both to have the service of the church in the English or vulgar tongue, in order that men might 'pray with the understanding,' and also to correct and amend the Liturgy, purge it of those corruptions by which it had been gradually defiled, and render Divine service more agreeable to the Scriptures, and more conformable to the doctrine and practice of the primitive church, in the purest and best ages of Christianity. Accordingly, in the year 1537, the convocation appointed a committee to compose a book, which was intitled, 'The godly and pious institution of a Christian man,' and which contained the Lord's Prayer, the Ave-Maria, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Seven Sacraments, &c. This book was again published in 1540, and 1543, with corrections and alterations, under the title of 'A necessary doctrine and erudition for any Christian man.' In the preface it is said, that it was 'set furthe by the king, with the advyse of his clergy; the lordes both spirituall and temporall, with the nether house of parliament, having both sene and lyked it very well.' In the year 1540, a committee of bishops and divines was also appointed by king Henry the Eighth, to reform the rituals and offices of the church; and the next year, the king and the clergy ordered the prayers for processions and litanies to be translated into English, and to be publicly used. Afterwards, in 1545, came out the king's 'Primer,' containing the whole Morning and Evening Prayer in English, not very different from the version in our present Book of Common Prayer; 'and this,' as Fuller expresses it, 'was the farthest pace the reformation stept in the reign of Henry the Eighth.'

In the year 1547, the first of king Edward the Sixth, it was recommended to certain grave and learned bishops and others, then assembled, by order of the king, at Windsor Castle, to draw up a Communion Service, and to complete the whole Liturgy, by adding public offices for Sundays and Holidays, for Baptism, Confirmation, Matrimony, Burial, and other special occasions. The persons appointed to compile this Liturgy were the following:—

1. Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.
2. George Day, bishop of Chichester.
3. Thomas Goodrick, bishop of Ely.
4. John Skip, bishop of Hereford.
5. Henry Holbeach, bishop of Lincoln.
6. Nicholas Ridley, bishop of Rochester.

7. Thomas Thirlby, bishop of Westminster.

8. Dr. William May, dean of St. Paul's.

9. Dr. John Taylor, afterwards bishop of Lincoln.

10. Dr. Simon Haines, dean of Exeter.

11. Dr. Robinson, archdeacon of Leicester, and afterwards dean of Durham.

12. Dr. John Redman, master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

13. Dr. Richard Cox, afterwards bishop of Ely.

It is worthy of remark, that as the first translators of the Scriptures into the English language were, several of them, persecuted unto death by the papists, so some of the chief of those who translated the Book of Common Prayer (archbishop Cranmer, and bishop Ridley,) were burnt alive by the same cruel faction.

Our excellent Liturgy thus compiled, was revised and approved by the archbishops, bishops, and clergy, of both the provinces of Canterbury and York, and then confirmed by the king and three estates in parliament, in the year 1548. This was what Mr. Fuller calls the first edition of the Common Prayer.

Some objections having been made to this work by Mr. John Calvin abroad, and some learned men at home, particularly in reference to the commemoration of the dead, the use of *chris*m, and extreme unction, it was ordered by a statute in parliament (5 and 6 of Edward VI.), that it should be faithfully and godly perused, explained, and made fully perfect. The chief alterations made in consequence of this order were the following: the sentences, exhortation, general confession, and absolution, were added to the beginning of the morning and evening service, which, in the first Common Prayer Book, commenced with the Lord's Prayer; the ten commandments were added to the beginning of the communion service; the use of oil in confirmation and extreme unction was left out, and also prayers for the dead, and certain expressions which had a tendency to countenance the doctrine of transubstantiation were omitted. The Liturgy, thus revised and altered by the same persons to whom the compiling of the Communion Service had been entrusted, was again confirmed by parliament, in the year 1551. This, however, and the former act made in 1548, were repealed in the first year of queen Mary, who restored the Latin Liturgies, according to the popish forms of worship.

In 1559, the first year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, the act of repeal was reversed, and the former Liturgy, the second book of king Edward, was restored. The Liturgy, however, was subjected to a further revision, by which some few passages were altered, and the petition in the Litany for being delivered from the tyranny, and all the detestable enormities of the bishop of Rome, left out, in order that conscientious Catholics might not be prevented from joining in the common service. This being done, it was presented to parliament, and by them received and established; and the act for uniformity, which is usually printed with the Liturgy, was published by the queen's authority, and sent throughout the nation. The persons employed in this revision were the following:—

1. Master Whitehead, once chaplain to queen Anna Boleyn.

2. Matthew Parker, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury.

3. Edmund Grindall, afterwards bishop of London.

4. Richard Cox, afterwards bishop of Ely.

5. James Pilkington, afterwards bishop of Durham.

6. Doctor May, dean of St. Paul's and master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

7. Sir Thomas Smith, principal Secretary of State.

It is observable, that of these Drs. Cox and May were employed on the first edition of this work, as appears by the preceding list. It may be also observed, that Camden and Strype give other names besides those which are here mentioned.

In the first year of king James, 1604, another revision took place, and the Liturgy received farther additions and improvements. At this revision, additions were made of some prayers and thanksgivings, and of that part of the catechism, which contains the doctrine of the sacraments. Some alterations were also made in the rubric, relative to the absolution, to the confirmation, and to the office of private baptism, which was confined to the lawful minister. The other additions were, a thanksgiving for divers benefits,—a thanksgiving for fair weather,—a thanksgiving for plenty,—a thanksgiving for peace and victory, and a thanksgiving for deliverance from the plague. When the work was thus completed, a royal proclamation was issued, bearing date March 1, 1604, in which the king gave an account of the Hampton Court Conference, the alterations that had been made by himself and his clergy in the Book of Common Prayer, and commanded it, and none other, to be used throughout the kingdom.

In this state the Book of Common Prayer continued till the reign of Charles the Second, who, on the 25th of October, 1660, 'granted his commission, under the great seal of England, to several bishops and divines, to review the book of Common Prayer, and to prepare such alterations and additions, as to them should seem meet and convenient.' In the following year, the king assembled the convocations of both the provinces of Canterbury and York, and authorized the presidents of those convocations, and others, the bishops and clergy of the same, to review the said Book of Common Prayer,' &c.; requiring them, 'after mature consideration, to make such alterations and additions as to them should seem meet and convenient.' The additions and alterations agreed to by the convocation were chiefly the following: the collects for the ember weeks; the prayer for the high court of parliament; the prayer for all sorts and conditions of men; the general thanksgiving; the collect for Easter eve; the collect, epistle, and gospel, for the sixth Sunday after Epiphany; a new collect for the third Sunday in Advent; the office of baptism for those of riper years; the two psalms prefixed to the lesson in the burial service: the forms of prayer to be used at sea, for the martyrdom of Charles the First, and for the restoration of the royal family, were all added. There were also several other less material additions; and through the whole service ambiguities were removed, and various improvements made. In particular, the portions of the Epistles and Gospels were taken from the new translation of the Bible; but the Psalms, according to the translation of Cranmer's Bible, were retained. The book, in this state, passed both houses of convocation; it was subscribed by the bishops and clergy; it was ratified by act of parliament, and received the royal assent, May 19th, 1662. This was the last revisal of the Book of Common Prayer, in which any alteration was made by public authority.

'This is a short history of a work, which,' as Dr. Adam Clarke has candidly and justly observed, 'all who are acquainted with it, deem superior to every thing of the kind, produced either by ancient or modern times. It would be disingenuous not to acknowledge, that the chief of these prayers were in use in the Roman Catholic Church, from which the Church of England is reformed: and it would betray a want of acquaintance with ecclesiastical antiquity, to suppose that those prayers and services originated in that Church; as several of them were in use from the first ages of Christianity, and many of the best of them before the name of pope or papery was known in the earth.'

Dr. Comber gives the following just commendation of the Liturgy of our church:—'Though all churches in the world have, and ever had, forms of prayer, yet none were ever blessed with so comprehensive, so exact, and so inoffensive a composure as ours, which is so judiciously contrived, that the wisest may exercise at once their knowledge and devotion, and yet so plain, that the most ignorant may pray with understanding; so full, that nothing is omitted which is fit to be asked in public, and so particular, that it compriseth most things which we would ask in private, and yet so short as not to tire any that have true devotion. Its doctrine is pure and primitive; its ceremonies so few and innocent, that most of the Christian world agree in them; its method is exact and natural; its language significant and perspicuous, most of the words and phrases being taken out of the Holy Scriptures, and the rest are the expressions of the first and purest ages, so that whoever takes exceptions at these must quarrel with the language of the Holy Ghost, and fall out with the church in her greatest innocence; and in the opinion of the most impartial and excellent Grotius (who was no member of, nor had any obligations to, this church) the English liturgy comes so near to the primitive pattern, that none of the reformed churches can compare with it. Whoever desires to worship God with zeal and knowledge, spirit and truth, purity and sincerity, may do it by these devout forms. And to this end may the God of Peace give us all meek hearts, quiet spirits, and devout affections, and free us from all sloth and prejudice, that we may have full churches, frequent prayers, and fervent charity; that, uniting in our prayers here, we may all join in his praises hereafter, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.' Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 20—31; Broughton's Hist. Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 23, et seq.; Dr. Adam Clarke's Preface to the Holy Bible.

LOCUSTS. The Hebrews have many names for locusts, which probably indicate several sorts. God smote Egypt with locusts, which ravaged every thing in the fields of that country. Historians and travellers remark, that locusts are very numerous in Africa, and in many parts of Asia: they sometimes fall like a cloud on the country, and eat up every thing; the quantity of them is so large, that they obscure the sun; and the people discerning them in the air, are in a consternation, being uncertain whether they will not fall on their lands. The prophet Joel, (i. 6, 7, &c.; ii. 3, 4, 5, &c.); speaking of a great dearth which happened in Judea, after it had been laid waste by a multitude of locusts, speaks of them as of an enemy's army which had committed great devastations. Isaiah (xxxiii. 4, 5.) remarks that when the locusts were carried away into the sea, and were afterwards thrown up in heaps upon the sands, great holes were dug in the earth to bury them; or else they were burnt to prevent infections; in reality, it has happened that great plagues have been occasioned by them.

Moses declares the locust a clean animal. (Levit. xi. 22.) This creature is commonly eaten in Palestine, and the neighbouring countries; and we are told that John the Baptist subsisted on locusts and wild honey. Dr. Shaw says, that when locusts are sprinkled with salt, and fried, they are not unlike our fresh water cray-fish in taste; and Russel observes, that the Arabs salt them, and eat them as a delicacy.

The Rev. Mr. Hartley, an English clergyman, who visited Thyatira in June 1826, thus describes the ravages of these destructive insects:—"I am perfectly astonished at their multitudes. They are, indeed, as 'a strong people set in battle array; they run like mighty men; they climb the walls like men of war.' I actually saw them 'run to and fro' in the city of Thyatira; they 'ran upon the wall; they climbed up upon the houses; they entered into the windows like a thief.' (Joel ii. 5. 7. 9.) This is, however, by no means one of the most formidable armies of locusts which are known in these countries." Missionary Register, July 1827, p. 323; Harmer's Observations, vol. ii. p. 58.

LORD'S SUPPER, an ordinance instituted by our Saviour in commemoration of his death and sufferings. The institution of this sacrament is recorded by the first three evangelists, and by the apostle St. Paul, whose words differ very little from those of his companion St. Luke: and the only difference between St. Matthew and St. Mark is, that the latter omits the words 'for the remission of sins.' There is so general an agreement among them all, that it will only be necessary to recite the words of one of them. 'Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve' (to eat the passover which had been prepared by his direction); 'and as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins.' (Matt. xxvi. 20. 26, 27, 28.) The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper being thus instituted, was adopted by all early Christians, with very few exceptions; and no modern sect rejects it, except the Quakers, and some Mystics, who make the whole of religion to consist of contemplative love.

In the early times of the Gospel, the celebration of the Lord's Supper was both frequent and numerously attended. Voluntary absence was considered as a culpable neglect; and exclusion from it by the sentence of the church, as a severe punishment. Every one brought an offering proportioned to his ability: these offerings were chiefly of bread and wine, and the priests consecrated as much as was necessary for the administration of the Eucharist. The clergy had a part of what was left for their maintenance; and the rest furnished the repast called ἀγάπη, or love feast, which immediately followed the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and of which all the communicants, both rich and poor, partook.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper greatly resembled the religious feasts to which the Jews were accustomed. At those feasts they partook of bread and wine in a serious and devout manner, after a solemn blessing or thanksgiving to God for his manifold mercies. This was particularly the case at the feast of the Passover, which our Saviour was celebrating with his apostles when he instituted this holy sacrament. At that feast, they commemorated the deliverance of their own peculiar nation from the bondage of Egypt; and there could not be a more suitable opportunity for establishing an ordinance which was to commemorate the infinitely more important deliverance of all mankind from the bondage of sin. The former deliverance was typical of the latter; and instead of keeping the Jewish Passover, which was now to be abrogated, they were to commemorate 'Christ, their Passover, who was sacrificed for them;' the bread broken was to represent his body offered upon the cross, and the wine poured out was to represent his blood, which was shed for the salvation of men. The nourishment, which these elements afford to our bodies, is figurative of the salutary effects which the thing signified has upon our souls. And as the celebration of the Passover was not only a constant memorial of the deliverance of the Israelites out of the land of Egypt, but also a symbolical action by which they had a title to the blessings of the old covenant, so the celebration of the Lord's Supper is not only a constant memorial of the death of Christ, but also a pledge or earnest to the communicant of the benefits promised by the new covenant. As the Passover was instituted the night before the actual deliverance of the Israelites, so the Lord's Supper was instituted the night before the redemption of man was accomplished by the crucifixion of the blessed Jesus. It is to be partaken of by all who look for remission of sins by the death of Christ; we are not only to cherish that hope in our minds, and express it in our devotions, but we are to give an outward proof of our reliance upon the merits of his passion as the means of our salvation, by eating that bread and drinking that wine, which are typical representations of the body and blood of Christ, 'who, by his one oblation of himself once offered, made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world.'

As the sacrament of baptism is the prescribed mode of regeneration, or initiation into the privileges of the Christian covenant, so is the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the instituted mode of renovation, sanctification, and gradual perfection of the Christian life, in the opinion of the primitive fathers, and also of the church of England; which in her Catechism states the benefits of communicating worthily, to be 'the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine.' The Lord's Supper is indeed the Christian tree of life, replanted by our gracious Redeemer, and watered by his blood, 'for the healing of the nations,' in the spiritual paradise. (Rev. xxii. 1, 2.)

In the primitive Church, the Lord's Supper was administered every Sunday, as intimated by the phrase of 'breaking bread' (Acts ii. 42. 46.; xx. 7—11. 1 Cor. x. 16, &c.); and Justin Martyr informs us, that 'after they had read a portion of Scripture, sung a hymn, preached and prayed, then they proceeded to the administration of the Eucharist.' In Cyprian's days they celebrated it both morning and evening: 'That as Christ instituted the sacrament in the evening, to signify the evening and end of the world, so they celebrated it in the morning, to denote the resurrection of their Lord and Master.' So necessary did they hold the early, as well as the frequent participation of this holy rite, that at Carthage it was usual to administer it even to children.

In the present age, professing Christians run into the opposite error of omission; and perhaps one of the leading causes of the prevailing lukewarmness of the times, and decay of vital religion among churchmen, is to be ascribed to the prevailing neglect and disuse of this most holy rite, by old and young, by rich and poor, to their great loss and spiritual detriment. If we consider ourselves as by nature slaves to sin, and doomed to eternal misery, but redeemed and set at liberty by the blood of Christ, we must be utterly incapable of gratitude if we do not, on all occasions, call to mind this instance of infinite goodness with all possible love and thankfulness. And as our great Benefactor hath himself appointed an holy institution, by our attendance on which he expressly and peculiarly requires our acknowledgments for this astonishing act of compassion towards us, we cannot refuse that attendance, without, in effect, either denying the favor, or refusing our thanks; nay, without returning again into that state of slavery to sin, and that just dread of infamy and misery, from which he died to deliver us. All the benefits of his death, forgiveness of sins, grace, mercy, and peace with offended Omnipotence, are conveyed to us in this holy ordinance. To decline it, therefore, is in form to disclaim those benefits, inasmuch as it is presumption in the ungrateful to hope for them, especially through any channel, except that of Christ's appointment. Those who constantly, and with true piety, attend this holy sacrament, know the comfort which it affords in every situation of life. It is there the Christian applies for relief, when he is ready to sink under the sense of his own weakness and imperfection. There he learns that, 'if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins.' (John ii. 1.) When he is in distress or affliction, there he hears the consoling voice of Christ, which calls to every child of sorrow, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' (Matt. xi. 28.) When he feels the infirmities of age, and sees the near approach of death, there he is taught to look for support from him who suffered and died for us all. Admitted to communion with God, allowed to enter into his presence, to eat at his table; he feels his faith strengthened, his hope confirmed, his charity enlarged. He returns to the duties of life with more ardour; he supports its sorrows with more resolution. Such are the blessings, such are the consolations, which our Saviour offered to all his faithful servants, when he left with them his last command, 'Do this in remembrance of me.' Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 473—477; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 983; Clapham's Sermons for the Use of Families, vol. i. pp. 60, 61; Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity, pp. 54, 55.

LOT, לוֹט, signifies wrapped up, hidden, covered; otherwise, myrrh, rosin. Lot was the son of Haran, and nephew to Abraham. He followed his uncle from Ur, and afterwards from Haran, to settle in the land of Canaan, (Gen. xi. 31.) in the year of the world 2082, and 2083. Abraham had always a great tenderness for him. He took him with him into Egypt, and brought him back to Canaan. But they could not continue long together: they were obliged to separate, because, as they both had large flocks, their shepherds sometimes quarrelled. (Gen. xiii. 6, 7.) Lot therefore chose Sodom for his abode, the country around it being very beautiful. About eight years after, king Chedorlaomer and his allies having attacked the kings of Sodom, and the neighbouring cities, routed them, pillaged Sodom, and took many captives, and Lot, Abraham's nephew. Abraham, being informed of it, armed his servants, pursued the confederate kings, overtook them near the springs of Jordan, recovered the spoils which they had taken, and brought back the captives; including his nephew Lot.

Some years after, the sins of the Sodomites, and of the neighbouring cities, being at their height, God sent three angels, to punish and destroy them. See ABRAHAM.

Towards the evening, two of these angels being come to Sodom, Lot, who was sitting at the city gate, perceived them, and entreated them very earnestly to lodge in his house. The angels at first refused; but Lot pressing them, they went in, and he provided an entertainment for them. But before they were retired to rest, all the inhabitants of the city besieged Lot's house, exclaiming, Where are these men, who came to you this evening? Produce them that we may know them. Do not, I beseech you, brethren, said Lot, do so wicked a thing. I have two daughters, both virgins; I will bring them to you; use them as you please, provided you injure not these men, who are come to my house, as to a place of security. But they said, Begone; you came a stranger hither, and now pretend to be our judge. As they were on the point of breaking open the door, the two angels stretched out their hands to Lot, drew him into the house, and shut the door; and struck all those with blindness who were assaulting it.

Then said the angels to Lot, Direct all who belong to you to quit this city; for we are going to destroy it. Lot went and informed his sons-in-law, who had married his daughters. But this intelligence they received as an idle fancy. In the morning, as soon as it was day, the angels took Lot, his wife and daughters, by the hand, and carried them forcibly, as it were, out of their house; saying, Save yourselves with all haste, look not behind you, get as far as you are able to the mountain, lest you be involved in the misfortune of the rest. Lot entreated the angels, who consented, that he might retire to Zoar, which was one of the five cities doomed to be destroyed. But Lot's wife, looking behind her, was overtaken in the flame, which fell from heaven, and which consumed Sodom, with the country about it; by which means she was changed into a pillar of salt. Lot, having beheld the sad calamity of Sodom, had not courage to abide in Zoar; but left it, and retreated with his two daughters to a cave in some mountain near it. They, imagining that all mankind were destroyed, and that the world would have an end, unless they provided new inhabitants for it, made their father drunk, and the eldest lay with him without his perceiving it; she conceived a son by him, whom she called Moab. The second daughter did the same, and had Ammon by him.

St. Peter says, (2 Pet. ii. 7.) that God delivered righteous Lot from the oppression and vexation of the Sodomites.

The Mahometans have added many circumstances to the history of Lot; as that, he was sent by God to Sodom, and the four cities, in order to reclaim them from their abominable crime. Lot acquitted himself of the duty of a preacher for twenty years, reproaching them with being the first of all mankind that fell into this abomination, and perverted the order of nature; but his sermons and remonstrances were in vain.

LOT'S WIFE is called by the Rabbins Hedith, which signifies witness. The Scripture, (Gen. xix. 26.) says that 'she looked back from behind him, and became a pillar of salt.' The phrase 'to look back behind one,' is taken sometimes for delaying, deferring, staying; it was probably the angel's intention to hasten Lot and his family; to convince them that they had reason to fear the worst consequences from delay.

Several difficulties are proposed concerning her being changed into a pillar of salt. The opinions which are the most probable are the following: 1. Lot's wife, by the miraculous power of God, was changed into a mass of rock salt, probably retaining the human figure.' 2. 'Tarrying too long in the plain, she was struck with lightning, and enveloped in the bituminous and sulphuric matter which abounded in that country, and which, not being exposed afterwards to the action of the fire, resisted the air and wet, and was thus rendered permanent.' 3. 'She was struck dead, and consumed in the burning up of the plain; and this judgment on her disobedience being recorded, is an imperishable memorial of the fact itself, and an everlasting warning to sinners in general, and to back-sliders and apostates in particular.' On these opinions it may be only necessary to state, that the first two understand the text literally, and that the last considers it metaphorically. That God might in a moment convert this disobedient woman into a pillar or mass of salt, or any other substance, there can be no doubt. Or that by continuing in the plain, till the brimstone and the fire descended from heaven, she might be struck dead with lightning, and indurated or petrified on the spot, is as possible. And that the account of her becoming a pillar of salt, may be designed to be understood metaphorically, is also highly probable. It is certain that salt is frequently used in the Scriptures as an emblem of incorruption, durability, &c. Hence a covenant of salt, (Numb. xviii. 19.) is a perpetual covenant, one that is ever to be in full force, and never broken; on this ground, a pillar of salt may signify no more in this case, than an everlasting monument against criminal curiosity, unbelief, and disobedience. Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. xix. 26.

LOVE OF GOD. Love has been defined a partial leaning of the heart towards a particular object. It is a natural passion of the human mind, given to man for the most important purposes. Though the affections often operate on the mind, yet the conviction of the mind will be found to give the strongest and most lasting bias to the affections. Our love of any object is usually preceded by a consciousness, arising from experience or observation, that it possesses some amiable qualities, which spontaneously excite our kind regard; or that goodness, under some of its various forms, is a prevailing ingredient in its nature, and one of its predominant characteristics.

The love of God is the love of a Being, who not only exists, but self-exists, and whose goodness is infinite and unceasing, neither circumscribed by quantity, nor space, nor time. The love of God, therefore, is a passion well suited to our nature, and which there is, in the circumstances in which we are placed, a natural tendency to excite. The love of God is the love of all that is most excellent, most an object of our love; and it is the love not only of goodness, but of our greatest good. For God is the Author of all the good that we ever enjoyed, and of our capacity for enjoying it. The love of God is called by our Saviour, (Matt. xxii. 37, 38.) the first and great commandment, to which all others are subordinate, and in the performance of which they are included. For the love of God always supposes an entire obedience to his will; and it is obedience to the will of God, which is prompted not by fear, but by love; not by the dread of punishment, but by the ardour of affection; which is the perfection of all religious excellence. This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments. The love of God supposes a devout longing of the soul after God; a desire to be present with him, and to have him present with us. We cannot, indeed, have any corporeal vision of God, but we can be present with him in the spirit; and it is our spirit which will feel a continual longing for his presence. Our soul will thirst after God. We shall delight in that converse which he vouchsafes to hold with those that love him. We shall open our hearts to him in prayer. In the ardour of our supplications, in the aspirations of our gratitude, in the effusions of our thanksgiving, our devotion, and our praise, our spirits will approach his throne, and his Spirit will abide in us. The Spirit of God is, indeed, every where present, and we can go nowhere where it is not; but, though it be universally diffused, the hearts of the righteous are more especially favoured by its influence. God is said by the Evangelists, to make his abode with those that love him; their souls are the sanctuary in which he delights to dwell.

The love of God is a sentiment purely evangelical; and is one of those many peculiar circumstances which so eminently distinguish the doctrines of the Gospel from the dry unanimated precepts of the ancient heathen moralists. It is neither a mere unmeaning animal fervour, nor a lifeless formal worship or obedience. It consists in devoutness of heart, as well as purity of life; and it may be defined—such a reverential admiration of God's perfections in general, and such a grateful sense of his infinite goodness in particular, as render the contemplation and the worship of him delightful to us; and produce in us a constant desire and endeavour to please him in every part of our moral and religious conduct.

This it is that the Scriptures mean by the love of God; and it is nothing more than what every man may, if he pleases, very easily acquire. It is not a new perception, of which we never experienced any thing before; it is not an unintelligible, mysterious, or supernatural impression upon the soul: it is only a purer degree of that very same affection, which we frequently entertain for some of the most worthy of our own species. This sentiment religion finds already existing in our minds, and all that it does is to give it a new direction, and to turn it upon God, as its highest and properest, and most adequate object. If then we wish to know still more clearly in what the love of God consists, and what share of it we ourselves possess, we must consult our own breasts, and consider a little how we feel ourselves affected towards the eminently great and good among our fellow-creatures. Now, when we observe any one of this character going on steadily and uniformly in one regular even course of upright, noble, disinterested, benevolent conduct, making it the chief business of his life to promote the comfort and happiness of every human being within his reach, we can no more help esteeming, and loving, and reverencing, so excellent a Person, than we can forbear desiring food when we are hungry, even though we ourselves are not in the least benefited by his goodness. But, should we be so fortunate as to live under his influence, and to be interested in his virtues, to have him for our Friend, our Benefactor; our Parent, Guardian, Governor, or Protector; then it is scarcely possible for language to express the emotions of affection, gratitude, and delight, which we feel in contemplating his goodness, and even in the very mention of his name. In cases like this, how does our heart burn within us, how restless and impatient are we, till we find some better way than that of words, to express the sense we have of our Benefactor's kindness towards us! With what solicitude do we study every turn of his countenance, and endeavour to prevent his very wishes! We not only do what he desires, but we do it with alacrity and ardour. We love to speak of him, to think of him, to converse with him, to imitate him. We never mention him but in terms of reverence and respect. We are jealous of his reputation; we cannot bear to hear it lightly treated. We enter heartily into his interests, and adopt his sentiments. We love what he loves, we hate what he hates; we are ready for his sake to do any thing, to relinquish any thing, to suffer any thing. These are the sentiments we entertain, and thus the conduct we observe towards those that we love on earth; and in this manner does Christianity expect us to love our Father that is in heaven. If this sincerity and ardour of affection are justly esteemed both natural and laudable in the one case, why are they not at least equally so in the other? Why may they not, without any stretch of our faculties, or any imputation of hypocrisy or enthusiasm, be exercised towards Him, who is the very perfection of every thing that is great and good; who is, in reality and in the strictest sense, our Friend and Benefactor, our Parent, Guardian, Protector, and Governor all in one? It is true, indeed, there is one difference, and that, as some think, a very material one, between the two cases. Our earthly friends are seen, our heavenly One is unseen. But who will pretend to say, that we can have no love for those whom we have never seen? It is enough that we feel that they are present with us, by that most pleasing and convincing of all proofs, the benefits they confer upon us. Now we know that God is every where present; that 'he is not far from every one of us;' that in him we most literally 'live, and move, and have our being.' Though we see not him, yet his kindness and bounty to us we see and feel every moment of our lives; and the invisibility of the Giver is amply compensated by the inestimable value of his gifts. By him we were first brought into being; by his power that being is continually upheld; by his mercy in Christ Jesus we are redeemed from sin and misery; by his grace we are excited to every thing that is good; by his providence we are hourly protected from a multitude of unseen dangers and calamities; to his bounty we owe the various comforts and delights that surround us here, and the provision that is made for our everlasting happiness hereafter. Is it possible now to receive such favours as these, without sometimes thinking of them; or to think of them without being filled with love and gratitude towards the gracious Author of them? If they affect us at all, they must affect us strongly and powerfully. For, although the love of God is not a sudden start of passion, but a sober, rational, religious sentiment, acquired by reflection, and improved by habit; yet, as was before observed, it must not be so very rational as to exclude all affection; it may, and it ought to produce in us a steady and uniform, a sedate yet fervent sense of gratitude towards God; exerting itself in acts of adoration and praise, and substantialized in the practice of every Christian virtue.' Bishop Porteus's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 1—11.

LOVE OF OUR NEIGHBOUR. The word neighbour, the Jews explained by the children of thy people; but our Saviour, by the parable of the Samaritan, has shown that the word neighbour does not mean only the men of one nation, or one religion; and that a proper object, of what nation or religion soever, being brought in our way, it is our duty to pay this debt of love to him. Hence neighbourhood now comprehends all mankind.

Our Saviour not only raises the value of such love, both by calling it a new commandment, which he gave his disciples, and by making it such a badge and cognizance, 'that all men might know whether they were his disciples or not, if they had love one to another;' but he has also raised the obligation yet higher, by the standard he has given of our love to the brethren; 'as I have loved you, so love ye one another.' When we consider the extent of that expression, 'as I have loved you;' both in respect to the infinite dignity of him who so loved us, and the unworthiness of us, whom he has so loved; and as to the wonderful instances and endearing effects of his love, in that he gave himself for us, and bore our sins in his own body, that he might thereby redeem and deliver us from the punishment of sin, by reconciling us to his Father: we must acknowledge that here is love indeed, and a perfect pattern for our imitation. He has made all mankind our neighbours, and all Christians our brethren, whom we ought to love with a pure heart fervently. But though we should exclude none from our love, yet some have a right to a higher measure of it; for such, in whom we see the likeness of God, are entitled to the largest share of it, in proportion to the degrees of that goodness we see in them.

We are required to be holy, 'as he who called us is holy, in all manner of conversation; and to purify ourselves even as he is pure;' and our Saviour said, 'be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' But since we cannot rise in holiness and purity to an equality with Christ, much less can we be perfect, as God is perfect; we see that 'as' in those places means only a conformity or similitude, or the proposing of God and Christ for our imitation, as the pattern after which we ought to frame our thoughts and actions. Hence also the meaning of loving our neighbour as ourselves, is, that as we feel nature teaches us to love ourselves with much tenderness and care; to have a quick sense of all our concerns, and great solicitude about every thing that relates to us; so we ought to love our neighbour with a sincere and hearty affection, bearing a share of all his burthens, and employing ourselves with an active diligence to procure his real good and happiness; with a love of the same sort as that we bear to ourselves, though not to the same degree; in a word, the doing to others what we would that others should do to us. This is what we owe, at all times, to all men, as God in his providence puts them in our way, to become our neighbours. But on some occasions we are required to love them in a stricter sense, as ourselves; nay, even with a preference. We are commanded to be kindly affectioned one to another, in honour preferring one another. We ought to esteem others better than ourselves, and to be ready, when the circumstances of Providence call us to it, to lay down our lives for the good of others. For though it is an extraordinary instance of love, now, indeed, seldom required, and not often in our power, willingly to suffer death for the sake of others, or for promoting the glory of God; yet, as some generous minds, from love to their country or friends, have sacrificed their own lives for their good; so this brotherly love, when raised to some higher degrees than is common with us, often in the first ages of Christianity, induced Christians to expose themselves to the most exquisite torments for the sake of others. But as it is not the lot of Christians, now, to suffer much for the faith, so there are not many instances of it, even in times of persecution. Thus we see what is meant by loving our neighbour as ourselves.

In the next place it is necessary to examine the several acts and instances, in which this love of ours ought to consist. And to animate our zeal in each of these, we ought to consider what obligations we are under of mutual love one to another. Among men, those of the same kindred, household, and family, reckon themselves strictly bound to love one another. But we are all brethren, derived from one common origin; our bodies are all of the same mould, our souls all come from one Father of spirits, and Fountain of life. We all partake of one nature, and however distinguished by our birth, yet we are all upon a level as to every thing that is essential. We ought, therefore, to despise none, though below us, because of the depression of their fortune; since those accidental matters are produced and lost by such imperceptible means, and often so very unaccountably, that we ought never to value ourselves by any thing, but what is inseparable from, or belonging to us. We ought, therefore, to consider ourselves as partakers of the same being with others, and, therefore, to bear a share with them, in their common concerns, and to love them as parts of ourselves.

Another reason for this mutual tenderness, is the common interest of mankind, that it should universally prevail; and which may not improperly be called, the voice and law of nature. Man is a necessitous and helpless creature, wanting the aid and assistance of different persons. God has also given to men different talents, capacities, and inclinations, that they might be useful to one another. No man is of so exalted a station, as not to want the assistance of those who are far beneath him. There must be a circulation of mutual advices and assistances, and nothing so much promotes it as love. It both commands, and, by a happy infection, spreads and insinuates itself into others, and engagingly induces them to make such returns as are in their power. A man who is governed by love feels, that, as it subdues himself, so it subdues others.

We have already observed in how effectual a manner our Saviour has recommended this love of our neighbour to us, and what an inimitable pattern he has set us; with what patience he bore the sense of injuries and all resentments. He has taught us to ask forgiveness, only as we forgive others; he enlarges in repeated expressions on that clause of the short prayer which he taught his disciples, to impress it the more on their minds. His apostles enforce none of the Christian duties more frequently, and in expressions more sublime and tender, than when they treat of this. St. Paul, after a long discourse on the different gifts, and powers, which were commonly bestowed at that time, and which had so far prevailed on human infirmity, that some were thereby greatly exalted; and after he had shown how unreasonable such an abuse of those gifts was, leads them to a more excellent way, and proves to them that charity is preferable to the gifts of tongues, the working of miracles, and the understanding all mysteries; nay, even to the giving of our bodies to be burnt, and all our goods to the poor. Charity is not only preferred to all these, but also to faith and hope, as being the highest state of perfection to which our souls can possibly be advanced. St. John had the peculiar honour to be called the beloved disciple, and one reason of his having that character, seems to be, on account of that tender strain of eloquence, in which he recommends love and charity to others. It is recorded of him, that when his strength failed, as to other things, and his nature was decayed, he continued still to exhort his disciples, as little children, to love one another. Bishop Burnet in Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii. pp. 132—138.

LUKE, Λούκας, signifies light. Luke the Evangelist was a Syrian, a native of Antioch, and by profession a physician. Some maintain that he was the same as Lucius, the kinsman of St. Paul, (Rom. xvi. 21.) but this opinion has been sufficiently refuted by Michaelis. It is not agreed whether he was by birth a Jew or a heathen. Some have thought that he was one of the seventy disciples; but there is no authority in the Scriptures for that opinion. It has been considered as probable, that St. Luke was the companion of Cleophas, with whom he went to Emmaus, when Jesus Christ joined them. We are told by some that he was a painter; and Grotius and Wetstein thought that he was in the early part of his life a slave: but there seems to be no foundation for either opinion in any ancient writer. In the introduction to his Gospel, (i. 1.) Luke appears to intimate that he was not himself an eye-witness of the actions he was about to relate. He is not named in any of the Gospels. In the Acts of the Apostles, which were written by him, he uses the first person plural, when he is relating some of the travels of St. Paul; and thence it is inferred that, at those times, he was himself with that apostle. He says, (Acts xvi. 11.) 'Loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia.' Thus we learn that St. Luke accompanied St. Paul in this his first voyage to Macedonia. From Samothracia they went to Neapolis, and thence to Philippi. It has been concluded, that at this last place St. Paul and St. Luke separated, because in continuing the history of St. Paul, after he left Philippi, St. Luke uses the third person, saying, (Acts xvii. 1.) 'Now when they had passed through Amphipolis,' &c.; and he does not resume the first person till St. Paul was in Greece the second time. We have no account of St. Luke during this interval; it only appears that he was not with St. Paul. When Paul was about to go to Jerusalem from Greece, after his second visit into that country, Luke, mentioning certain persons, says, (Acts xx. 5, 6.) 'These going before tarried for us at Troas; and we sailed away from Philippi.' Thus again we learn that Luke accompanied Paul out of Greece, through Macedonia, to Troas; and the sequel of St. Paul's history in the Acts, and some passages in his Epistles, written whilst he was a prisoner at Rome, inform us that Luke continued from that time with Paul, till he was released from his confinement at Rome. It seems probable, that Luke went from Rome into Achaia; and some authors have asserted, that he afterwards preached the Gospel in Africa. None of the most ancient fathers have mentioned that St. Luke suffered martyrdom; and hence it is supposed that he died a natural death, but at what time, or in what place, is not known.

St. Luke's Gospel is thought by some to have been published in Greece, about the year 63. Different places, however, have been mentioned where his Gospel has been supposed to be written.

St. Luke seems to have had more learning than any other of the Evangelists, and his language is more varied, copious, and pure. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 320, &c.; Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. p. 79, &c.; Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. iv. p. 235.

LUTHERANISM, a name given by the followers of Martin Luther to the opinions and religious system established by that celebrated Reformer.

Rise, Progress, and History.—The beginning of the 16th century witnessed an event the most glorious that had occurred since the days of the apostles,—the Reformation of corrupted Christianity, by the blessing of God on the exertions of Luther and his associates. Martin Luther was a native of Aisleben in Upper Saxony, and was born in 1483. After passing through the usual stages of education with honour, he became a monk of the Augustinian Eremites, who were one of the mendicant orders. He was professor of divinity in the newly-erected academy of Wittemberg in 1517, when Tetzel, an agent of Pope Leo X. arrived there with a commission from the Pontiff to grant plenary indulgences to every person, who should contribute to the expense of building the cathedral of St. Peter at Rome. Luther, scandalized at this venal remission of sins, past, present, or to come, opposed a measure so inimical to the interests of piety and virtue, and exposed, with vehement indignation, this impious traffic from the pulpit and the press. None of the qualities or talents which characterized Luther were of a common or ordinary kind: his genius was truly great and unparalleled; and he was particularly distinguished for Scriptural knowledge, piety, an unconquerable spirit, invincible magnanimity, patience, and perseverance. He exposed the doctrine of indulgences in 95 propositions, which he publicly maintained at Wittemberg in September 1517; and his arguments and boldness were equally admired throughout Germany. Leo, naturally fond of ease, and occupied in the pursuits of pleasure and ambition, at first despised what he deemed a mere squabble among monks; but he was soon roused by the tidings of Luther's rapid success, and by the clamours of the popish ecclesiastics for aid and vengeance. Leo then directed Catejan, his legate in Germany, to summon him into his presence, and command him to recant. Luther obeyed the summons, and appeared before the cardinal, but refused to retract antecedently to conviction.

As yet Luther had no thoughts of questioning the supremacy of the pope; nor did he entertain any suspicions of the radical corruptions of the Romish church. But those corruptions are so linked together, and so dependent on each other, that the discovery of one naturally draws after it a detection of more. Such was the progress in the mind of Luther. Whilst attempts at accommodation were taking place in Germany, the pontiff, instigated by the impatient fury of those around him, issued a bull in 1520, denouncing destruction against Luther as an excommunicated here-tic, unless he should recant in sixty days. The Reformer, whom diligent and deep researches into the Scriptures had by this time firmly convinced of the radical corruption of the church of Rome, immediately and publicly relinquished her communion. Nor did he long stand forth the sole adversary of this corruption, but was soon encouraged by the successes of a distant coadjutor: the sale of indulgences at Zurich had excited the spirit of Zuinglius, a man equal to Luther in zeal and intrepidity, and more speedily convinced of the duty of renouncing the Romish church. Ecolampadius also ably assisted in the work of reformation in Switzerland, in the greater part of which it was rapidly established: and in Germany the efforts of Luther in this arduous undertaking were soon powerfully seconded by other learned men, as Melancthon, Carolostadius, Oslander, Bucer, &c. However, Luther has, among friends, the whole glory, and, among enemies, bears the whole odium of this work, and is still called the apostle of Germany.

In the year following, Luther was requested to appear before his avowed enemy, the emperor Charles V., in the diet at Worms. Unmoved by the apprehensions of his friends, who reminded him of the fate of Huss, he instantly obeyed, and there acknowledged, that his writings had occasionally been violent and acrimonious; but he refused to retract his opinions, until they should be proved erroneous by the Scriptures. An edict, which pronounced him an excommunicated criminal, and which commanded the seizure of his person, as soon as the duration of the safe conduct he had obtained should expire, was immediately promulgated. Frederic the Wise, elector of Saxony, who had all along countenanced Luther, without professing his doctrines, now withdrew him from the storm. As Luther was returning from Worms, a troop of horsemen, in masks, rushed from a wood, seized him, and conveyed him to the castle of Wartenberg, where he was concealed nine months, encouraging his adherents by his pen, and cheered in return by accounts of the rapid diffusion of his doctrines. Luther, after having written much, and exerted himself on various occasions with a wonderful firmness and intrepidity, departed this life in 1546, lamented by his followers, and revered by the Protestant world. It must be confessed, that his temper was violent; but the times in which he lived seem to have required such a disposition for the work in which he was engaged.

On the death of Luther, Philip Melancthon was placed at the head of the Lutheran church; a man inferior to him perhaps in nothing so much as in courage and firmness of mind. But scarcely had they and their friends triumphed over the enemies of reformation, when they became the prey of intestine disputes, and were divided among themselves in such a deplorable manner, that till Melancthon's death, which happened in 1560, and in some degree till the end of the sixteenth century, the Protestant states of Germany were a scene of strife and contention; a circumstance which the church of Rome did not fail to turn to the advancement of her own interests. In the 17th century, the principles of the Lutheran church were carried into Asia, Africa, and America, by several persons, who fixed their habitations in those distant regions, and were introduced into some parts of Europe, where they had hitherto been unknown.

Doctrines.—The system of faith embraced by the Lutherans was drawn up by Luther and Melancthon, and presented to the emperor Charles V., in 1530, at the diet of Augusta or Augsburg, and hence called the Augustan or Augsburg confession. It is divided into two parts, of which the former, containing twenty-one articles, was designed to represent, with truth and perspicuity, the religious opinions of the Reformers; and the latter, containing seven articles, is employed in pointing out and confuting the seven capital errors which occasioned their separation from the church of Rome, and which were—communion in one kind, the forced celibacy of the clergy, private masses, auricular confession, legendary traditions, monastic vows, and the excessive power of the church. The leading doctrines of this confession are—the true and essential divinity of the Son of God; his substitution and vicarious sacrifice; and the necessity, freedom, and efficacy of divine grace.

From the time of Luther to the present day, no change has been introduced into the doctrine and discipline received in this church. The method, however, of illustrating, enforcing, and defending the doctrines of Christianity, has undergone several changes in the Lutheran church; and though the confessions continue the same, yet some of the doctrines which were warmly maintained by Luther, have been of late wholly abandoned by his followers. In particular, the doctrines of absolute predestination, human impotence, and irresistible grace, for which Luther was a most zealous advocate, have been rejected by most of his followers, and are now generally known by the name of Calvinistic doctrines. The Lutherans now maintain, in regard to the divine decrees, that they respect the salvation or misery of men, in consequence of 'a previous knowledge of their sentiments and character,' and, not, with the Calvinists, as founded on 'the mere will of God.'

At one time, Luther rejected the Epistle of St. James, as inconsistent with St.

Paul's doctrine of justification; he also set aside the Apocalypse: but both these are now received as canonical in the Lutheran church.

The members of this church are distinguished principally by maintaining the following doctrines:—That neither the pope nor any other man possesses any authority in matters of faith, but that the Scriptures are, as a collection of inspired, sufficient, and clear writings, the only source whence our religious sentiments, whether they relate to faith or practice, must be drawn, and to which human reason ought, in every respect, to submit and yield; that man is naturally incapable of thinking or doing any good, valid before God; that justification and future happiness are the effect of the meritorious and vicarious death of Jesus, as God and man in one person; that faith is the necessary condition of grace on the part of man, which faith is itself the gift of divine grace; that good works are of value only as far as they are the effect of faith; that, however, there exists no unconditional predestination, and that the real body and blood of Jesus are united in a mysterious manner, through the consecration, with the bread and wine, and are received with and under them in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This last doctrine they distinguished by the word consubstantiation, and it formed, together with the doctrine of predestination, for a long time, the principal party wall between the Lutherans and Calvinists; but it, as well as some of the other doctrines, has been, if not formally, at least virtually abandoned, or considerably modified, by a great number of Lutherans.

Worship, Rites, and Ceremonies.—In 1523, Luther drew up a liturgy or form of prayer and administration of the sacraments, which, in many particulars, differed little from the mass of the church of Rome. But he did not intend to confine his followers to this form; and hence, every country, where Lutheranism prevails, has its own liturgy, which is the rule of proceeding in all that relates to external worship, and the public exercise of religion. The liturgies used in the different countries which have embraced the system of Luther, perfectly agree in all the essential branches of religion, in all matters that can be considered as of real moment and importance; but they differ widely in many things of an indifferent nature, concerning which the Scriptures are silent, and which compose that part of the public religion that derives its authority from the wisdom and appointment of men. Assemblies for the celebration of divine worship meet every where at stated times. Here the Holy Scriptures are publicly read; prayers and hymns addressed to the Deity; the sacraments administered; and the people instructed in the knowledge of religion, and excited to the practice of virtue, by the discourses of their ministers.

Of all Protestants, the Lutherans are perhaps those who differ least from the church of Rome, not only in regard to their doctrine of consubstantiation, namely, that the body and blood of Christ are materially present in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though in an incomprehensible manner; or, that the partakers of the Lord's Supper receive along with, under, and in the bread and wine, the real body and blood of Christ; but likewise as they represent several religious practices and ceremonies as tolerable, and some of them useful, which are retained in no other Protestant church. Among these may be reckoned the forms of exorcism in the celebration of baptism; the use of wafers in the administration of the Lord's Supper; the private confession of sins; the use of images, of incense, and of lighted tapers in their churches (particularly at the celebration of the Lord's Supper), with a crucifix on the altar. All these are practices of the church of Rome. Some of them, however, are not general, but confined to particular parts.

Formerly private confession was universally practised by the Lutherans, though they never held, with the Roman Catholics, forgiveness of sins in this world to be necessary for forgiveness in another life; and it was connected with the disgraceful custom of giving, on that occasion, a small present to the confessor. This confession-money, as it is called, constituted, in many places, an important part of the clergyman's salary: but this custom, as well as private confession itself, has been abolished in most of the Lutheran countries and congregations, and another source of revenue substituted in its place. A kind of public and general confession is in use as a preparative to the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

Government and Discipline.—In every country where Lutheranism is established, the supreme head of the state is, at the same time, the supreme visible ruler of the church; but 'all civil rulers of the Lutheran persuasion are effectually restrained, by the fundamental principles of the doctrine they profess, from any attempts to change or destroy the established rule of faith and manners,—to make any alteration in the essential doctrines of their religion, or in any thing intimately connected with them,—or to impose their particular opinions upon their subjects in a despotic and arbitrary manner.' The councils, or societies, appointed by the sovereign to watch over the interests of the church, and to govern and direct its affairs, are composed of persons versed in the knowledge both of civil and ecclesiastical law, and, according to a very ancient denomination, are called Consistories. The internal government of the Lutheran Church seems to be in some respects anomalous. It bears no resemblance to Independency, and yet it is equally removed from Episcopacy on the one hand, and from Presbyterianism on the other. We must, however, except the kingdoms of Sweden and Denmark (including Norway,) in which the form of ecclesiastical government that preceded the Reformation is retained, purged, indeed, from the superstitions and abuses that rendered it so odious.

'This constitution of the Lutheran hierarchy,' says Dr. Mosheim, 'will not seem surprising, when the sentiments of that people with respect to ecclesiastical polity, are duly considered. On the one hand they are persuaded that there is no law, of divine authority, which points out a distinction between the ministers of the Gospel with respect to rank, dignity, or prerogatives; and therefore they recede from Episcopacy. But, on the other hand, they are of opinion, that a certain subordination, a diversity in point of rank and privileges among the clergy, is not only highly useful, but also necessary to the perfection of church communion, by connecting, in consequence of a mutual dependence, more closely together the members of the same body; and thus they avoid the uniformity of the Presbyterian governments. They are not, however, agreed with respect to the extent of this subordination, and the degrees of superiority and precedence that ought to distinguish their doctors; for in some places this is regulated with much more regard to the ancient rules of church government, than is discovered in others.'

The constitution of the Lutheran church in Sweden, bears great resemblance to that of the church of England. However, neither in Sweden nor in Denmark is that authority and dignity attached to the Episcopal office, which the church of England bestows upon her dignitaries.

Countries where found, &c.—Lutheranism is the established creed and form of religion in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, in the greater part of Germany, particularly in the north, and in Saxony; in Livonia, and Esthonia, and the greatest part of Prussia. There are also Lutheran churches in Holland, Courland, Russia, Hungary, North America, the Danish West India Islands, &c. In Russia the Lutherans are at present more numerous than any other sect, that of the Greek Christians excepted. In Poland are several Lutheran churches; and in Hungary, the Lutherans have 439 churches, and 472 pastors, who are elected by the people, and regulate among themselves their church government.

The Lutherans have too long cherished in their breasts that spirit of intolerance and bigotry, from which they themselves have suffered so long, and so much; and this spirit has often impeded among them the progress of science and enlightened inquiry, and frustrated many attempts of the reformed party towards a reunion. But this bigotry is by no means characteristic in them; and during the last thirty-five or forty years, learning has been cultivated, and liberality of sentiment and doctrine practised by them, in at least an equal degree with any other Christian party. The names of Michaelis, Mosheim, Griesbach, Paulus, Eickhorn, Doederlein, Henke, Herder, and many others, all of them divines of the Lutheran church, must rescue her from the reproach of inferiority in learning, as well as from that of bigotry and intolerance. Adam's Religious World, pp. 321—353.

LYD'DA, Λύδδα, signifies nativity, or generation. Josephus says, that this place was a village, not yielding to a city in greatness. It was reckoned a day's journey from Jerusalem; and the second tenths of its fruits were carried to Jerusalem to be eaten there. 'Lydda,' says D'Arvieux 'is called by the Arabs Lydd. It is situated on a plain about a league from Rama, north. It is so entirely ruined, as to be at present but a miserable village, noticeable only on account of the market which is held here, once a week. The dealers resort to it to sell the cottons and other commodities, which they have collected during the week. There was formerly a handsome church, dedicated to St. George, a saint who is equally in favour with both Turks and Christians.'

Dr. Wittman says, 'I rode across the plains of Jaffa and Lydda. We approached the town of Lydda, or Loudda, and saw the Arab inhabitants busily employed in sowing barley. The soil of these fine and extensive plains is a rich black mould, which, with proper care and industry, might be rendered extremely fertile. Lydda is denominated by the Greeks Diospolis, or the Temple of Jupiter, probably because a temple had been dedicated, in its vicinity, to that deity. Since the crusades, it has received from the Christians the name of St. George, on account of its having been the scene of the martyrdom and burial of that saint. In this city tradition reports, that the emperor Justinian erected a church. Wittman's Travels, pp. 203. 205. Sacred Geography.

LYD'IA, Λυδία; See LYDDA for its signification. Lydia, in Asia Minor, was a province between Caria and Phrygia; it was bounded by Phrygia on the east, by Mysia on the north, and part of Caria on the south. The music of the Lydians was soft and effeminate. Lydia was peopled by Lud, the son of Shem. (Gen. x. 22.) Sacred Geography.

LYS'TRA, Λύστρα, signifies dissolving. It was a city in Lycaonia, of which Timothy was a native. Paul and Barnabas, having preached in this city, and healed a man who had been lame from his birth, were taken for gods; Paul for Mercury, and Barnabas for Jupiter. These apostles could scarcely prevent the people from offering to them sacrifices. However, soon after, certain Jews of Iconium and Antioch, in Pisidia, coming thither, excited against them the populace, who began to throw stones at Paul and Barnabas, and dragged them out of the city, supposing they were dead. (Acts xiv. 6, 7, 8.)

MAA

MA'ACHAH, or BETH-MA'ACHAH, מַעְכָּה, signifies squeezed or ground; otherwise fixed, or sorrow of the belly. Beth-Maachah may signify either the temple of the goddess presiding over child-birth, or a residence built by a person named Maachah. It was a city of the Ammorites on the Jordan, near Mount Hermon. (Josh. xii. 5.; xiii. 13. 1 Chron. iv. 19.) It appears to have been a town of Naphtali. (2 Sam. xx. 14. 1 Kings xv. 20. 2 Kings xv. 29.) It may be thought to have had a district of considerable extent belonging to it. (2 Sam. xx. 15.) Sacred Geography.

MAC'CABEES, the name of four apocryphal books, two of which are esteemed canonical by the church of Rome. Among Protestants the first two are reckoned pretty good historical authority, the last two are little known: the third is sometimes seen among us: the fourth never.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE MACCABEES was originally written in the Chaldee language, or that spoken by the Jews after their return from Babylon. It was extant in this language in the time of Jerome. Its title at that time was Sarbet sar-bané el, 'The scourge of the rebels against the Lord,' or, as some translate the words, 'The sceptre of the prince of the sons of God.' The author of this book is not certainly known. Some think him to be John Hyrcanus, the son of Simon, who was prince and high-priest of the Jews nearly thirty years, and who began his government at the time when this history ends. Others ascribe it to one of the Maccabees themselves, and many think it to be the work of the Great Synagogue. It is most probable, that it was composed in the time of John Hyrcanus, when the wars of the Maccabees were terminated either by Hyrcanus himself, or by some others employed by him. From the Chaldee it was translated into Greek, and from that into Latin. Our English version is from the Greek.

MAC

This first book of the Maccabees is a very accurate and excellent history, and, of all the apocryphal books extant, approaches nearest to the style and manner of the sacred historians. It contains the history of forty years, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of Simon the high-priest. This book follows the Jewish era; the second, that of Alexandria, which begins six months later.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE MACCABEES consists of several pieces compiled by an unknown author. It begins with two epistles sent from the Jews of Jerusalem to those of Alexandria and Egypt, to exhort them to observe the feast of the dedication of the new altar erected by Judas Maccabeus, on his purifying the temple. These epistles are additions to the history, and supposed to be spurious. After the epistles is the preface of the author to his history. This history is an abridgement of a larger work composed by one Jason, an Hellenistic Jew of Cyrene, who wrote in Greek the history of Judas Maccabeus, and his brethren, and the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes, and Eupator his son, in five books. But the entire work of Jason is lost.

This second book is by no means equal to the first in accuracy and fidelity. It contains the history of about fifteen years, from the execution of the commission of Heliodorus, who was sent by Seleucus to bring away the treasures of the temple, to the victory obtained by Judas Maccabeus over Nicanor, that is, from the year of the world 3828 to 3843.

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE MACCABEES contains the history of the persecution raised by Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt, against the Jews of his kingdom. This happened in the year of the world 3787. Hence this book, in order of time, should be placed before the first of the four; but, as it is of less repute and authority than the other two, it has been reckoned after them. It seems to have been written by some Alexandrian Jew in the Greek language, not long after the time of Siracides. It is very improperly inscribed with the name of Judas Maccabeus, or any of his brethren.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE MACCABEES is very little known among the Latins. It is perhaps the same as the book concerning government of reason, ascribed by some to Josephus, extant in certain ancient Greek manuscripts of the Bible, and placed after the three first books of the Maccabees. Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. ii. pp. 37, 38; Prideaux's Connection, part ii. pp. 157. 262. 264.

MACEDO'NIA, Μακεδονία, signifies high or eminent; perhaps, the heights, the mountainous district. Macedonia was a kingdom of Greece, having Thrace to the north, Thessaly south, Epirus west, and the Ægean Sea east. It is thought that Macedonia was peopled by Kittim, son of Javán, (Gen. x. 4.) and that by Chittim, Macedonia is to be understood. See CHITTIM.

Alexander the Great, son of Philip, king of Macedonia, having conquered Asia, and subverted the Persian empire, the name of the Macedonians became very famous throughout the East; and it is often given to the Greeks, the successors of Alexander in the monarchy. In like manner, the name of Greeks is often put for Macedonians. (2 Mac. iv. 36.)

St. Paul was invited, say some, by the angel of this province, who appeared to him at Troas, to preach the Gospel in Macedonia; but Dr. Doddridge thinks, that the expression 'a certain man,' cannot refer to the guardian angel of Macedonia, as Grotius imagines, but rather to some particular person whom Paul knew. Bloomfield explains the passage as follows: 'a person whom he knew to be a Macedonian, either by his dress, or rather from his words.' Hence he thinks Doddridge mistaken in supposing the τις to denote 'some certain Macedonian.' Paul, however, concluded, that God had called him to that country; and the success which attended his preaching there confirmed him in his opinion. There he founded the churches of Thessalonica and Philippi, and had the satisfaction to see them flourishing, numerous, and abounding in spiritual gifts and graces. (Acts xvi. 9, &c.) Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. iv. pp. 508, 509; Doddridge's Family Expositor, vol. iii. p. 141, edit. 1810.

MACEDONIANS, the followers of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, who, through the influence of the Eunomians, was deposed by the council of Constantinople in 360, and sent into exile. He considered the Holy Ghost as a divine energy diffused throughout the universe, and not as a person distinct from the Father and the Son. The sect of the Macedonians was crushed before it had arrived at maturity, by the council assembled at Constantinople in 381. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 346.

MACHPE/LAH, מכפלה, signifies double; and the author of the Vulgate takes it in this sense, speaking of the cave that Abraham bought of Ephron, in which to bury his wife Sarah. (Gen. xxiii. 9.) But others, with more probability, think that this was the name of the plain in which this cave was situated, and that, therefore, we should translate, 'the cave which is at Machpelah,' and 'the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah,' (Gen. xxiii. 17.) as in the English translation.

MAD'AI, מאדי, signifies measure; otherwise, covering, or clothes. Madai was the third son of Japheth. (Gen. x. 2.) It is commonly thought that he was the father of the Medes: but besides that Media is too far distant from the other countries peopled by Japheth, it cannot be comprehended under the name of 'The isles of the Gentiles,' which were the division of the sons of Japheth. These reasons have induced some learned men to suggest, that Madai was the father of the Macedonians. Macedonia was otherwise called Æmathia, as if from the Hebrew Ei, an island, and Madia, the isle of Madai; or from the Greek Aia-madai, the land of Madai. Near this country is mentioned a people called Mædi, or Madi; and in Macedonia, a king called Medus. The name of Media given to the country beyond the Euphrates, seems not to be more ancient than Medea, or the voyage of Jason to Colchis. See MEDIA.

MAGI, or MAGIANS, an ancient religious sect in Persia, and other eastern countries, who, abominating the adoration of images, worshipped God only by fire, in which they were directly opposite to the Sabæans, or Sabians.

The Magi believed that there were two principles, one the cause of all good, and the other the cause of all evil; and in this opinion they were followed by the sect of the Manichees. See MANICHEANS.

They called the good principle Jazdan and Ormuzd, and the evil principle Ahraman or Aherman. The former was by the Greeks called Oromasdes, and the latter Arimanius. The reason of their worshipping fire, was because they looked upon it as the truest symbol of Oromasdes, or the good god; as darkness was of Arimanius, or the evil god. In all their temples they had fire continually burning upon the altars, and in their own private houses.

The religion of the Magi fell into disgrace on the death of those ringleaders of that sect who had usurped the sovereignty after the death of Cambyses; and the slaughter that was made of the chief men among them sunk it so low, that Sabianism every where prevailed against it; Darius and most of his followers, on that occasion, going over to it. But, the affection which the people had for the religion of their forefathers not being easily to be rooted out, the famous impostor Zoroaster, some ages after, undertook to revive and reform it.

The chief reformation this pretended prophet made in the Magian religion was in its first principle; for he introduced a god superior both to Oromasdes and Arimanius. Dr. Prideaux is of opinion, that Zoroaster took the hint of this alteration in their theology from the prophet Isaiah, who introduces God, saying to Cyrus, king of Persia, 'I am the Lord, and there is none else; I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil.' (Isai. xiv. 7.) In short, Zoroaster held that there was one supreme, independent Being, and under him two principles, or angels, one the angel of light or good, and the other the angel of evil or darkness; that there is a perpetual struggle between them, which shall last till the end of the world; that then the angel of darkness and his disciples shall go into a world of their own, where they shall be punished in everlasting darkness; and the angel of light and his disciples shall also go into a world of their own, where they shall be rewarded in everlasting light.

Zoroaster was the first that built fire-temples; the Magians before his time performing their devotions upon the tops of hills, and in the open air, by which means they were exposed to the inconvenience of rain and tempests, which often extinguished their sacred fires. To procure the greater veneration for these sacred fires, he pretended to have received fire from heaven, which he placed on the altar of the first fire-temple he erected, which was that at Xis in Media, whence they say it was propagated to all the rest. The Magian priests kept their sacred fire with the greatest diligence, watching it day and night, and never suffering it to be extinguished. They fed it only with wood stripped of the bark, and they never blew it with their breath or with bellows, for fear of polluting it: to do either of these was death by their law.

The Magian religion, as reformed by Zoroaster, seems in many things to be built upon the plan of the Jewish. The Jews had their sacred fire, which came down from heaven on the altar of burnt-offerings, which they never suffered to go out, and with which all their sacrifices and oblations were made. Zoroaster, in like manner, pretended to have brought his holy fire from heaven; and as the Jews had a Shechinah of the divine presence among them, resting over the mercy-seat in the Holy of Holies, Zoroaster likewise taught his Magians to look upon the sacred fire in their temples as a Shechinah, in which God especially dwelt. From these and some other instances of analogy between the Jewish and the Magian religion, Prideaux infers that Zoroaster had been first educated and brought up in the Jewish religion.

The priests of the Magi were the most skilful mathematicians and philosophers of the ages in which they lived, inasmuch that a learned man and a Magian became equivalent terms. This proceeded so far, that the vulgar, thinking their knowledge to be more than natural, imagined they were inspired by some supernatural power. And hence those who practised wicked and diabolical arts, taking upon themselves the name of Magians, drew on it that ill signification which the word Magician now bears among us.

The Magian priests were all of one tribe, as among the Jews, none but the son of a priest was capable of bearing that office among them. The royal family among the Persians, as long as this sect subsisted, was always of the sacerdotal tribe. They were divided into three orders; the inferior clergy, the superintendents or bishops, and the archimagus or arch-priest.

Zoroaster had the address to bring over Darius to his newly reformed religion, notwithstanding the strongest opposition of the Sabians; and from that time it became the national religion of all that country, and so continued for many ages after, till it was supplanted by that of Mahomet. A remnant of these Magians still exist in Persia and India under the name of Gaurs. Zoroaster composed a book which contains the principles of the Magian religion, and which is called Zendavesta, and by contradiction Zend. Broughton's Hist. Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 39, 40; Prideaux's Connection, part i. p. 252, &c. 303, &c.

MAGI, wise men who came from the East to adore Jesus Christ at Bethlehem. (Matt. ii. 1.) Many questions have been asked concerning these Magi; as, who they were? whence they came? how many there were? at what time they arrived at Jerusalem? and what was the star which appeared to them?

It is commonly thought that these Magi, or Diviners, belonged to the established priesthood of the Persian, or Parthian empire; persons of the highest rank and consequence in the state. If, according to Theophylact, these Magi were the descendants of Balaam, the celebrated Chaldean diviner, who prophesied of 'the Star to rise out of Jacob, and the Sceptre from Israel,' (Numb. xxiv. 17.) and also of the school of Daniel, the prophet, at Babylon, who was appointed archimagus by Nebuchadnezzar, (Dan. ii. 48.) and foretold the precise time of the coming of 'Messiah the Prince;' (Dan. ix. 25.) we may naturally account for their journey to Jerusalem, their inquiry, their excessive joy on the re-appearance of the star, and their adoration of the divine child. It is truly remarkable, and in perfect conformity with this, that among the first fruits of the Christian church, founded on the day of Pentecost, by another visible appearance of the divine glory, resting on the heads of the apostles, the fore-ground is occupied by Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, from whence the Magi came. (Acts ii. 9.)

Dr. Hales reckons that this journey of the wise men must have required at least three months, since it employed Ezra and his party four months, (Ezra vii. 9.) and that the nativity must have preceded the manifestation of Christ to the Magi above forty days, the time of Mary's purification and presentation of the infant Jesus in the temple. (Luke ii. 22) He thinks, that the star seen by these eastern Magi could not have been an ordinary star or meteor; for when it re-appeared on their way to Bethlehem, 'it conducted them till it came and stood over the house, where the young child was.' (Matt. ii. 9.) It was, probably, he says, the same 'glory of the Lord,' which, on the night of the nativity, shone round about the pious shepherds at Bethlehem, and might therefore have been of a globular form, and which ascended into heaven along with the celestial choir. (Luke ii. 8—15.) It might have been seen in its ascent by the Magi at the distance of five or six hundred miles, diminished to the size of a star or meteor, and rising from the land of Judea, in the south-west quarter of the horizon, an unusual region, which must have strongly attracted their notice and attention. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 180, 181; vol. ii. book ii. pp. 713—715.

MAGICIAN, in Scripture, generally signifies a diviner, a fortune-teller, &c. Moses forbids to consult such on pain of death: (Levit. xix. 31.; xx. 6.) 'The soul that turneth after familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people.' The Hebrew word Ooth and Jedonim signify literally—the first, those possessed with a spirit of Python, or a dæmon that foretels future events; the second, those who boast of the knowledge of secret things. It was such sort of people that Saul extirpated out of the land of Israel. (1 Sam. xxviii. 3.) Daniel also speaks of the magicians and diviners in Chaldæa, under king Nebuchadnezzar, and names four sorts. (Dan. i. 20, &c.)

The inquisitive and superstitious arts exercised by diviners were prohibited among the Israelites. To restrain them from imitating the other Eastern people, all of whom had their diviners, enchanters, and magicians, God sent them prophets, who discovered future events in a sure, clear, and easy manner. On the contrary, the predictions of diviners were always obscure, enigmatical, doubtful, and dangerous, as well in respect of those who consulted them, as of those who were consulted; for the law condemned both parties to death. Pharaoh's magicians counterfeited the miracles of Moses.

MAHOMETANISM.—Name, Life, and Character of its Author.—Mahometanism derives its name from Mahomet, or Mohammed, its author and founder. Mahomet was born at Mecca, a city in Arabia Felix, in A.D. 571. The circumstances which attended his earlier years were such as presented no flattering prospects of grandeur, and no probable views of ambition to his future life. Though descended from the tribe of Koreish, the most honourable of Arabia, and from the noblest family of that tribe, yet distress and poverty were the only portion which he inherited. Soon after he was born, his father, Abdollah, died, when five camels and an Ethiopian female slave comprised the whole of his property, which remained for the support of his widow Amena, and her infant son. When we consider then the point from which he set out, and the height to which he rose; when we contemplate the greatness of that empire, and the extent of that religion, which he founded; our astonishment is excited as well by the splendid talents and the profound artifice of the impostor, as by the blind compliance, and abject credulity, of the multitudes whom he deceived. The education which he received, like that of the rest of his countrymen, was rough and hardy; neither tempered by the elegancies of literature, nor even enlightened by the first and most obvious rudiments of knowledge; but calculated rather to invigorate the powers of the body, than to polish and enlarge the mind. But, graceful in his person, easy and insinuating in his manners, and endowed with a greatness of mind, which could brave the storms of adversity, and rise superior to the disadvantages of an illiterate education, he was in possession of accomplishments more valuable in themselves, and capable of producing more illustrious effects, than all that the influence of wealth, or the authority of hereditary power could have bestowed.

But if Mahomet, deprived of the usual means of cultivation and improvement, was, during the earlier years of his life, left solely to the guidance of untutored nature; he, at a more advanced age, enjoyed the most favourable opportunities of acquiring a species of information far more conducive to the success of his subsequent designs, than the maxims of science, or the refinements of philosophy; the knowledge, I mean, of men and manners. Surrounded by a rough and barren territory, which denied to its inhabitants even the necessities of life, the people of Mecca, like the Ishmaelites their forefathers, depended principally on commerce for support. Thus urged by the call of unavoidable necessity, and favoured by a situation peculiarly advantageous to such pursuits, they carried on a constant and extensive intercourse with Persia, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. In these employments Mahomet was early initiated by his uncle Abu-Taleb, to whose care he had been left by his father; and during his travels into the neighbouring nations, besides the general improvement and cultivation of his mind, he collected those particular observations which afterwards induced him to form, and acquired that knowledge which enabled him to execute, his daring and ambitious designs.

Whilst engaged in the occupations of commerce, and discharging with zeal and fidelity the humble duties of servitude, his strong and active genius already rose above the meanness and obscurity of his station; and, from a well-grounded confidence in its own powers, inspired him with an opinion, that he was born to move in a higher and more illustrious sphere. But, when a sudden and unexpected change of fortune had raised him from poverty and dependence to opulence and ease, this opinion returned with augmented force; and he now began to meditate seriously on the means of realizing those ideas, which had hitherto proceeded rather from the warmth of imagination, than from the deliberate dictates of reason, or even the impulses of serious and habitual hope. In the 25th year of his age, he was raised to an equality with the richest citizens of Mecca, by his alliance with Khadijah, or Cadigha, an opulent widow of that city, whose mercantile affairs he had conducted in Syria for some years, so much to her satisfaction, that she advanced him from the rank of a servant to be the partner of her bed. This event may justly be considered as the foundation of all the future fortune of Mahomet.

From this period to the time when he announced his mission as the prophet of the Most High, history has recorded nothing of consequence concerning his actions and pursuits. Fifteen years of his life are involved in the deepest and most impenetrable obscurity. It was doubtless in this retirement, that the artful impostor drew the general outlines, and adjusted the several particulars, of that great and hazardous project, which was hereafter to raise him to glory and dominion. At the time when Mahomet travelled into the neighbouring nations, the internal distractions of Persia on the one side, and the notorious weakness of the Roman provinces on the other, together with the universal corruption of manners that prevailed amongst the inhabitants of both, were indications, too strong to be overlooked, of the approaching ruin of those mighty and unwieldy empires. But it is probable, that the state of religion was the grand and principal object which attracted his attention, and employed his reflections. An acquaintance with the Jewish and Christian doctrines must have convinced him of the absurdity of that impious idolatry in which he had been educated.

He beheld the Jews, despised and detested by all men, still obstinately refusing to mix with the rest of mankind, and adhering with unshaken attachment to the law of Moses; whilst the Christians, divided in their faith, and degenerate in their practice, had miserably perverted the spirit of their religion, and, forgetting the union and love which it prescribed, were denouncing anathemas against each other. Hence it was, that, with a boldness of design, exceeded only by the cunning that conducted it, he meditated a religion, which, by flattering the corrupt passions and prejudices of each, might embrace, in its ample and comprehensive law, the Christian, the Idolater, and the Jew. The plan was great, and the execution arduous; but the wily impostor facilitated its success by laying the foundation of his whole system on one plain and obvious principle, the belief of one only supreme God. To this he superadded the obligation of believing in him, as the inspired prophet and messenger of the Almighty. He artfully selected from the Jewish and Christian morality those parts which seemed best adapted to the sentiments and manners of the inhabitants of the warmer climates in particular; blending them at the same time with the popular traditions, and the ruling opinions of his idolatrous countrymen. He alleged, with much plausibility, that God had originally given one grand and universal religion to all the sons of men; that, when the cares and avocations of life had obliterated, or the frailty or perverseness of human nature had corrupted this faith, it had pleased the Almighty, in his mercy, to send forth successive prophets to instruct and reform mankind, ever prone to wander from the plain and simple paths of truth. Such, among many others, whom his own creative imagination raised up and dignified with the prophetic office, was Moses, whose mission was, by the particular designation of Providence, confined within the narrow limits of one people. Such, too, was Jesus, whose more liberal and comprehensive system proceeded from a fuller and more perfect exertion of Divine goodness, and was destined to confer its benefits, without distinction, on all the widely-extended race of mankind. Since time, however, had unhappily corrupted the doctrines of Christianity itself, and left men once more to wander in darkness and in error, it had at length pleased the Almighty to elect him as the instrument of his gracious designs; to commission him to rescue religion from the corruptions which obscured its native splendour; and to place him above Jesus himself, by making him the last great restorer of truth and virtue to the world.

When the time which he had chosen to announce his mission approached, being now in his fortieth year; when the night which was to cover him with glory, according to the expression of Abulfeda, was at length arrived; he withdrew in silence to the solitary cave, which had been the usual place of his retirement. Here he pretended the Divine commands were first communicated to him with the most awful solemnity; and here he received his great commission as the prophet and apostle of God, by the hands of Gabriel, the glorious messenger of the Most High. The first efforts of the impostor were confined to the conversion of his own wife and household; and having succeeded thus far, he pretended to receive more frequent communications of the Divine will, and proceeded, for the space of three years, by every species of artifice, and by the force of superior talents, to gain over to his party some of the most powerful inhabitants of Mecca. His pretensions were, indeed, at first, both by Jews and Christians, rejected with disdain; and the rulers of the city endeavoured to impede his progress, first by severe and repeated menaces, and at length by actual violence. Even the multitude, on his first public appearance in the character of a prophet, ridiculed his pretensions, and insulted him with the odious appellations of a magician and an impostor. But, in defiance of all opposition, the manly and persuasive eloquence, the consummate policy, and the alluring doctrines of the new prophet, daily augmented the number of his disciples. Compelled, however, at length, to escape, by a precipitate flight, the last desperate effort of his exasperated foes, he found a secure and advantageous retreat in Medina, whither his reputation had already reached. Here, by an exertion of the same diligence, and by the practice of the same artifice, he soon found himself enabled to collect a considerable number of followers, whose belief in his mission was firmly established, and whose zeal for the propagation of his religion, and the support of his character as a prophet, was too strong to be shaken by any threats of danger, or of death.

With increasing power, the impatience and the ambition of the impostor also increased. The view of empire seems now to have opened more fully and clearly upon him; and he now pretended to have received the Divine command to unsheath the sword of the Almighty, and to subdue, by the violence of arms, those who had been obstinately deaf to the voice of persuasion. Hitherto, he had acted the darker and more disguised part of the crafty deceiver, and the profound politician; but, without neglecting these arts, he now began to assume also another character, and to display the more splendid talents of a commander and a hero. The first actions, however, with which he began his military career, resemble the irregular exploits of the robber, more than the systematical operations of the warrior: but, enriched by the spoils, and aggrandized by the fame of his successes, he was soon enabled to engage in attempts of greater and more extensive importance. Towards those whom his arms had conquered, his conduct was different under different circumstances: according as interest required, or policy directed, we behold it now distinguished by an ostentation of the most heroic clemency, and now stained with all the excesses of ferocious cruelty.

To the sagacious statesman, and even to the candid philosopher, Mahomet has sometimes appeared rather severe from policy, than cruel by nature. But this apology, in the view of unprejudiced reason and of genuine philanthropy, surely aggravates the guilt which it is meant to extenuate. For the necessity which usurpation creates, the usurper is always responsible. This argument alleged in favour of Mahomet amounts to a full and decisive proof, that Mahometanism itself could not have been established without violence. We readily admit the fact; and we are justified in drawing from it such conclusions as are most dishonourable to the genius of the religion itself, and to the character of its author.

We now pass on to another striking feature in the character of Mahomet. During his earlier years, indeed, every measure seems to have been dictated, and every inferior consideration utterly absorbed, by an unvaried attention to the pursuits and the interests of ambition. The nature of his undertaking, particularly in its first stages, required no common degree of prudence and caution. But no sooner was his reputation as a prophet established; no sooner was his authority rooted too firmly to be shaken by any common or ordinary event, and his ambition in some measure satiated by the possession of power, than another passion arose, and, shaking off the restraint which had hitherto suppressed it, with a violence equally arbitrary, now hurried him away into the wildest extravagancies. Whilst the wretched victims of his power were sacrificed to his cruelty or his policy, a still severer fate awaited the female captive, who was compelled to submit to the base and inordinate desires of a barbarian conqueror, and was forced into those arms which were stained with the recent slaughter of a friend, a brother, or a parent. It is sufficient to observe, in general, that the retirements of Mahomet, from his acquisition of power to his last decline of life, were continually disgraced by every excessive indulgence of that passion, which has a more particular tendency to degrade the dignity of the human character, even below the brute creation. The laws which he prescribed for the regulation of his disciples were too loose for the most compliant moralist to justify, and too favourable to afford the most abandoned sensualist any probable ground of complaint. But the boundless lust of Mahomet disdained to be confined even within the extensive limits which he had drawn for his followers. The impostor limited his followers to the number of four wives, whilst he himself, according to Abulfeda, had no less than fifteen, besides concubines. But this, it seems, was a particular privilege, founded on the express words of God himself: 'O prophet, we have allowed thee thy wives, unto whom thou hast given their dower, and also the slaves which thy right hand possesseth, of the booty which God hath granted thee; and the daughters of thy uncles, and the daughters of thy aunts, both on thy father's side, and on thy mother's side, who have fled with thee from Mecca; and any other believing woman, if she give herself unto the prophet, in case the prophet desireth to take her to wife. This is a peculiar privilege granted unto thee, above the rest of the true believers.'

Here we behold the God of purity himself introduced to sanctify and approve the sensual immoralities of his prophet, and to silence the murmurs of his profane or short-sighted followers, who had been weak enough to imagine that the same laws, which were obligatory on the vulgar, likewise extended their sanction to the sacred and venerable character of the apostle! In another place, he makes the God of Truth an abettor of the greatest falsehood, and says, that he had received from God a dispensation for perjury. 'God hath allowed you a dissolution of your oaths.'

But from every view of the life of Mahomet, and even from the partial representations of his zealous and infatuated followers, it is evident, that ambition and lust were the passions which divided the empire of his breast. From the separate or united influence of these powerful principles, it would not be difficult to trace almost every great design, and every important action of his life. There is no stronger or more infallible criterion of truth and falsehood, than consistency: for nothing is permanent but truth, and nothing consistent but sincerity. So far was the character of Mahomet from being consistent, that it is ever found to vary with his situation. Thus, till they could be indulged without shame and without danger, we behold him compelling his lustful passions, even in the earliest periods of life, when their influence is most powerful, to bend to the dictates of policy and the views of ambition. Thus, as interest required, he now flattered the pride of the Jews, and now appealed to the prejudices of the Arabs; now selecting the temple of Jerusalem, and now that of Mecca, as the Kibla, the hallowed spot, towards which the worship and the prayers of his followers should be directed. Thus, too, at the commencement of his imposture, we find him humble and yielding, labouring only by the powers of eloquence, and by the softer arts of insinuation, to captivate the affections of his countrymen: but in its more advanced state, we behold on a sudden the preacher, by divine command, transformed into the warrior; we see his steps every where marked with blood and desolation; and we hear him, with the stern and ferocious aspect of a conqueror, proposing death or conversion as the only alternative to his subject foes.

But of the various disguises under which Mahomet attempted to veil the mysterious plan of his imposture, none was more artful in its design, or more successful in its event, than that profound ignorance, and total want of every kind of literature, to which he constantly pretended. On this was founded his most popular and prevailing argument for the truth of that revelation which he professed to communicate to the world. The elegant style of that revelation, as contained in the Koran, the harmony of its sentences, and the sublimity of its conceptions, were generally acknowledged. Was it not then absurd to imagine (as the impostor speciously argued, and as his followers argue to this day,) that a work of such extraordinary beauty and excellence could ever have been composed by a man who was destitute of every species of acquired knowledge, and who, by his ignorance, even of the common rudiments of early education, had been precluded from the perusal of books, and the use of writing? That the ignorance of Mahomet, however, was not real, but pretended, might have been reasonably suspected. It might also have been inferred from proofs of a more direct and positive nature. Even by the confession of his own historians, there were moments in which his pretended ignorance was forgotten; and he not only expressed a desire to exercise, but actually practised, that very art, of which he solemnly and repeatedly professed himself to be totally ignorant.

It must be admitted by all parties, that vast were the schemes which Mahomet formed, and that great were the revolutions which he effected, both in the religion and the government of his country. With such vigour and intrepidity were his plans executed, and with so great success were his adventurous efforts crowned, that he not only became the founder of a new system of religion, but lived to behold himself master of all Arabia, besides several adjacent countries. After his death, which happened A.D. 632, his followers, led on by the same intrepidity, and actuated by the same fanatical fury, extended their new religion far beyond the limits of Arabia, and subdued Syria, Persia, Egypt, and other countries under their dominion. It is a lamentable fact, that the great body of Greek and Eastern Christians have felt the weight of the iron yoke imposed by this victorious sect, in a greater or less degree, from the seventh century to the present day. The Saracens also made inroads into the Greek empire, and carried their victorious arms into Media, Chaldaea, India, and Tartary. They held Spain from A.D. 714 till the beginning of the sixteenth century; but they were driven out of France in 726. They infested Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Majorca, and Crete; founded in Africa the kingdoms of Fez, Morocco, and Algiers; and, under Mahomet II., became masters of Constantinople in 1453. The success of their arms was every where attended with the propagation of Mahometanism; and the professors of this religion have long been called Saracens, Turks, Tartars, Moors, &c. from their respective countries.

Distinguishing Doctrines, or of the Koran and its contents.—When a great part of the life of Mahomet had been spent in preparatory meditation on the system he was about to establish, the chapters of the Alcoran or Koran, which was to contain the rule of the faith and practice of his followers, were dealt out slowly and separately during the long period of three-and-twenty years. He entrusted his beloved wife Kaphsa, the daughter of Omar, with the keeping of the ‘chest of his apostleship,’ in which were laid up all the originals of the revelations he pretended to have received by the ministration of the angel Gabriel, and out of which the Koran, consisting of 114 Surats or chapters, of very unequal length, was composed after his death.

Yet, defective in its structure, and not less exceptionable in its doctrines and precepts, was the work which he thus delivered to his followers as the oracles of God. We will not detract from the real merit of the Koran; we allow it to be generally elegant, and often sublime; but at the same time we reject with disdain its arrogant pretensions to any thing supernatural. Nay, if, descending to a minute investigation of it, we consider its perpetual inconsistency and absurdity, we shall indeed have cause for astonishment at that weakness of humanity, which could ever have received such compositions as the work of the Deity, and which could still hold it in such admiration as it is held by the followers of Mahomet, to the present day. Far from supporting its arrogant claim to a supernatural work, it sinks below the level of many compositions confessedly of human original; and still lower does it fall in our estimation, when compared with that pure and perfect pattern which we justly admire in the Scriptures of Truth. The first praise of all the productions of genius is invention; but the Koran bears little impression of this transcendent character. It does not contain one single doctrine which may not fairly be derived either from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, from the spurious and apocryphal Gospels, then current in the East, from the Talmudical legends, or from the traditions, customs, and opinions of the Arabians. And the materials collected from these several sources are here heaped together, with perpetual and needless repetitions, without any settled principle, or visible connexion. The most prominent feature of the Koran, that point of excellence in which the partiality of its admirers has ever delighted to view it, is the sublime notion it generally impresses of the nature and attributes of God. But if its author had really derived these just conceptions from the inspiration of that Being, whom they attempt to describe, they would not have been surrounded, as they now are on every side, with error and absurdity. By attempting to explain what is inconceivable, to describe what is ineffable, and to materialize what in itself is spiritual, he absurdly and impiously aimed to sensualize the purity of the divine essence. But it might easily be proved, that whatever the Koran justly defines of the divine attributes, was borrowed from our holy Scriptures; which, even from their first promulgation, but especially from the completion of the New Testament, have extended the views, and enlightened the understandings of mankind.

The Koran, indeed, every where inculcates that grand and fundamental doctrine of the unity of the Supreme Being, the establishment of which was constantly alleged by the impostor as the primary cause of his pretended mission; but on the subject of the Christian Trinity its author seems to have entertained very gross and mistaken ideas, and to have been totally ignorant of the perfect consistence of that opinion with the unity of the Deity. With respect to the great doctrine of a future life, and the condition of the soul after its departure from the body, it must indeed be acknowledged, that the prophet of Arabia has presented us with a nearer prospect of the invisible world, and disclosed to us a thousand particulars concerning it, which the Holy Scriptures had wrapped in the most profound and mysterious silence. But in his various representations of another life, he generally descends to an unnecessary minuteness and particularity, which excite disgust and ridicule, instead of reverence. He constantly pretended to have received these stupendous secrets, by the ministry of the angel Gabriel, from that eternal book, in which the divine decrees have been written by the finger of the Almighty, from the foundation of the world: but the learned inquirer will discover a more accessible, and a far more probable source whence they might be derived, partly in the wild and fanciful opinions of the ancient Arabs, and chiefly in those exhaustless stores of marvellous and improbable fiction, the works of the Rabbins. Hence that romantic fable of the Angel of Death, whose peculiar office it is, at the destined hour, to dissolve the union betwixt soul and body, and to free the departing spirit from its prison of flesh. Hence, too, the various descriptions of the general resurrection and final judgment, with which the Koran every where abounds; and hence the vast, but ideal balance, in which the actions of all mankind shall then be impartially weighed, and their eternal doom be assigned them, either in the regions of bliss or misery, according as their good or evil deeds shall preponderate. Here, too, may be traced the grand and original outlines of that sensual Paradise, and those luxurious enjoyments, which were so successfully employed in the Koran, to gratify the ardent genius of the Arabs, and allure them to the standard of the prophet.

The same observation, which has been applied with respect to the sources whence the doctrines were drawn, may, with some few limitations, be likewise extended to the precepts which the Arabian legislator has enjoined. That the Koran, amidst a various and confused heap of ridiculous, and even immoral precepts, contains many interesting and instructive lessons of morality, cannot with truth be denied. Of these, however, the merit is to be ascribed not to the feeble imitation, but to the great and perfect original from which they were manifestly drawn. Instead of improving on the Christian precepts by a superior degree of refinement; instead of exhibiting a purer and more perfect system of morals than that of the Gospel; the prophet of Arabia has miserably debased and weakened even what he has borrowed from that system. We are told by our Saviour, that a man is to be the husband of one wife, and that there is to be an inseparable union between them. By Mahomet's confession, Jesus Christ was a prophet of the true God, and the Holy Spirit was with him. Yet in the Koran we find a permit for any person to have four wives, and as many concubines as he can maintain. Again, our Saviour expressly tells us, that at the resurrection, 'They will neither marry nor be given in marriage; but be like the angels of God in heaven.' We are informed also by St. Paul, that we shall be changed, and have a spiritual and glorified body: 'for flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven; neither can corruption inherit incorruption.' But Mahomet gives a very different account; it is clear, from his own confession, that the happiness, promised in the Koran, consists in base and corporeal enjoyments. According to its author, there will not only be marriage, but also servitude in the next world. The very meanest in Paradise will have eighty thousand servants, and seventy-two wives of the girls of Paradise, besides the wives he had in this world: he will also have a tent erected for him, of pearls, hyacinths, and emeralds. And as marriage will take place, so a new race will be introduced in heaven; for, says the Koran, 'If any of the faithful in Paradise be desirous of issue, it shall be conceived, born, and grown up, in the space of an hour.' But on the contradictions in point of doctrine, though sufficient of themselves to confute the pretensions of Mahomet, I forbear to insist. They were perhaps intentional, and adopted in order to promote more effectually the plans of interest and ambition, which he had concerted.

The impure designs which gave birth to the whole system, may be traced in almost every subordinate part; even its sublimest descriptions of the Deity, even its most exalted moral precepts, not unfrequently, either terminate in, or are interwoven with, some provision to gratify the inordinate cravings of ambition, or some licence for the indulgence of the corrupt passions of the human heart. It has allowed private revenge, in the case of murder; it has given a sanction to fornication; and, if any weight be due to the example of its author, it has justified adultery. It has made war, and rapine, and bloodshed, provided they be exercised against unbelievers, not only meritorious acts, but even essential duties to the good Mussulman; duties by the performance of which he may secure the constant favour and protection of God and his prophet in this life, and in the next entitle himself to the boundless joys of Paradise. In the Koran are advanced the following assertions among others already noticed:—That both Jews and Christians are idolaters; that the patriarchs and apostles were Mahometans; that the angels worshipped Adam, and that the fallen angels were driven from heaven for not doing so; that our blessed Saviour was neither God, nor the Son of God; and that he assured Mahomet of this, in a conference with the Almighty and him; yet that he was both the Word and the Spirit of God: not to mention numberless absurdities concerning the Creation, the Deluge, the End of the World, the Resurrection, and the Day of Judgment, too gross to be received by any except the most debased understandings.

The two leading articles in the creed of this denomination of religionists, are—the unity of God, and the acknowledgment of Mahomet as his prophet; and in a catechism said to have been lately printed at Constantinople, some further particulars are added, and the principal articles to which the young Mussulman is there required to give his assent, are comprised in the following declarations: ‘I believe in the books which have been delivered from heaven to the prophets. In this manner was the Koran given to Mahomet, the Pentateuch to Moses, the Psalter to David, and the Gospel to Jesus. I believe in the prophets, and the miracles which they have performed. Adam was the first prophet, and Mahomet was the last. I believe that, for the space of fifty thousand years, the righteous shall repose under the shade of the terrestrial Paradise; and the wicked shall be exposed naked to the burning rays of the sun. I believe in the bridge Sirat, which passes over the bottomless pit of hell. It is as fine as a hair, and as sharp as a sabre. All must pass over it; and the wicked shall be thrown off. I believe in the water-pools of Paradise. Each of the prophets has, in Paradise, a basin for his own use: the water is whiter than milk, and sweeter than honey. On the ridges of the pools are vessels to drink out of, and they are bordered with stars. I believe in heaven and hell. The inhabitants of the former know no want, and the Houris who attend them are never afflicted with sickness. The floor of Paradise is musk, the stones are silver, and the cement gold. The damned are, on the contrary, tormented with fire, and by voracious and poisonous animals.’ What a farrago of truth and falsehood! and how much does the latter preponderate!

Worship, Rites, Ceremonies, &c.—It was frequently the triumphant boast of St. Paul, that the Gospel of Jesus Christ had for ever freed mankind from the intolerable burden of ceremonial observances. But the Koran renews and perpetuates the slavery, by prescribing to its votaries a ritual still more oppressive, and entangling them again in a yoke of bondage yet more severe than that of the law. Of this kind, amidst a variety of instances, is that great and meritorious act of Mahometan devotion, the pilgrimage to the holy city of Mecca; an act which the Koran has enjoined, and the pious Mussulman implicitly performs, as necessary to the obtaining pardon of his sins, and qualifying him to be a partaker of the alluring pleasures and exquisite enjoyments of Paradise. To the several articles of faith, to which all his followers were to adhere, Mahomet added four fundamental points of religious practice, namely, Prayer five times a day, Fasting, Alms-giving, and the Pilgrimage to Mecca. Under the first of these are comprehended those frequent washings or purifications which he prescribed as necessary preparations for the duty of prayer. So necessary did he think them, that he is said to have declared, that ‘the practice of religion is founded upon cleanliness, which is one half of faith, and the key of prayer.’ The second of these he conceived to be a duty of so great moment, that he used to say it was the gate of religion, and that ‘the odour of the mouth of him who fasteth is more grateful to God, than that of musk.’ The third is looked upon as so pleasing in the sight of God, that the Caliph Omar Ebn Abdalaziz used to say: ‘Prayer carries us half way to God; fasting brings us to the door of his palace; and alms procures us admission.’ The last of these practical religious duties is deemed so necessary, that, according to a tradition of Mahomet, he, who dies without performing it, ‘may as well die a Jew or a Christian.’ As to the negative precepts and institutions of this religion, the Mahometans are forbidden the use of wine, and are prohibited from gaming, usury, and the eating of blood and swine’s flesh, and whatever dies of itself, or is strangled, or killed by a blow, or by another beast. They are said, however, to comply with the prohibition of gaming (from which chess seems to be excepted), much better than they do with that of wine, under which all strong and inebriating liquors are included; for both the Persians and Turks are in the habit of drinking freely.

Sects.—However successful and triumphant from without, the progress of the followers of Mahomet received a considerable check by the civil dissensions which arose among themselves soon after his death. Abubeker and Ali, the former the father-in-law, the latter the son-in-law, of this pretended prophet, both aspired to succeed him in the empire which he had erected. Upon this arose a cruel and tedious contest, whose flames produced that schism which divided the Mahometans into two great factions: and this separation not only gave rise to a variety of opinions and rites, but also excited the most implacable hatred, and the most deadly animosities, which have been continued to the present day. With such furious zeal is this contention still carried on between these two factions, who are distinguished by the name of Sonrites and Schrites, that each party detest and anathematize the other as abominable heretics, and farther from the truth than either the Christians or the Jews. The chief points in which they differ are : 1. The Shiites reject Abubeker, Omar, and Othman, the first three Caliphs, as usurpers and intruders; but the Sunnites acknowledge and respect them as rightful Caliphs or Imâms. 2. The Shiites prefer Ali to Mahomet, or, at least, esteem them both equal; but the Sunnites admit neither Ali, nor any of the prophets, to be equal to Mahomet. 3. The Sunnites charge the Shiites with corrupting the Koran, and neglecting its precepts; and the Shiites retort the same charge on the Sunnites. 4. The Sunnites receive the Sonna, or book of traditions of their prophet, as of canonical authority; but the Shiites reject it as apocryphal, and unworthy of credit.

The Sunnites are subdivided into four chief sects, of which the first is, that of the Hanefites, who generally prevail among the Turks and Tartars; the second, that of the Malecites, whose doctrine is chiefly followed in Barbary, and other parts of Africa; the third, that of the Shâfeites, who are chiefly confined to Arabia and Persia; and the fourth orthodox sect is that of the Hanbalites, who are not very numerous, and are seldom to be met with out of the limits of Arabia. The heretical sects among the Mahometans are those which are counted to hold heterodox opinions in fundamentals, or matters of faith; and they are variously compounded and decompounded of the opinions of the four chief sects; the Môtazalites, the Safâtians, the Khârejites, and the Shiites.

Countries where found, Numbers, &c.—It is a matter of serious regret, that Mahometanism exceeds Christianity in extent of territory, and is little short of the latter in the number of its professors. The Mahometan religion is established in, or prevails throughout, the Turkish dominions in Europe, Asia, and Africa, namely, Romania, Bulgaria, Greece, Candia, Cyprus, Natolia, Syria, part of Armenia, Egypt, &c.; the Barbary states, namely, Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, Fez, &c.; Africa Interior, namely, Fezzan, Tombuctoo, Kassina, Bornou, Darfour, Nubia, &c.; the Eastern coast of Africa, and the island of Madagascar, namely, Adel, Zanguebar, Mozambique, Sofala, &c.; Arabia; the Persian states, namely Persia, Korasan, and part of Armenia; the Russian States, of Little Tartary, Astrakan, Kazan, Kirghis, Kazaks, Kolhyvane, &c.; the Independent Tartars, namely, those of Turkestan, Bucharia, Balk, Karasm, the Usbees, &c.; Hindustan; the Eastern Islands of Malaya, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Celebes, Mindanao, Luzon, &c. It has likewise made many proselytes in various other countries, as in China, &c. The number of those professing the Mahometan religion has been calculated to amount to about 140,000,000.

Comparison between Christ and Mahomet.—The authors or founders of the Christian and Mahometan religions are thus compared by a distinguished and eloquent divine: "Go to your natural religion; Lay before her Mahomet and his disciples arrayed in armour and in blood, riding in triumph over the spoils of thousands and tens of thousands, who fell by the victorious sword: show her the cities which he set in flames, the countries which he ravaged and destroyed, and the miserable distress of all the inhabitants of the earth. When she has viewed him in this scene, carry her into his retirements; show her the prophet's chamber, his concubines and wives; let her see his adultery, and hear him allege revelation, and his divine commission, to justify his lust and his oppression. When she is tired with this prospect, then show her the blessed Jesus, humble and meek, doing good to all the sons of men, patiently instructing both the ignorant and the perverse. Let her see him in his most retired privacies: let her follow him to the Mount, and hear his devotions and supplications to God. Carry her to his table to view his poor fare, and hear his heavenly discourse. Let her see him injured, but not provoked. Let her attend him to the tribunal, and consider the patience with which he endured the scoffs and reproaches of his enemies. Lead her to his cross, and let her view him in the agony of death, and hear his last prayer for his persecutors,—'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' When natural religion has viewed both, ask, which is the prophet of God? But her answer we have already had, when she saw part of this scene through the eyes of the centurion who attended at the cross; by him she spoke and said, 'Truly this man was the Son of God.'" Bishop Sherlock's Sermons, vol. i. serm. ix. ad fin.; White's Sermons at Bampton Lectures; Adam's Religious World, vol. i. pp. 217—289.

MAL/ACHI, מלאכי, ἄγγελος, signifies my angel, or my ambassador or envoy. Malachi was the last of the Jewish prophets, and whose restoration of the Jewish polity, and final reform, he appears to have contributed the weight of his exhortations. 1. He reproves the priests and the people for sacrificing 'polluted bread offerings,' and the refuse of their cattle, 'the torn, and the lame, and the sick;' and he foretells that pure offering, the Lord's Supper, to be presented to the Lord by the Gentiles, from the rising to the setting sun. (Mal. i. 6—14.) 2. He denounces a curse or judgment against the priests, for not instructing the people in the law, but causing them to stumble at the law; and for being partial in their decisions in favour of the rich against the poor. (Mal. ii. 1—10.) 3. He censures the intermarriages of the Jews with idolatresses, 'the daughters of a strange god;' the divorces of their lawful wives, 'dealing unfaithfully every man against his brother,' by putting away his daughter, and 'covering with the tears of the divorced wives 'the altar of the Lord;' and he warns them 'not to deal unfaithfully with the wife of their youth.' (Mal. ii. 11—16.) 4. He censures them for their wickedness, and for supposing that God would not mind nor judge it. (Mal. ii. 17.; iii. 14.) 5. He taxes them with robbing God of their tithes and offerings; and he recommends them to bring the tithes into the storehouse of the temple, and that they should be blessed with abundant plenty. (Mal. iii. 8—12.) 6. He foretells the coming of Christ, and his harbinger John the Baptist, to refine and purify the sons of Levi, the priests, and to smite the land with a curse, unless they all repented; and the final conversion of the Jews. The great and terrible day of the Lord (Mal. iv. 5.) was the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, A.D. 70; and with this awful prophecy of the Roman captivity, the prophetic canon of the Old Testament closes.

According to Kennicott, Malachi flourished about four hundred and twenty years before Christ; which sufficiently accords with the description of Josephus, and the varying accounts of chronologers. This prophet lived in the decline of the Hebrew poetry, which greatly degenerated after the return from the Babylonian captivity; but his writings are by no means destitute of force or elegance, and he may justly be considered as occupying a middle place among the minor prophets. Dr. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 530—533; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 131.

MAN'AHM, מנחם, signifies comforter; or, he that conducts them; or, preparation of heat. Manahem, or Menahem, was the sixteenth king of Israel, and son of Gadi. He revenged the death of his master Zachariah, by that of Shallum, son of Jabesh, who had usurped the crown of Israel, in the year of the world 3232. (2 Kings xv. 13, &c.) Manahem, general of the army of Zachariah, was at Tirzah, when he received news of his master's death. He immediately marched against Shallum, who had shut himself up in Samaria, killed him, and reigned in his stead. He returned to Tirzah, but that city shutting its gates against him, he vented his passion on Tipshah, a town in the neighbourhood of Tirzah, and probably a sharer in its resolution. Afterwards he took Tirzah, ruined it entirely, and exercised many barbarities in it. He reigned in Samaria ten years, and did evil in the sight of the Lord.

Pul, king of Assyria, probably the father of Sardanapalus, having invaded Israel during the reign of Manahem, this prince was obliged to pay him a thousand talents. To raise this sum, Manahem was forced to tax all persons fifty shekels a head; after which Pul returned into his own country. Hosea says (v. 13,) 'Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb.' But the Scripture seems to insinuate, that the king of Assyria came into the country as an enemy (1 Chron. v. 26.): 'and the God of Israel stirred up the spirit of Pul, king of Assyria,' &c. Josephus also thinks the same. This is easily reconciled, by supposing, that, at first Pul invaded Israel as an enemy, but that Manahem bought him over to his interest by this great sum. Manahem slept with his fathers, and his son Pekahiah reigned in his stead. (2 Kings xv. 22.)

MANAS'SEH, מנשה, signifies forgetfulness, or, he that is forgotten. MANASSEH was the eldest son of Joseph, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob, (Gen. xli. 50, 51.) and was born in the year of the world 2290, before Christ 1714. The name Manasseh signifies forgetfulness; because Joseph said, 'God has made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house.' When Jacob was going to die, Joseph brought his two sons to him that his father might give them his last blessing. (Gen. xlviii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Jacob, having seen them, adopted them; made them come to his bed-side, and kissed them. Joseph having placed Ephraim at Jacob's left hand, and Manasseh at his right, Jacob put his right hand on Ephraim, and his left on Manasseh; which Joseph observing, would have had him alter this disposition. But Jacob told him, 'I know what I am doing, my son, the eldest shall be father of a great people, but his younger brother shall be greater than he.' He continued to bless them, and said, 'In thee shall Israel be blessed, and it shall be said, God make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh.'

The tribe of Manasseh came out of Egypt, in number 32,200 men, upwards of twenty years old, under the conduct of Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur. (Numb. ii. 20, 21.) This tribe was divided in the Land of Promise. One half tribe of Manasseh settled beyond the river Jordan, and possessed the country of Bashan; from the river Jabbok to Mount Libanus; and the other half tribe of Manasseh settled on this side Jordan, and possessed the country between the tribe of Ephraim south, and the tribe of Issachar north, having the river Jordan east, and the Mediterranean Sea west. (Josh. xvi. xvii.)

MANASSEH, the fifteenth king of Judah, and son and successor of Hezekiah, was twelve years old when he began to reign, and reigned fifty-five years, (2 Kings xx. 21; xxi. 1, 2. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1, 2, &c.) His mother's name was Hephzibah. He did evil in the sight of the Lord; worshipped the idols of the land of Canaan; rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had destroyed; set up altars to Baal; and planted groves to false gods. He raised altars to the whole host of heaven, in the courts of God's house; made his son pass through the fire in honour to Moloch; was addicted to magic, divinations, auguries, and other superstitions; set up the idol Astarte in the house of God: finally, he involved his people in all the abominations of the idolatrous nations to that degree, that Israel committed more wickedness than the Canaanites whom the Lord had driven out before them. To all these crimes Manasseh added cruelty; and he shed rivers of innocent blood in Jerusalem.

The Lord being provoked by so many crimes, threatened him by his prophets: 'I will blot out Jerusalem as a writing is blotted out of a writing-tablet, and I shall often draw the pen over and over, that nothing may remain of it. I shall forsake my inheritance,' &c.

It is believed, that the prophet Isaiah raised his voice loudly against these enormities. This prophet was father-in-law to the king; had been in great credit at court in the reign of Hezekiah; and was of high birth, being of the blood royal. He thought it incumbent on him to endeavour to reclaim the king; but this so exasperated him, that he caused Isaiah to be apprehended, and put him to death, by sawing him in two with a wooden saw.

The calamities which God had threatened began towards the twenty-second year of this impious prince. The king of Assyria sent his army against him, who, seizing him among the briers and brambles where he was hid, fettered his hands and feet, and carried him to Babylon. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, 12, &c.) It was probably Sargon or Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, who sent Tartan into Palestine, and who, taking Azoth, attacked Manasseh, put him irons, and led him away, not to Nineveh, but to Babylon, of which Esar-haddon had become master, and had reunited the empires of the Assyrians and the Chaldeans.

Manasseh, in bonds at Babylon, humbled himself before God, who heard his prayers, and brought him back to Jerusalem; and Manasseh acknowledged the hand of the Lord. Manasseh was probably delivered out of prison by Saosduchin, the successor of Esar-haddon. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 13, 14, &c.) Being returned to Jerusalem, he restored the worship of the Lord; broke down the altars of the false gods; abolished all traces of their idolatrous worship; but he did not destroy the high places; which is the only thing Scripture reproaches him with, after his return from Babylon. He caused Jerusalem to be fortified; and he enclosed with a wall another city, which in his time was erected west of Jerusalem, and which goes by the name of the second city, since his reign. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14.) He put garrisons into all the strong places of Judah.

Manasseh died at Jerusalem, and was buried in the garden of his house, the garden of Uzza. (2 Kings xxi. 18.) He was succeeded by his son Amon, in the year of the world 3361.

MANDRAKES. Very great are the difficulties of interpreters on the plant intended by the Hebrew word dudaim, which has been translated mandrakes. Some have rendered the word lilies, some jessamine, some citrons, some mushrooms, some figs, and some think that it means flowers, or fine flowers in general. Hasselquist imagines, that the plant is intended which is commonly called mandrakes, which both among the Greeks and Orientals was held in high repute as being of a prolific virtue, and helping conception, and from which philtres, or love-potions were made.

A late writer supposes the dudaim to be melons. 'The word,' he observes, 'signifies the breast of a woman; and there is a species of melon so called in Persia at this day, nearly the figure of the coloquintida, colour mingled red and yellow, and of a very agreeable odour. The Syrians, Egyptians, and Persians, call it shemama, that is woman's breast; and possibly this alludes also to the fulness of the maternal breast, as amma may be allied to the Hebrew sem or shem, aromatics, sweet-scented drugs, or spices: this agrees with the character of this plant for fragrance, which is held in the hand by way of nosegay; and the Persians call it the perfume of the hands.' Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 163; Fragments annexed to Calmel's Dictionary; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. xxx. 14.

MANICHEANS, a denomination founded by one Manes, or Manicheus, in the third century, and settled in many provinces. He was a Persian by birth, educated among the Magi, and himself one of the number before he embraced Christianity. His genius was vigorous and sublime, but redundant and ungoverned. He attempted a coalition of the doctrine of the Magi with the Christian system, or rather the explication of the one by the other: and, in order to succeed in the enterprise, he affirmed that Christ had left the doctrine of salvation imperfect and unfinished; and that he was the Comforter whom the departing Saviour had promised to his disciples to lead them into all truth.

The principles of Manes are comprehended in the following summary :—There are two principles from which all things proceed: the one a most pure and subtle matter, called light; and the other a corrupt and gross substance called darkness. Each of these is subject to the dominion of a superintending Being, whose existence is from all eternity. The Being who presides over the light is called God; he that rules the land of darkness bears the title of Hyle or Demon. The ruler of the light is supremely happy, and, in consequence, benevolent and good. The prince of darkness is unhappy in himself, and, desiring to render others partakers of his misery, is evil and malignant. These two beings have produced an immense multitude of creatures resembling themselves, and distributed them through their respective provinces.

The prince of darkness knew not for a long series of ages that light existed in the universe; and he no sooner perceived it, by means of a war kindled in his dominions, than he bent his endeavours towards subjecting it to his empire. The ruler of the light opposed to his efforts an army commanded by the first man, but not with the highest success; for the generals of the prince of darkness seized upon a considerable portion of the celestial elements, and of the light itself, and mingled them in the mass of corrupt matter. The second general of the ruler of the light, whose name was the living spirit, made war with more success against the prince of darkness; but could not entirely disengage the pure particles of celestial matter from the corrupt mass through which they had been dispersed. The prince of darkness, after his defeat, produced the first parents of the human race. The beings engendered from this original stock consist of a body formed out of the corrupt matter of the kingdom of darkness, and of two souls, one of which is sensitive and lustful, and owes its existence to the evil principle; the other rational and immortal, a particle of that Divine light which was carried away by the army of darkness, and immersed into the mass of malignant matter.

Mankind being thus formed by the prince of darkness, and those minds that were the productions of the eternal light being united to their mortal bodies, God created the earth out of the corrupt mass of matter by that living spirit who had vanquished the prince of darkness. The design of this creation was to furnish a dwelling for the human race, to deliver by degrees the captive souls from their corporeal prisons, and to extract the celestial elements from the gross substance in which they were involved. In order to carry this design into execution, God produced two beings of eminent dignity from his own substance, which were to lend their auspicious succours to imprisoned souls: one of these sublime entities was Christ; and the other the Holy Ghost. Christ is that glorious intelligence which the Persians called Mithras: he is a most splendid substance, consisting of the brightness of the eternal light, subsisting in and by himself, endowed with life, enriched with infinite wisdom, and having his residence in the sun. The Holy Ghost is also a luminous and animated body, diffused through every part of the atmosphere, which surrounds this terrestrial globe. This genial principle warms and illuminates the minds of men, renders also the earth fruitful, and draws forth gradually from its bosom the latent particles of celestial fire, which it wafts up on high to their primitive station.

After the Supreme Being had for a long time admonished and exhorted the captive souls, by the ministry of angels and holy men raised up and appointed for that purpose, he ordered Christ to leave the solar regions, and to descend on earth, in order to accelerate the return of those imprisoned spirits to their celestial country. In obedience to this Divine command, Christ appeared among the Jews, clothed with the shadowy form of a human body, and not with the real substance. During his ministry, he taught mortals how to disengage the rational soul from the corrupt body, to conquer the violence of malignant matter; and he demonstrated his Divine mission by stupendous miracles. On the other hand, the prince of darkness used every method to inflame the Jews against this Divine messenger, and incited them at length to put him to death, upon an ignominious cross; which punishment, however, he suffered not in reality, but only in appearance, and in the opinion of men. When Christ had fulfilled the purposes of his mission, he returned to his throne in the sun, and appointed a certain number of chosen apostles to propagate through the world the religion he had taught during the course of his ministry. But before his departure he promised that at a certain period of time he would send an apostle, superior to all others in eminence and dignity, whom he called the Paraclete or Comforter, who should add many things to the precepts he had delivered, and dispel all the errors under which his servants laboured with respect to Divine things. This Comforter, thus expressly promised by Christ, is Manes, the Persian, who, by the order of the Most High, declared to mortals the whole doctrine of salvation, without exception, and without concealing any of its truths under the veil of metaphor, or any other covering.

The souls that believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of God renounce the worship of the God of the Jews, who is the prince of darkness; obey the laws delivered by Christ, as they are enlarged and illustrated by the Comforter, Manes; combat with persevering fortitude the lusts and appetites of a corrupt nature; and derive from this faith and obedience the inestimable advantage of being gradually purified from the contagion of matter. The total purification of souls cannot indeed be accomplished during this mortal life. Hence the souls of men after death must pass through two states more of probation and trial, by water and fire, before they can ascend to the regions of light. They mount, therefore, first into the moon, which consists of benign and salutary water; whence, after a lustration of fifteen days, they proceed to the sun, whose purifying fire removes entirely all their corruption, and effaces all their stains. The bodies, composed of malignant matter, which they have left behind them, return to their first state, and enter into their original mass. On the other hand, those souls who have neglected the salutary work of their purification, pass after death into the bodies of animals or other natures, where they remain till they have expiated their guilt; and accomplished their probation. Some, on account of their peculiar obstinacy and perverseness, pass through a severer course of trial, being delivered over for a certain time to the power of malignant aerial spirits, who torment them in various ways. When the greatest part of the captive souls are restored to liberty and to the regions of light, then a devouring fire shall break forth, at the Divine command, from the caverns in which it is at present confined, and shall destroy the frame of the world. After this tremendous event, the prince and powers of darkness shall be forced to return to their primitive seats of anguish and misery, in which they shall dwell for ever. For, to prevent their ever renewing this war in the regions of light, God shall surround the mansions of darkness with an invincible guard, composed of those souls who have fallen irrecoverably from the hopes of salvation, and who set in array, like a military band, shall surround those gloomy seats of woe, and hinder any of their wretched inhabitants from coming forth again to the light.

To remove the strongest obstacles to this system, Manes rejected the Old Testament, the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles; and he also said that the Epistles of Paul were falsified in a variety of places. He wrote a gospel, which he pretended was dictated to him by God himself, and which he distinguished by the name of Erteng.

To support their fundamental doctrine of two principles, the Manicheans argue in this manner: If we depend only on one Almighty Cause, infinitely good, and infinitely free, who disposes universally of all beings according to the pleasure of his will, we cannot account for the existence of natural and moral evil. If the Author of our being be supremely good, he will take continual pleasure in promoting the happiness of his creatures, and preventing every thing which can diminish or disturb their felicity. We cannot, therefore, explain the evils which we experience, but by the hypothesis of two principles; for it is impossible to conceive that the first man could derive the faculty of doing ill from a good principle, since this fatuity, and every thing which can produce evil, is vicious; for evil cannot proceed except from a bad cause, and therefore the free-will of Adam was derived from two opposite principles. He depended on the good principle for his power to persevere in innocence; but his power to deviate from virtue owed its rise to an evil principle. Hence it is evident there are two contrary principles; the one the source of good, the other the fountain of all vice and misery.

Manes commanded his followers to mortify and macerate the body, which he looked upon as essentially corrupt; to deprive it of all those objects which could contribute either to its convenience or delight; to extirpate all those desires which lead to the pursuit of external objects; and to divest themselves of all the passions and instincts of nature: but he did not impose this severe manner of living without distinction upon his adherents. He divided his disciples into two classes; one of which comprehended the perfect Christians under the name of the elect; the other, the imperfect and feeble, under the title of hearers. The elect were obliged to an entire abstinence from flesh, eggs, milk, fish, wine, all intoxicating drink, wedlock, and all amorous gratifications; and to live in a state of the sharpest penury, nourishing their emaciated bodies with bread, herbs, pulse, and melons. The discipline appointed for the hearers was of a milder nature; they were allowed to possess houses, lands, and wealth; to feed upon flesh, and to enter into the bonds of conjugal tenderness. But this liberty was granted them with many limitations, and under the strictest conditions of moderation and temperance.

The general assembly of the Manicheans was headed by a president, who represented Jesus Christ. There were joined to him twelve rulers, or masters, who were designed to represent the twelve apostles; and these were followed by seventy-two bishops, the images of the seventy-two disciples of our Lord. These bishops had presbyters and deacons under them; and all the members of these religious orders were chosen out of the class of the elect.

The Manicheans observed the Lord's day, but fasted upon it. They likewise celebrated Easter, and had a regular church discipline and censors. They read the Scriptures, baptized even infants in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and partook of the Lord's Supper.

The doctrine of Manes differs from the Gnostics in this respect:—Instead of supposing evil to have originated ultimately from inferior and subordinate beings, he held the doctrine of two original independent principles; the one immaterial, and supremely good; the other material, and the source of all evil, but actuated by a soul, or something of the nature of intelligence. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. pp. 239—245; Adams's View of Religions, p. 190.

MANNA, the food of the children of Israel, which God gave them in the deserts of Arabia during forty years, from their eighth encampment in the wilderness of Sin. (Exod. xvi. 14, 15.) The manna was a little grain, white, like hoar-frost, round, and of the size of coriander seed. It fell every morning with the dew, and when the dew was exhaled by the heat of the sun, the manna appeared alone, lying on the rocks, or the sand. (Exod. xvi.) It fell every day except the Sabbath, and only about the camp of the Israelites. It fell in so great quantities during the whole forty years of their journey in the wilderness, that it was sufficient to feed the whole multitude of above a million of souls, every one of whom gathered, for his share every day, the quantity of an omer, which is about three quarts. It maintained all this multitude, and yet none of them found any inconvenience from the constant eating of it. Every Friday there fell a double quantity of it, (Exod. xvi. 5.); and though it putrified and bred maggots when it was kept any other day, yet on the Sabbath it suffered no such alteration. And the same manna that was melted by the heat of the sun, when left in the field, was of so hard a consistence when brought into the house, that it was beat in mortars, and would even endure the fire, was baked in pans, made into paste, and so into cakes. (Numb. xi. 8.)

This production was, probably, like many other miracles, partly natural, partly miraculous. It is certain that manna is now found on trees, &c. in the East, and perhaps in this very desert. But, that it should fall in such quantities, and under such restrictions and peculiarities, is not according to nature; that it should breed worms if kept beyond a day; that none of it should fall on the Sabbath; are altogether extraordinary; that it should melt by the heat of the sun is not so wonderful, since what is now found in these parts exhales like dew after the sun is hot. Nor is it certain that there was any thing unaccountable in the quantity gathered for each person, since it is likely the people collected according to their families, and the number of children in each, would adjust a considerable apparent difference of quantity; not to say, they might impart to each other as wanted. It may, however, be doubted whether all the camp depended constantly on this manna for food; where were the cattle, milch-kine, &c. brought out of Egypt? (Numb. xi. 22.) Though they might have little fish, yet vegetables of some kinds they might procure, as we are not, perhaps, under the necessity of supposing that they were entirely secluded from intercourse with adjacent tribes of Arabs, and neighbouring nations; and if they lived on the dates of the palm-tree, why not Israel also? and why might not Israel purchase those and other fruits? 'The mixt multitude fell a lusting.' (Numb. xi. 4.)

'Manna,' says Niebuhr, 'is found at present in divers parts of the East, but I own that I neglected to procure information at the most celebrated places, that is to say, around Mount Sinai, famous for the manna of the Israelites. At Merdin it attaches itself, like a meal or powder, on the leaves of certain trees, which they call Ballot and Afs, and which I believe to be oaks. Some affirmed they had found manna between Merdin and Diarbekr on the trees named Elmäs and Elmaheb. Others, from whom I inquired whether this was true, had never seen any on trees of those kinds; nor did they recollect at Aleppo to have found it on the shrub El hâdsje. All agreed in affirming that between Merdin and Diarbekr, it was principally gathered from those trees which produce the gall-nut, that is, oaks. The gathering time of this manna at Merdin, is in July or August; and they say it is most plentiful after a certain very thick fog, or during moist weather, rather than during the clear days. I was assured at Basra, that the manna named Tarandsjubin, or Tarandsjubil, was gathered in great quantities near Ispahan, from a little thorny bush. I inquired for this kind of manna at Basra, and I found that it consisted of small grains, round and yellow, by consequence, of the same figure as the manna of the Israelites is described to be. (Exod. xvi. 14. 31. Numb. xi. 7.) Perhaps it was this kind which served as food to the Jews during their journey, for there are many thorny bushes in the desert around Mount Sinai; and that district is in nearly the same latitude as Ispahan; but if the children of Israel enjoyed their manna during the whole year, that was by miracle; for the manna Tarandsjubin, is found only during certain months. I do not know whether sugar is cultivated in other countries of Arabia beside Yemen. But if the Jews had found in the deserts of Sinai only the natural Tarandsjubin, it would have been a very pleasant thing to them. In the Kurdestan, at Mosul Merdin, Diarbekr, Ispahan, and probably in other cities, they use manna only, instead of sugar, for their pastry and other dishes. Much of it may be eaten without its proving purgative. Nevertheless, a person with whom I conversed at Basra thought that both kinds were of that quality. Perhaps this is sensible only after it has lost its freshness. The tree which produces wild honey was not known at Basra, but an inhabitant of Ispahan affirmed that this tree grew commonly in Persia, and became very large.'

The comparison of the manna to sugar by this intelligent traveller, the observation that it is used in pastry, and its figure as grains, will not fail to strike the reader. Though manna cannot properly be called a vegetable gum, yet it is evidently a vegetable emission, or inspissation, and, at least partially, a juice from the tree or shrub. Niebuhr's Travels, p. 128, first edit.; Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 42, 43; Universal History, book i. chapter vii.

MANO'AH, מָנוֹחַ, Manôe, signifies rest; otherwise, present. Manoah, or Manueh, was the father of Samson, of the tribe of Dan, of the city of Zorah. (Judg. xiii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) An angel of the Lord having appeared to the wife of Manoah, and promised her a son, Manoah desired of the Lord that he might see him who had thus appeared, that he might know from him how to treat this son when born. The Lord heard his prayer, and the angel appeared again to his wife, who was in the fields, and who ran to acquaint her husband. Manoah went to him, and obtained from him directions respecting his son. Manoah then said, My Lord, I pray you be pleased to let us prepare you a kid. The angel replied, I must not eat any food; but you may offer it for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. Manoah said to him, not knowing him to be an angel, What is your name, that we may pay you honour and acknowledgment, if that shall happen which you have foretold? He answered, Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is WONDERFUL? Manoah, therefore, took the kid, with the wine for the libations, and put them on the fire which he had lighted on a stone. The angel acted wondrously in the presence of Manoah and his wife; for he [the Lord] ascended up towards heaven in the flame of the altar. This was a significant sign to this pious couple, that he was the angel of the Lord himself, or the Son of God, whose name is called Wonderful, and the same God that appeared to Moses. (Exod. xxxiii. 20.)

Manoah, perceiving that it was an angel, said to his wife, We shall certainly die, since we have seen the Lord. But his wife answered him, If the Lord would have killed us, he would not have conferred such favours on us; he would not have received our burnt-offering, nor predicted to us the birth of a son. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 324.

MA'RAH, מָרָה, Məṣṣā, or Tuxpía, signifies bitter, or bitterness. When the Israelites, coming out of Egypt, were arrived at the desert of Etham, they there found the water so bitter, that neither themselves nor their cattle could drink of it. (Exod. xv. 23.) Therefore, they named the place Marah, or bitterness. Then they began to murmur against Moses; and the Lord showed him a tree, which being thrown into the waters, they were made sweet. Dr. Shaw conjectures, that this place is the same as that now called Corondel, where there is still a small rill, which, if not diluted with dews or rain, continues brackish. Sacred Geography, Geographical Excursions, p. 72.

MARCIONITES, a very ancient and popular sect of heretics, who, in the time of Epiphanius, were spread over Italy, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Arabia, Persia, and other countries; they were thus denominated from their author Marcion. Marcion was of Pontus, the son of a bishop, and at first made profession of the monastic life; but he was excommunicated by his own father, who would never admit him again into communion with the church, not even on his repentance. On this he abandoned his own country, and retired to Rome, where he began to broach his doctrines.

Marcion taught men to believe in another God, superior to the Creator, who was the Supreme God, the Father, invisible, inaccessible, and perfectly good. The Creator, the God of the Jews, made this lower and visible world. The Supreme God, the Father, had also a world of his making, but better than this, immaterial and invisible. For he supposed if a good God had made this world, there would have been neither sin nor misery; but all men would have been holy and happy. He taught that Jesus was the Son of the good God, who took the exterior form of a man, and, without being born, or gradually growing up to the full stature of a man, he showed himself at once in Galilee as a man grown. He also supposed, that, at the first moment of his appearance in the world, he was completely fitted to enter on his great work; and that he immediately assumed the character of a Saviour.

According to the doctrine of this denomination, Christ had the appearance of a human body, though not the reality. Marcion acknowledged that the prophets of the Creator had promised a Saviour to the Jewish nation, who should deliver them out of the hands of their enemies, and restore them to freedom; but he pretended that this deliverer was not the Son of God, and that the oracles of the Old Testament did not agree to Jesus Christ. Hence he believed that there are two Christs: one who appeared in the time of Tiberius, for the salvation of all nations; another, the restorer of the Jewish state, who is yet to come. They supposed that the souls of the virtuous would enjoy eternal happiness with the good God and their Saviour, after their departure from this world; but they denied the resurrection of the body.

Marcion rejected the Old Testament altogether, as proceeding from the Creator, who, in his estimation, was void of goodness. He received only eleven books of the New Testament; and of the Gospels that of Luke only, and it with many alterations; and he rejected all the parts of the New Testament which contain quotations from the Old.

The manners of this denomination were virtuous; and they had many martyrs. Lardner's Works, vol. ix. pp. 369—393; Adams's View of Religions, p. 196.

MARK, Μάρκος, signifies polite, shining. Doubts have been entertained, both in ancient and modern times, whether Mark the Evangelist is the same as John, whose surname was Mark, mentioned in the Acts and in some of St. Paul's Epistles. The objections which have been made to their identity are answered by Lardner. Dr. Campbell thinks they were different persons; but as a contrary opinion seems to preponderate, we shall, with Lightfoot, Wetstein, Lardner, and Michaelis, consider them as the same. It is known to have been a common thing among the Jews for the same person to have different names.

We shall therefore consider Mark the author of the Gospel, as the son of Mary, who was an early convert to the religion of Christ. St. Peter, when he was delivered out of prison by an angel, went immediately to her house, where he found 'many gathered together praying.' (Acts xii. 12.) Hence it is inferred, that the Christians were accustomed to meet at Mary's house, even in these times of persecution, and that there was an early acquaintance between St. Peter and St. Mark. Mark was the nephew of Barnabas, being his sister's son; and he is supposed to have been converted to the Gospel by St. Peter, who calls him his son, (1 Pet. v. 13.); but no circumstances of his conversion are recorded. The first historical fact mentioned of him in the New Testament is, that he went from Jerusalem to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas. Not long after, he set out from Antioch with those apostles, upon a journey which they undertook by the direction of the Holy Spirit, for the purpose of preaching the Gospel in different countries; but he soon left them, probably without sufficient reason, at Perga in Pamphylia, and went to Jerusalem. (Acts xiii.) Afterwards, when Paul and Barnabas had determined to visit the several churches which they had established, Barnabas proposed that they should take Mark with them; to which Paul objected, because Mark had left them in their former journey. This produced a sharp contention between Paul and Barnabas, which ended in their separation. Mark accompanied his uncle Barnabas to Cyprus, but it is not mentioned whither they went when they left that island. We may conclude that St. Paul was afterwards reconciled to St. Mark, from the manner in which he mentions him in his Epistles, written subsequently to this dispute, and particularly from the direction which he gives to Timothy; 'Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is profitable to me for the ministry.' (2 Tim. iv. 11.) No farther circumstances are recorded of St. Mark in the New Testament.

It is believed, on the authority of ancient writers, that soon after Mark's journey with Barnabas, he met Peter in Asia, and that he continued with him for some time, perhaps till Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome. Epiphanius, Eusebius, and Jerome, all assert that Mark preached the Gospel in Egypt; and the two latter call him bishop of Alexandria. Baronius, Cave, Wetstein, and other learned moderns, have thought that Mark died a martyr; but there seems to be no authority for that opinion in any ancient writer; and it appears to be contradicted by Jerome, who says, that he died in the eighth year of Nero, and was buried at Alexandria; which expression would imply that he died a natural death. Papias and several other ancient fathers say that Mark was not a hearer of Christ himself; but, on the contrary, Epiphanius, and the author of the Dialogue against the Marcionites, written in the fourth century, assert that he was one of the seventy disciples to whom our Saviour gave a temporary commission to preach the Gospel; this, however, does not seem probable, as there is reason to believe that he was converted to the belief of the Gospel by St. Peter.

The earliest ecclesiastical writer upon record that expressly mentions St. Mark's Gospel is Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, at the beginning of the second century. It is mentioned also by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, and many others. The works of these fathers contain numerous quotations from this Gospel; and as their testimony is not contradicted by any ancient writer, it may be safely concluded that the Gospel of St. Mark is genuine. Different persons have assigned different dates to this Gospel; but as there is an almost unanimous concurrence of opinion that it was written whilst St. Mark was with St. Peter at Rome, and as we do not find any ancient authority for supposing that St. Peter was in that city till the year 64, we may place the publication of this Gospel about the year 65. Whether Mark or Luke wrote first has been disputed; but the general opinion is, that Mark wrote after, and not before, Luke. Some think that Mark rather adopted the language of Matthew, and the order of Luke, in their joint sections; but that he followed neither implicitly. He is usually more circumstantial and correct than they are in the relation of joint events. Indeed, to the accurate fidelity of this well-informed Evangelist, we owe several important facts and illustrations omitted by his predecessors. His style is clear and correct; and his Gospel is a simple and compendious narrative. See GOSPEL. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 310—318; Dr. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 650.

MAR'THA, Μάρθα, signifies who becomes bitter; according to the Syriac, mistress, or that teaches. Martha was sister of Lazarus and Mary, and mistress of the house where our Saviour was entertained, in the village of Bethany. Martha is always named before Mary, probably because she was the elder sister. Once, when our Saviour visited them, Martha was very busy in preparing supper, while Mary sat at our Saviour's feet, hearing his doctrine with great assiduity and attention. (Luke xi. 38—42.) Martha complained to our Saviour, desiring him to bid Mary rise and assist her. But Jesus answered, Martha, Martha, you are very busy, and in much trouble to provide indifferent or unnecessary things; there is but one thing necessary, and Mary has chosen the better part, which shall not be taken from her.

Some time after, Lazarus falling sick, the two sisters sent word of it to Jesus, then beyond Jordan; but he departed not from thence till he knew Lazarus was dead. Being come almost to Bethany, Martha went out to meet him; and expostulated with him on his delay; and professed her faith in him. Jesus bid them bring him to Lazarus's tomb, where he raised him from the dead. (John xi. 20, &c.)

Six days before his passion, Jesus, being come to Bethany for the feast of the passover, was invited to eat by a Pharisee, called Simon the leper. (John xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) Martha waited, Lazarus was one of the guests, and Mary poured a box of precious perfume on the head and feet of Jesus. (Matt. xxvi. 6, &c.) This is all that the Scripture informs us concerning Martha.

MARRIAGE, a covenant between a man and a woman, by which they mutually promise cohabitation, and a continual care to promote the comfort and happiness of each other. As to the nature of the marriage state, it will be sufficient to apprehend, that it is a society of two persons, who, whilst it continues, ought to have but one interest, and therefore one only scheme of life, pursued by both, in order to one and the same sort of happiness, of which both are to be equal partakers; and likewise of the reverse, as often as troubles or afflictions shall occur, whether the occasion of trouble or affliction shall visit them both at once, or begin with the one or the other. They are to partake of each other's comforts, and to share each other's sorrows. All this arises from the very nature of an alliance, founded on the same interest, and on the highest degree of affection which the parties are capable of entertaining.

This natural notion of matrimony is confirmed and enforced by the word of God. The apostle represents 'the union between Christ and his church,' by the union between a husband and his wife; and this again by 'the union between the head and the members in a natural body.' Christ loves, provides for, and governs his church, just as the good husband does his wife; and he again loves, provides for, and governs his wife, just as a wise and careful head does the rest of the body. On the other hand, you will see a good wife loving and obeying her husband, as a sound body does in regard to its head, and as the church does in regard to Christ. Here a sameness of interest and happiness is clearly set forth as necessary to matrimony, that the husband and wife may know themselves to be but one—'one body or flesh:' and the subjection of the wife to her husband is as plainly laid before us; that, if differences should arise, they may find an easy and speedy determination, without the interposition of a third person, which seldom leaves the contest in a better state of agreement than it was before.

Unity of heart and understanding being as essential to the happiness, as unity of interest is to the nature, of matrimony, it is, in the first place, the grand business both of husband and wife to aim at the attainment or preservation of this unity, as early and as studiously as they can; or if it is once hurt or lost, to labour earnestly for the recovery of it, as not only the foundation of all their happiness, but the only preservative against the greatest misery that can be undergone in this life. If, after having lived together for some years, they find themselves still one, one in understanding and heart, in order to one and the same interest, or circle of satisfactions, they have only to proceed as they have begun, and to suffer nothing, except the means of their eternal salvation, to prompt them to louder or more repeated thanksgivings, than the sense of their present comfort. If they are only lately married, and, therefore, have not had sufficient time to try their tempers with respect to each other, they ought seriously to consider that they must infallibly become either comforters or tormentors of each other. Indifference is inconsistent with the very nature of matrimony, which, if it does not unite them into one, cannot leave them two, simply as they were before marriage; but must make them two bitter, treacherous, or suspected, enemies to each other, and to their common happiness. Ask those who have been long married, whether there is any medium between happiness and misery, in that state? Their uniform report will be, that there neither is, nor can be, any such thing.

Such being the case, they must be more than infatuated, if they do not use their utmost endeavours, first, to keep at the greatest distance every cause of dispute, and every occasion of disgust; and, next, to say and do every thing that may nourish that affection and confidence, on which absolutely depend all their happiness.

But when all methods are likely to prove unsuccessful, and heart from heart begins to start aside, it is then incumbent on them to bring the causes of their uneasiness before God, to compare them carefully with their marriage vows of obedience on one side, and of affection on both: and then 'meekly kneeling upon their knees,' humbly to confess their faults to Him who cannot be deceived, to form resolutions of better behaviour hereafter on the particulars of that confession, and most earnestly to implore the assistance of the blessed Being they are before, who infallibly will hear them, and enable them to rise in a frame of mind much better fitted for the observance of their vows, and for the improvement of affection and good agreement between them.

A strict fidelity towards each other will beget such confidence, and that such esteem and affection, as all other good qualities are incapable of producing. If to this severer virtue they can add 'the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit,' of a gentle and condescending temper, which not only 'in the sight of God,' but of our partner also, 'is of great price,' they will wonderfully promote the harmony, and by that the affection they wish to establish. Happy they in whom that uninterrupted peace and love, sweeter than life itself, are to be found! where authority and obedience lose their names, and almost their natures, the husband no more knowing that he directs, than the heart does that it moves the hand; and the wife no more feeling that she obeys, than the hand that it is moved. Marriage so circumstanced is truly honourable.

Let the husband never forget, that his wife hath put her person, together with her fortune, into his hands, as into those of the man in whom she placed the highest confidence, and that she did this in a pleasing expectation of finding in him a generous and strenuous protector against all ill-treatment from others, and all the distress and trouble which a man is better able to repel than a woman. To him her feeble nature hath fled for a refuge. How base, how unmanly a breach of trust would it be in him, to treat her with coldness, contempt, or cruelty; to become her chief oppressor; and to force from her broken heart the melancholy wish to be again where he found her, exposed alone to a world, hard indeed, and deceitful, but less insensible and treacherous than he! It is true she is not without faults; and who is? Hear what an inspired apostle says, 'Ye husbands, dwell with your wives according to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife as unto the weaker vessel. Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ loved the church;' for which he thought it not too much to give his life. 'So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself; for no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church.' Observe, that the husband is here forbidden to treat his wife with bitterness, and commanded to show her that love which Christ hath for his church, and he has for himself, and to do her honour. Nay, the husband is to love his wife, even as himself, though she should be not less infirm and faulty than he is.

On the other hand, a married woman should at all times, and in every instance, bear in mind, that gentleness and pliancy in every thing but vice, is her distinguishing characteristic. The personal face of an angel, without the peculiar ornaments of her sex, will not make her beautiful, nor even tolerable. There is nothing conceivable so unnatural, and so shocking, as a woman who puts on a masculine, not to say a boisterous spirit, and sets up for an object of fear. Hear him who says, 'Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands as unto the Lord; for the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church. As the church, therefore, is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing. Let the wife see that she reverence her husband. Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. Ye wives be in subjection to your own husbands.' This last precept is followed by another enjoining meekness and quietness of spirit, and forbidding an expensive vanity in dress. It ought to be considered that these precepts are positive, unconditional, and leave no excuse for a failure in the duty of a married woman. be her husband's behaviour what it may. Clapham's Sermons, vol. i. serm. xxviii.

MA'RY, the mother of Jesus, and wife of Joseph. She is called by the Jews the daughter of Eli; and by the early Christian writers, 'the daughter of Joakim and Anna:' but Joakim and Eliakim are sometimes interchanged (2 Chron. xxxvi. 4.); and Eli, or Heli, is, therefore the abridgement of Eliakim. (Luke iii. 23.) She was of the royal race of David, as was also Joseph her husband; and she was also cousin to Elisabeth, the wife of Zacharias the priest. (Luke i. 5. 36.)

Mary being espoused to Joseph, the angel Gabriel appeared to her, to acquaint her that she should be the mother of the Messiah. (Luke i. 26, 27, &c.) Mary asked him how this could be, since she knew no man? The angel replied, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee,' so that thou shalt conceive without the concurrence of a man. To confirm his message, and to show that nothing is impossible to God, he added, that her cousin Elisabeth, who was old, and had been hitherto barren, was then in the sixth month of her pregnancy. Mary answered, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word;' and presently she conceived. She set out for Hebron, a city in the mountains of Judah, to visit her cousin Elisabeth. As soon as Elisabeth heard the voice of Mary, her child (John the Baptist) leaped in her womb; and she was filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake with a loud voice, saying, 'Blessed art thou among women,' &c. Then Mary praised God, saying, 'My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour,' &c. Mary continued with Elisabeth about three months, and then returned to her own house.

When Mary was ready to lie in, an edict of Cæsar Augustus decreed, that all subjects of the empire should go to their own cities, to register their names according to their families. Joseph and Mary, who were both of the lineage of David, went to Bethlehem, from whence sprung their family. But while they were here, the time being fulfilled in which Mary was to be delivered, she brought forth her first born son. She wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in the manger of the stable or caravansary whither they had retired, because there was no room in the inn. Angels made this event known to shepherds, who were in the fields near Bethlehem, and who came in the night to see Joseph and Mary, and the child lying in the manger, and to pay him their adoration. Mary took notice of all these things, and laid them up in her heart. (Luke ii. 19.) 'Some time after, the Magi or wise men came from the East, and brought to Jesus the mysterious presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh. (Matt. ii. 8, 9, 10, 11, &c.) The time of Mary's purification being come, that is, forty days after the birth of Jesus, Mary went to Jerusalem, to present her son in the temple, and there to offer the sacrifice appointed by the law, for the purification of women after child-birth. (Luke ii. 21.) There was then at Jerusalem an old man named Simeon, full of the Holy Ghost, who had received a secret assurance that he should not die, before he had seen Christ the Lord. He came then into the temple by the influence of the Spirit of God, and, taking the child Jesus in his arms, he blessed the Lord, &c.

Afterwards, when Joseph and Mary were about to return to their own country, Nazareth, the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, bidding him retire into Egypt with Mary and the child, because Herod designed to destroy Jesus. (Matt. ii. 13, 14.) Joseph obeyed the admonition, and continued in Egypt till after the death of Herod, when they returned to Nazareth.

Mary and Joseph went every year to Jerusalem to the passover; and when Jesus was twelve years of age, they took him with them. When they were returning, the child Jesus continued at Jerusalem, without their perceiving it; and, thinking he might be with some of the company, they went on a day's journey. Then, not finding him among their acquaintance, they returned to Jerusalem to seek him. Three days after, they found him in the temple, sitting among the doctors, hearing them and asking them questions. When they saw him, they were filled with astonishment; and Mary said to him, Son, why have you served us thus? Your father and myself have sought you in much affliction. Jesus answered them, Why did you seek me? Did not you know that I must be employed about my Father's business? (Luke ii. 49.) Afterwards he returned with them to Nazareth, and lived in filial submission to them. But his mother laid up all these things in her heart. (Luke ii. 51, 52.) The Gospel speaks nothing more of the Virgin Mary, till the marriage at Cana of Galilee, at which she was present with her son Jesus.

The Virgin was at Jerusalem, at the last passover our Saviour celebrated there. There she saw all that was transacted; she followed him to Calvary, she stayed at the foot of his cross, with an admirable constancy and courage. Jesus seeing his mother, and his beloved disciple near, he said to his mother, Woman, behold thy son; and to the disciple, Behold thy mother. And from that hour the disciple took her home to his own house. After this she dwelt with John the Evangelist, who took care of her as of his own mother.

MARY, mother of Mark. She had a house in Jerusalem, whither it is thought the apostles retired, after the ascension of our Lord, and where they received the Holy Ghost. After the imprisonment of St. Peter, the faithful assembled in this house, there praying instantly; when Peter, delivered by the ministry of an angel, knocked at the door of the house. (Acts xii. 5. 12.)

MARY of Cleophas. Jerome says, she bore the name of Cleophas, either because of her father, of her family, or some other reason not known. Chrysostom and others believe, with greater probability, that she was wife of Cleophas, and mother of James the Less, and of Simon, brethren of our Lord. These authors take Mary, mother of James, and Mary, wife of Cleophas, to be the same person. St. John gives her the name of Mary, wife of Cleophas, and the other evangelists the name of Mary, mother of James. Cleophas and Alpheus are the same person, as James, son of Mary, wife of Cleophas, is the same as James son of Alpheus. Alpheus and Cleophas differ only as a Hebrew name, and the same in Greek.

We know very few particulars of the life of Mary of Cleophas. It is thought she was sister of the holy Virgin; and the mother of James the Less, of Josés, of Simon, and of Judas, who in the Gospel are named brethren of Jesus Christ, that is, his cousin-germans. She believed early in Jesus Christ, and accompanied him in some of his journeys to minister to him. She was present at the death of our Saviour, she followed him to Calvary, and was with the Virgin at the foot of his cross. She was also present at his burial, and prepared perfumes to embalm him. But going to his tomb on Sunday morning very early, with other women, they learned from an angel that he was risen, of which they informed the apostles. By the way Jesus appeared to them; and they embraced his feet, worshipping him.

MARY, sister of Lazarus, has been confounded by some with the sinner, (Luke vii. 37—39.) whose name is not noticed, but whom others think to have been Mary Magdalene. Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, lived with her brother and sister at Bethany, a village near Jerusalem. Jesus Christ had a particular affection for this family, and often retired to their house. One day, Martha having received him with great affection, and thinking to make much of him, she prepared a handsome entertainment, whilst Mary her sister remained at our Saviour's feet, hearing his conversation with great attention. Martha, therefore, said to Jesus, Do you not observe, Lord, that my sister leaves me to minister alone? Bid her come to help me. But Jesus took occasion to justify Mary, saying, that Mary had chosen the better part, which should not be taken from her.

Some time after, their brother Lazarus fell sick, and his sisters acquainted Jesus with it; but he did not come till after Lazarus was dead. He arrived at Bethany, and presently Martha came to him. Then he sent to acquaint Mary with his being there, who immediately came to him, making her complaint of Lazarus's death, &c. Jesus restored him to his sisters. Six days before the passover, Jesus came to Bethany with his disciples, and was invited to supper at Simon's the leper. Martha attended, and Lazarus was one of the guests. Mary taking a pound of spike-nard (the most precious perfume of this kind,) poured it on the head and feet of Jesus. She wiped his feet with her hair, and the whole house was filled with the scent of the perfume. Judas Iscariot murmured at this: but Jesus undertook Mary's defence, saying, that by this she had anticipated his embalmment, and, in a manner, had declared his death and burial at hand. From this time the Scripture does not mention Martha and Mary; but those who distinguish not between Mary sister of Martha, and Mary Magdalene, say, that she was present at the crucifixion of our Saviour, and went to his sepulchre to embalm him.

MARY MAGDALENE is thought by some to have been the sinner, (Luke vii. 36, 37, &c.) whose name is not mentioned. Circumstances incline us to believe, that she was that Mary Magdalene, from whom Jesus expelled seven devils. (Luke viii. 2.) Jesus, having healed the widow's son of Nain, entered into that city, and was there invited to eat by a Pharisee named Simon. Whilst he was at table, a woman of a scandalous life came into the house, having an alabaster box full of perfume; and standing upright behind Jesus, and at his feet (for he was lying at a table on a couch after the manner of the ancients,) she poured her perfume on his feet, kissed them, watered them with her tears, and wiped them with her hair, &c. In the following chapter St. Luke tells us, that Jesus, in company with his apostles, preached the Gospel from city to city, accompanied by several women, whom he had cured of their infirmities, among whom was Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils. Mary Magdalene took her surname either from the town of Magdala in Galilee, beyond Jordan, and not far from Gamala, or from Magdolos, a town on this side Jordan, at the foot of Mount Carmel, the Megiddo of Joshua. (Luke xvii. 11. 2 Kings ix. 27.; xxiii. 29.)

Lightfoot believes, that it is this Mary Magdalene whom St. Luke and the other evangelists speak of, and whom this author does not distinguish from Mary the sister of Lazarus. Magdalene is mentioned by the evangelists, among the women who followed our Saviour to minister to him, according to the customs of the Jews. St. Luke (viii. 2.) and St. Mark, (xvi. 9.) observe, that this woman had been delivered by Jesus Christ from seven devils. This some understand literally; some figuratively, for the crimes and wickedness of her past life. Others maintain that she had always lived in virginity, and consequently was a different person from the sinner mentioned by St. Luke. She followed Christ in his last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem, and was at the foot of the cross with the holy Virgin. She continued on mount Calvary till our Saviour's death, and saw him put into his tomb. After this she returned to Jerusalem, to prepare perfumes to embalm him after the sabbath was over. (John xix. 25. Mark xv. 47.)

All the sabbath day she remained in the city, and the next day, early in the morning, she went to the sepulchre with Mary the mother of James, and Salome. (Mark xvi. 1, 2. Luke xxiv. 1, 2.) Being come to his tomb, they saw the entrance open, and concluded the body was removed. On this, Mary Magdalene runs to Jerusalem, to acquaint the apostles. Returning to the sepulchre, and stooping forward to examine the inside of the tomb, she there saw two angels sitting, one at the head, and the other at the bottom, of the tomb. They asked her, why she wept? To this she replied, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him. At the same time, turning about, she saw Jesus Christ; who asked her, what she looked for? She answered, Sir, if you have removed my Master, let me know it, that I may take him away. Jesus said to her, Mary! Immediately she knew him, and cast herself at his feet, to kiss them. But Jesus said to her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father: as if he had said, You shall have leisure to see me hereafter; go now to my brethren, my apostles, and tell them, I shall ascend to my God and their God, to my Father and their Father. Thus had Mary the happiness of first seeing our Saviour after his resurrection. She returned then to Jerusalem, and told the apostles that she had seen the Lord. But they did not believe her, till her report was confirmed by other testimony.

MASORA. This Hebrew word signifies tradition. Those Hebrew doctors are called Masorites, who have fixed the reading of the sacred text, by adding pointed vowels to it, and who made the notes in the margins of the printed Hebrew Bibles; who have counted with most scrupulous exactness all the words, verses, and letters of every book, that in following ages no further change might be made, and that the reading of the Bible might be fixed for ever. As the Hebrews often write their words without vowels, a tradition from father to son, is their rule for reading certain consonants, which have a variety of significations, according to the nature of the vowel supplied. As tradition teaches the Jews how to pronounce any word, in the several places in which it is found, in consequence of this tradition, the Masorites invented pointed vowels, to fix the reading. For this reason they are called Masorites, and their work, Masora, or tradition. These pointed vowels are instead of the real vowels where they are wanting; and they denote what sound is to be given them, when they are in the text, and whether they are to be pronounced or not, whether long or short, whether with a full sound or slightly. The Masorites have also marked the accents and the points. The accents serve for pronunciation, for singing and reading of the words. The points serve for distinction of sentences and verses.

The Masorites have been exact in marking letters that are either deficient or redundant in the text; whether a word is writ in a regular manner; whether one letter be put for another; if it be larger or shorter, or inverted, or suspended. For the Hebrews have such a vast respect for the sacred books, that they make a scruple of changing the situation of a letter, that is plainly out of its place. They incline to suppose that some mystery has occasioned the alteration. Their ancestors, it is very plain, were not so scrupulous, since we find many mistakes in the text, that could proceed only from the negligence or ignorance of transcribers.

Lastly, when there are various readings of the text, or any palpable fault, they put the true reading in the margin, without daring to alter the text. That which is found in the text they call Chetib, that is written; what they put in the margin they call Keri, that is read or reading, as if they would say, Write in this manner, but read in that manner. For example, when they find certain words, they substitute others. Instead of the sacred name Jehovah, they substitute Adonai, or Elohim; and instead of certain terms not very decent, they pronounce others less indelicate, or more agreeable to good manners.

As to the Masorites, or authors of the Masora, and the age in which they lived, and to the value of their performance, there is a great variety of sentiments. Some have very much commended this undertaking, and have considered the work of the Masorites as an admirable invention, to deliver the text from a multitude of equivocations and perplexities to which it was liable, to stop the unbounded licentiousness and rashness of transcribers and critics, who often make alterations in the text on their own private authority. Others have blamed the design, suspecting the Masorites corrupted the purity of the text, substituting instead of the ancient and true reading of their fathers, another reading more favourable to their prejudices, and more opposite to Christianity, whose testimonies and proofs they would weaken as much as they could.

Dr. Marsh observes, that 'the text itself, as regulated by the learned Jews of Tiberias, was probably the result of a collation of manuscripts. But as those Hebrew critics were cautious of introducing too many corrections in the text, they noted in the margins of their manuscripts, or in their critical collections, such various readings, derived from other manuscripts, either by themselves or by their predecessors, as appeared to be worthy of attention. This is the real origin of those marginal or Masoretic readings, which we find in many editions of the Hebrew Bible. But the propensity of the latter Jews to seek mystical meanings in the plainest facts, induced gradually the belief, that both textual and marginal readings proceeded from the sacred writers themselves, and that the latter were transmitted to posterity by oral tradition, as conveying some mysterious application of the written words. They were regarded therefore as materials, not of criticism, but of interpretation. In making some observations on the work of Cappellus relative to the integrity of the Hebrew text, the same learned writer says, that Cappellus 'was right in asserting, that the Hebrew manuscripts, from which the Septuagint and other ancient versions were made, had not precisely the same text as modern manuscripts, or printed editions. But he sometimes ascribed to a diversity of reading, what might rather be ascribed to a diversity of translation. He was right in asserting, that the authors of the Masora had not established a Hebrew text, which was free from fault; but he was unjust in not acknowledging the services which they really performed. He was right in asserting, that even the Masoretic text had not descended to posterity without variations; but he was unjust to the authors of the Masora in not acknowledging the care which they took to preserve it. For if their success has not been complete, either in establishing, or in preserving, the Hebrew text, they have been guilty only of the fault, which is common to every human effort.' Marsh's Course of Lectures, Part ii. pp. 84. 97.

MASS, Missa, in the church of Rome, the office or prayers used at the celebration of the eucharist; or, in other words, consecrating the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and offering them, so transubstantiated, as an expiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead. Nicod, after Baronius, observes, that the word comes from the Hebrew missach (oblatum), or from the Latin missa missorum; because in former times the catechumens and excommunicated were sent out of the church, when the deacons said, Ite, missa est, after sermon and reading of the epistle and gospel: they not being allowed to assist at the consecration. Menage derives the word from missio, 'dismissing;' others from missa, 'missing, sending,' because in the mass the prayers of men on earth are sent up to Heaven.

As the mass is in general believed to be a representation of the passion of our blessed Saviour, so every action of the priest, and every particular part of the service, is supposed to allude to the particular circumstances of his passion and death.

The general division of masses is into high and low mass. The first is that sung by the choristers, and celebrated with the assistance of a deacon and sub-deacon: low masses are those in which the prayers are barely rehearsed, without singing.

There are a great number of different or occasional masses in the Romish church, many of which have nothing peculiar but the name: such are the masses of the saints; that of St. Mary of the Snow, celebrated on the fifth of August; that of St. Margaret, patroness of lying-in-women; that at the feast of St. John the Baptist, at which are said three masses; that of the Innocents, at which the gloria in excelsis and hallelujah are omitted, and, it being a day of mourning, the altar is of a violet colour. As to ordinary masses, some are said for the dead, and, as is supposed, contribute to extricate the soul out of purgatory. At these masses the altar is put in mourning, and the only decorations are a cross in the middle of six yellow wax lights: the dress of the celebrant, and the very mass-book, are black; many parts of the office are omitted, and the people are dismissed without the benediction. If the mass be said for a person distinguished by his rank or virtues, it is followed with a funeral oration; they erect a chapelle ardente, that is, a representation of the deceased, with branches and tapers of yellow wax, either in the middle of the church, or near the deceased's tomb, where the priest pronounces a solemn absolution of the deceased. There are likewise private masses said for stolen or strayed goods or cattle, for health, for travellers, &c. which go under the name of votive masses. There is still a further distinction of masses, denominated from the countries in which they were used: thus, the Gothic mass, or missa mosarabum, is that used among the Goths when they were masters of Spain, and which is still observed at Toledo and Salamanca; the Ambrosian mass is that composed by St. Ambrose, and used only at Milan, of which city he was bishop; the Gallic mass, used by the ancient Gauls; and the Roman mass, used by almost all the churches in the Romish communion.

Mass of the presanctified (missa præsantificatorum), is a mass peculiar to the Greek church, in which there is no consecration of the elements; but, after singing some hymns, they receive the bread and wine which were before consecrated. This mass is performed all Lent, except on Saturdays, Sundays, and the Annunciation. The priest counts upon his fingers the days of the ensuing week on which it is to be celebrated, and cuts off as many pieces of bread at the altar as he is to say masses; and, after having consecrated them, he steepes them in wine, and puts them in a box, out of which, upon every occasion, he takes some of it with a spoon, and, putting it on a dish, sets it on the altar. Broughton's Hist. Dict. vol. ii. pp. 68—72.

MATERIALISTS. The Manicheans, and certain Oriental sects, abhorred matter, and on that account rejected as spurious all parts of Scripture that mentioned the uses of matter, and at length the whole of the Old Testament. On the contrary, many of our modern philosophers are great friends to matter; and, therefore, to suit their principles, the Scripture must be so interpreted, that even the soul may be material. Hence the abettors of this doctrine are called Materialists.

The Materialists believe and attempt to prove, contrary to the opinion which has almost universally prevailed in the Christian church, that man does not consist of two substances essentially different from each other, but is of an uniform composition; and that the conscious principle, or what we generally term the soul, is merely a property resulting from such an organic structure as that of the brain. From this hypothesis it seems to follow, as an immediate and necessary consequence, that man is not a free agent; that the soul is not naturally immortal, and that there is no intermediate state of consciousness between death and the resurrection; for the properties of sensation and thought must of course be extinguished at the dissolution of that system of organized matter, to which they appertain. In searching the Scriptures for passages expressive of the state of man at death, the Materialists cite Job xiv. 7—12, Psalm vi. 5, &c., as texts in which they find such declarations as they conceive expressly exclude any trace of sense, thought, or enjoyment. This doctrine of Materialism has long been considered as a tenet peculiar to infidelity, and has even been held in almost as much abhorrence by the generality of Christians as Atheism itself. Yet, it was very prevalent in France before the Revolution, and of late has been gaining ground in this country. It would seem that the doctrines of Unitarianism, Materialism, and philosophical or mechanical Necessity, if they be not equally parts of one system, are nearly connected. The scheme of necessity is the immediate result of the materiality of man, mechanism being the undoubted consequence of materialism; and this last is eminently subservient to the Unitarian doctrine of the proper or mere humanity of Christ. For, if no man have a soul distinct from his body, Christ, who in all other respects appeared as a man, could not have a soul which existed before his body; and thus the whole doctrine of the pre-existence of souls, of which the opinion of the pre-existence of Christ is a branch, will be effectually overturned.

The doctrine of Materialism was copiously discussed, and warmly patronized, by the late Dr. Priestley, who states it as a primary axiom, 'that the power of sensation, or perception, never having been found but in conjunction with a certain organized system of matter, we ought, as philosophers, to conclude, that this power necessarily exists in, and results from, that organized system, unless it can be shown to be incompatible with other known properties of the same substance.' This, if the premises be granted, will not readily be denied: at the same time, it must be admitted, that constant conjunction implies necessary connexion, only when reasons cannot be discovered to prove the conjunction to be accidental and arbitrary. Indeed, the argument seems to rest on rather similar ground to that ridiculed by Tully, by which Epicurus attempted to prove, 'that the gods had human bodies, because he had never seen a reasonable or intelligent mind, but in such bodies.' The absolute incompatibility of perception with the known and acknowledged properties of the material substance, has been illustrated by Dr. S. Clarke with great ability.

Modern philosophers have been perhaps too hasty in concluding, from the reciprocal influence of the soul and body on each other, that the former, as well as the latter, is material; for, according to the opponents of this doctrine, there are, no doubt, arguments sufficient to evince them to be distinct beings, with different powers, though capable of exerting a mutual influence on each other. In supposing them to do so, there is no absurdity; and that they cannot exert such a mutual influence, allowing them to be distinct substances, is a negative, which, say they, never has been, nor ever can be proved. Every power of the mind, and every property observable in matter, are so essentially different, that the idea of homogeneity in the two substances is too extravagant to be admitted on any other ground than a direct proof of the impossibility of the action of spirit on matter, without the existence of some common property. The orthodox opinion, therefore, is, that the soul is simple, uncompounded, and immaterial, or incorporeal, and distinct from matter. On this head, Christians in general, however widely they may differ on other points, are fully agreed; and, indeed, so well satisfied in regard to it, that you will scarcely find one of a thousand who, on being questioned, will not be ready to answer with Sterne: 'I am positive I have a soul; nor can all the books with which materialists have pestered the world ever convince me to the contrary.'

It is further observed, that, independently of what has been said against the doctrine of Materialism by others, the question seems now at length to be determined, and the modern theory of the materialists shaken from its very foundation, by Dr. Ferrier, who has proved anatomically concerning the brain, by evidence apparently complete, that every part of it has been injured without affecting the act of thought.

Mr. Locke seems to suppose it possible that there may be some such unknown substratum, as may be capable of receiving the properties both of matter and of mind, namely, extension, solidity, and cogitation; for he supposes it possible for God to add cogitation to that substance which is corporeal, and thus to cause matter to think. If this be true, spirits then (for aught we know) may be corporeal beings; which is a doctrine very favourable to the mortality of the soul.

But the question respecting the immateriality of the soul is not perhaps of so great consequence as some may imagine; for, when we consider the nature and attributes of God, the faculties of man, and the constitution of the world in which he is placed, there are the best grounds for believing, that he is an accountable being; and we may rest assured, that of whatever materials his sentient part is composed, Omnipotence will not want the means of placing him hereafter in an accountable state, so as that he shall be obliged to give an account of his conduct.

The advocates for Materialism are so far from allowing that their doctrine militates against the hopes of a resurrection, that they insist it is not only more philosophical, but also points out 'more fully the necessity, and value of a resurrection from the dead;' on which alone, say they, the sacred writers build all our hope of a future life. (1 Cor. xv. 16. 32, &c.) See NECESSITARIANS.—Adam's Religious World, vol. ii. pp. 207—212.

MATTHEW, Ματθαῖος, signifies given. St. Matthew, an apostle and evangelist, was son of Alpheus, a Galilean by birth, a Jew by religion, and a publican by profession. (Mark ii. 14. Luke v. 27.) The other evangelists call him only Levi, which was his Hebrew name; but he always calls himself Matthew, which probably was his name as a publican, or officer for gathering taxes. His usual abode was at Capernaum; and his office was out of the town, at the Sea of Tiberias, where he appears to have collected the customs due upon commodities which were carried, and from persons who passed, over the sea. As he was sitting at the place where he received these customs, our Saviour commanded him to follow him. Matthew immediately obeyed; and from that time he became a constant attendant upon our Saviour, and was appointed one of the twelve apostles. Soon after his call, Matthew made an entertainment at his house, at which were present Christ and some of his disciples, and also several publicans. (Matt. ix. 10, 11, &c.) After the ascension of our Saviour, he continued, with the other apostles, to preach the Gospel for some time in Judea; but as there is no farther account of him in any writer of the first four centuries, it is uncertain into what country he afterwards went, and also in what manner, and at what time, he died. What the Scripture says, that he was son of Alpheus, has given occasion to some to suppose that he was brother of James, son of Alpheus, or James the Less: but this is not probable.

In the few writings which remain of the apostolical fathers are manifest allusions to several passages in St. Matthew's Gospel; but the Gospel itself is not mentioned in any one of them. Papias, the companion of Polycarp, is the earliest author upon record that has expressly named Matthew as the author of a Gospel. The work itself of Papias is lost; but the quotation in Eusebius is such as to convince us, that in the time of Papias no doubt was entertained of the genuineness of St. Matthew's Gospel. The Gospel is repeatedly quoted by Justin Martyr, but the name of Matthew is not mentioned. It is both frequently quoted, and St. Matthew mentioned as its author, by Irenæus, Origen, Athanasius, Cyril, Epiphanius, Jerome, Chrysostom, and a long train of subsequent writers. Indeed it was universally received by the Christian church; and we may therefore conclude, upon the concurrent testimony of antiquity, that this Gospel is rightly ascribed to St. Matthew.

It is generally agreed, upon the most satisfactory evidence, that St. Matthew's Gospel was the first that was written: but though this is asserted by many ancient authors, none of them, except Irenæus and Eusebius, have said any thing concerning the exact time in which it was written. The only passage in which the former of these fathers mentions this subject is so obscure, that no positive conclusion can be drawn from it; and Eusebius, who lived a hundred and fifty years after Irenæus, merely says, that Matthew wrote his Gospel just before he left Judea to preach the religion of Christ in other countries; but, when that was, neither he nor any other ancient author informs us with certainty. The impossibility of settling this point upon ancient authority has occasioned a variety of opinions among moderns. Of the several dates assigned to this Gospel which deserve any attention, the earliest is the year 38, and the latest the year 64. It appears very improbable that the Christians should be left any considerable number of years without a written history of our Saviour's ministry. It is certain that the apostles, immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, which took place only ten days after the ascension of our Saviour into heaven, preached the Gospel to the Jews with great success. Hence it is reasonable to suppose, that an authentic account of our Saviour's doctrines and miracles would very soon be committed to writing, for the confirmation of those who believed in his Divine mission, and for the conversion of others; and, more particularly, to enable the Jews to compare the circumstances of the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus with their ancient prophecies respecting the Messiah. We may conceive that the apostles would be desirous of losing no time in writing an account of the miracles which Jesus performed, and of the discourses which he delivered, because the sooner such an account was published, the easier it would be to inquire into its truth and accuracy; and consequently, when these points were satisfactorily ascertained, the greater would be its weight and authority. These arguments appear strong in favour of an early publication of some history of our Saviour's ministry; and it may perhaps be acceded to the opinion of Mr. Jones, Mr. Wetstein, Dr. Owen, and Bishop Tomline, that St. Matthew's Gospel was written in the year 38.

There has also of late been great difference of opinion concerning the language in which St. Matthew wrote his Gospel. Many of the ancients, who allow the other Gospels to have been written in Greek, have delivered it as their opinion that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew. Mr. Wetstein says, 'Here we are of opinion that the Fathers do not so properly bear testimony, as deliver their own conjecture; which needs not be admitted, if it be not supported by good reasons, or may be refuted by probable arguments. Supposing, and taking it for granted, that Matthew wrote for the Jews in Judea, they concluded that he wrote in Hebrew. But there is no weight in that reason. The Greek language was at that time much used throughout the whole Roman empire, and particularly in Judea. Papias, who first advanced this opinion, was a weak and credulous man. Nor are there in our Greek Gospel any marks of its being a translation from another language.' Dr. Jortin observes, that 'in the time of Christ and his apostles the Greek was really the universal language. The New Testament is a proof of this, if proof were wanting. And this is one reason among many others, why St. Matthew probably wrote his Gospel in Greek.' The presumption, indeed, is strongly in favour of the opinion, that St. Matthew wrote his Gospel in Greek. But as the main point in dispute is, whether the present Greek copy is entitled to the authority of an original or not; and as this is a question of real and serious importance, the principal arguments on both sides deserve consideration. The advocates of the Hebrew Gospel, Campbell, Michaelis, Marsh, &c. lay most stress on the testimonies of Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, A.D. 116, of Irenæus, A.D. 178, and the learned Origen, A.D. 230, which have been followed by several of the Fathers, Jerome, &c. Papias, as cited by Eusebius, says, 'Matthew composed the [sacred] oracles in the Hebrew dialect, and each interpreted them as he was able.' 2. Irenæus, as cited by Eusebius, says, 'Matthew published also a Scripture of the Gospel among the Hebrews, in their own dialect.' 3. Origen, as cited by Eusebius, says, 'As I have learned by tradition, concerning the four Gospels, which alone are received, without dispute, by the whole church of God under heaven. The first was written by Matthew, once a publican, afterwards an apostle of Jesus Christ; who published it for the believers from Judaism, composed in Hebrew letters.' On the other hand, Whitby, Lardner, Jones, Jortin, &c. contend, 1. that the testimony of Papias is vague and obscure; that he had not seen the Hebrew Gospel itself; that, by his own account, it could not have been intended for universal circulation, because every one was not able to interpret it; and that the Greek Gospel was published before his time, as appears from the express or tacit references to it, of Barnabas the apostle, A.D. 71, Clements Romanus, A.D. 96, Hermas, A.D. 100, Ignatius, A.D. 107, and Polycarp, A.D. 108, who were all prior to Papias, who all wrote in Greek, and who, unquestionably, referred to the Greek Gospels. 2. Irenæus, more critically translated, may well be understood to signify, that, in addition to his Greek Gospel, Matthew published also a Hebrew Gospel for the benefit of the Hebrews, or converts from Judaism, who used the vernacular language of Palestine. This was most probably the fact. This was the original basis of the Gospel of the Nazarenes, the Gospel of the Ebionites, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, cited by Origen, Epiphanius, and Jerome, which in process of time became so adulterated by these Judaizing converts, as to lose all authority in the church, and to be reckoned spurious. 3. With this the testimony of Origen perfectly corresponds; for surely when he cited tradition for the existence of a Hebrew Gospel written by Matthew for the converts from Judaism, he by no means denied, but rather presupposed, his Greek Gospel, written for all classes of Christians, composing the whole church of God under heaven, for whose use the Hebrew Gospel would be utterly inadequate. Indeed, it is sufficiently evident that Origen himself considered the Greek as the only authentic original in his time. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. pp. 664—666; Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. pp. 45, 46; Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. pp. 296—301.

MATTHIAS, Μαθίας, signifies gift of the Lord. Matthias, the Apostle, was first in the rank of our Saviour's disciples, and one of those who continued with him from his baptism to his ascension. (Acts i. 21, 22.) It is very probable that he was of the number of the Seventy, as Clement of Alexandria, and other ancients, inform us. After the ascension of our Lord, the apostles retired to Jerusalem in expectation of the effusion of the Holy Ghost, as had been promised; and Peter stood up in the midst of the brethren, and proposed to fill up the place of Judas. To this the disciples agreed. Then they presented two persons, Joseph called Barsabas, and surnamed Justus; and Matthias. The lot fell on Matthias, who was associated with the eleven apostles.

There was a Gospel ascribed to Matthias; but it was universally rejected as spurious.

MEAT. The Hebrews had several kinds of animals which they refused to eat. Among domestic animals they only ate the cow, the sheep, and the goat; the hen and the pigeon, among domestic birds; besides several kinds of wild animals. To eat the flesh with the blood was forbidden them, much more to eat the blood without the flesh. We may form a judgment of their taste by what the Scripture mentions of Solomon's table. (1 Kings iv. 22, 23.) Thirty measures of the finest wheat flour were provided for it every day, and twice as much of the ordinary sort; twenty stall-fed oxen, twenty pasture-oxen, an hundred sheep, besides the venison of deer, roebucks, does, and wild fowls. It does not appear that the ancient Hebrews were very nice about the seasoning and dressing of their food. We find among them roast meat, boiled meat, and ragouts. They roasted the paschal lamb.

At the first settling of the Christian church, very great disputes arose concerning the use of meats offered to idols. Some newly converted Christians, convinced that an idol was nothing, and that the distinction of clean and unclean creatures was abolished by our Saviour, ate indifferently of whatever was served up to them, even among Pagans, without inquiring whether these meats had been offered to idols. They took the same liberty in buying meat sold in the markets, not regarding whether it was pure or impure according to the Jews, or whether it had been offered to idols. But other Christians, weaker, or less instructed, were offended at this liberty, and thought to eat of meat that had been offered to idols, was a kind of partaking of that wicked and sacrilegious offering. This diversity in opinion produced some scandal, for which St. Paul thought it behoved him to provide a remedy. (Rom. xiv. 20. Tit. i. 15.) He determined, therefore, that all things were clean to such as were clean, and that an idol was nothing at all; that a man might safely eat of whatever was sold in the shambles, and need not scrupulously inquire whence it came; that if an unbeliever should invite a believer to eat with him, the believer might eat of whatever was set before him, &c. (1 Cor. x. 25, 26, 27.) But at the same time he enjoins, that the law of charity and prudence should be observed; that men should be cautious of scandalizing or offending weak minds; and that though all things may be lawful, yet all things are not always expedient; that no one ought to seek his own accommodation or satisfaction, but that of his neighbour; that if any one should say to us, 'This has been offered to idols,' we may not then eat of it, for the sake of him who gives the information, not so much for fear of wounding our own conscience, as his: in a word, that he who is weak, and thinks he may not indifferently use all sorts of food, should forbear, and eat herbs. (Rom. xiv. 1, 2.) Yet it is certain, that generally Christians abstained from eating meat that had been offered to idols.

ME'DIA, Μέδία, signifies measure, habit, or covering, otherwise abundance. It has been commonly thought, that Media was peopled by the descendants of Madai, son of Japheth. (Gen. x. 2.) The Greeks maintain that this country took its name from Medus the son of Medea. If, however, Madai and his immediate descendants did not people this country, some of his posterity might have carried his name thither; since we find it so often given to Media, from the times of the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah, and from the transportation of the ten tribes, and the destruction of Samaria under Salmaneser, in the year of the world 3283. The expedition of the Argonauts, in which happened the rape of Medea, took place in the year of the world 2760, about forty years before the taking of Troy. Hence there is nothing impossible in the conjecture of the Greeks, that Media took its name from Medus, the son of Jason and Medea, and nothing contrary to Scripture, which speaks of the Medes from the time of Salmaneser. Dr. Hales says, that Media derived its name from its midland situation between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf.

Media Proper was bounded by Armenia and Assyria Proper, on the west; by Persia, on the east; by the Caspian provinces, on the north; and by Susiana, on the south. It was an elevated and mountainous country, and formed a kind of pass between the cultivated parts of eastern and western Asia. Hence, from its geographical position, and from the temperature, verdure, and fertility of its climate, Media was one of the most important and interesting regions of Asia.

'Into this country,' says Dr. Hales, 'the ten tribes, who composed the kingdom of Israel, were transplanted, in the Assyrian Captivity, by Tiglath-pileser and Salmaneser. The former prince carried away the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, on the east side of Jordan, to Halah, and Habor, and Hara, and to the river of Gozan. His successor carried away the remaining seven tribes and a-half, to the same places, which are said to be 'cities of the Medes, by the river of Gozan.' (1 Chron. v. 26. 2 Kings xvii. 6.) The geographical position of Media was wisely chosen for the distribution of the great body of the captives; for, 1. it was so remote, and so impeded and intersected with great mountains and numerous and deep rivers, that it would be extremely difficult for them to escape from this natural prison, and return to their own country; 2. they would also be opposed in their passage through Kir, or Assyria Proper, not only by the native Assyrians, but also by their enemies, the Syrians, transplanted thither before them; 3. the superior civilization of the Israelites, and their skill in agriculture, and in the arts, would tend to civilize and improve those wild and barbarous regions; and 4. they could safely be allowed more liberty, and have their minds more at ease, than if they were subject to a more rigorous confinement nearer to their native country.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 458.

MEDIATOR, one who stands in a middle office or capacity betwixt two differing parties, and has a power of transacting every thing between them, and of reconciling them to each other. Hence a Mediator between God and man, is one whose office properly is to mediate and transact affairs between them relating to the favour of Almighty God, and the duty and happiness of man.

No sooner had Adam transgressed the law of God in Paradise, and become a sinful creature, than the Almighty was pleased in mercy to appoint a Mediator or Redeemer, who in due time should be born into the world, to make an atonement both for his transgression, and for all the sins of men. This is what is justly thought to be implied in the promise, that 'the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head;' that is, that there should, some time or other, be born, of the posterity of Eve, a Redeemer, who, by making satisfaction for the sins of men, and reconciling them to the mercy of Almighty God, should by that means bruise the head of that old serpent, the devil, who had beguiled our first parents into sin, and, in a great measure, destroy his empire and dominion among men. Thus it became a necessary part of Adam's religion after the fall, as well as of that of his posterity after him, to worship God, through hopes in this Mediator. To keep up the remembrance of it, God was pleased, at this time, to appoint sacrifices of expiation, or atonement for sin, to be observed through all succeeding generations, till the Redeemer himself should come, who was to make the true and only proper satisfaction and atonement.

The custom of sacrificing, which appears to have been so early practised by Adam, and his sons of the very next generation, sufficiently shows the hope they had in a Mediator or Redeemer, who should, in due time, atone the justice of Almighty God by shedding his blood for sinners, and thereby make way for their pardon and reconciliation. The daily sacrifices of the Israelites were appointed as continual types and representations of that one great Sacrifice, that was to be once offered upon the cross for the sins of all mankind. Their high priest, who was to make atonement for the people, was no other than a type of that High Priest, who was, in after times, revealed to make atonement for us by his own blood. If the high priest under the law was permitted, once a year, to enter into the Holy of Holies, there to appear before the presence of the God of heaven, and to intercede with him for the people of Israel, the Scriptures will inform us that all this was intended for no other end or purpose, than to foreshow and point out that High Priest, who, after he had offered up himself a sacrifice for sinners, ascended up into the highest heavens, there to appear in the presence of God for us, and to continue for ever to make intercession for us with his Father.

If the notion of a Mediator so generally prevailed among mankind before the coming of our Saviour; if in the religion God established himself among his own people, for about two thousand years before, he was shadowed out to them under types, and other figurative representations, and yet more clearly described in the prophecies of after times; he in whom all those types and prophecies concurred, and had their full completion, must doubtless be the true Mediator: and thus they all concurred, it is certain, in the person of Jesus Christ. His mediatorial office principally consisted in procuring for us peace and reconciliation with Almighty God. To this end it was necessary that he should take our nature upon him, and become man; that so whatever he should do or suffer, being done by him as man, might be available to us men for our salvation: and as the first Adam, by sinning in our nature, brought sin and misery on his whole posterity; so it was necessary that our Lord, the second Adam, should take our nature upon him, in order to redeem us from it. This he did by his suffering on the cross, when he gave himself a ransom for all; the dignity of his person, as the only begotten Son of God, adding a merit to his sufferings, that rendered him the only fit Mediator to intercede with God for man, and to reconcile us to his Heavenly Father.

Hence, the forgiveness of our sins is so often in Scripture attributed to the death of Christ, as the only meritorious cause of pardon. To this the whole work of our redemption is ascribed; and whatever he was enabled to do for us, as our Mediator, rests on the same foundation. St. Paul, after he has told us that 'the only Mediator between God and man is the man Christ Jesus, immediately adds, 'who gave himself a ransom for all;' plainly intimating that the whole ground of his mediation was the giving himself as a ransom for mankind, and paying the price of their redemption in his own blood. Indeed, whatever he was pleased to suffer as the Son of man must needs be infinitely meritorious, as he was also the Son of God. The union of the divine and human natures, in the person of our Saviour, is one of those incomprehensible mysteries, which we shall never in this life perfectly understand. But whatever were the manner of that union, we are sure the two natures still remained distinct. It was the manhood only that suffered, as St. Paul intimates, by saying, it was 'the Man Christ Jesus who gave himself a ransom for all.' Having thus fully atoned the justice of God for the sins of men by that meritorious sacrifice which he offered upon the cross, he was by that means authorized to offer pardon and salvation to all such as would repent, and believe, and obey his Gospel. Having thus expiated our sins, our Saviour 'sat down at the right hand of the majesty on high.' There he continues still to discharge for us the office of Mediator, by interceding for us with his Father, and pleading the merits of his most precious blood in our behalf, and to the obtaining of pardon and remission of our sins. Hence it is, that we are required to put up all our prayers to God in his name, and to hope for every blessing at his hands, through the merits and mediation alone of our blessed Saviour. Clapham's Sermons, vol. ii. serm. xxvii.

MELCHIZEDEK, מלכ־צֶדֶק, signifies justice. Melchizedek, king of Salem, was priest of the most high God. The Scripture tells us nothing of his father, or of his mother, or of his genealogy, or of his birth, or of his death. (Heb. vii. 1, 2, 3.) In this sense, as St. Paul says, he was a figure of Jesus Christ, who is a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedek, and not according to the order of Aaron, whose origin, life, and death, are known.

When Abraham returned from pursuing the four confederate kings, who had defeated the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xiv. 17, 18, 19, &c.) Melchizedek comes to meet Abraham as far as the valley of Shaveh, afterwards named the king's valley, and presents him with the refreshments of bread and wine; or, he offered bread and wine in sacrifice to the Lord, for he was a priest of the most high God. He blessed Abraham saying, 'Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand.' Abraham, desirous to acknowledge in him the quality of priest of the Lord, offered him the tithes of all he had taken from the enemy. After this there is no mention made of the person of Melchizedek; only the Psalmist (cx. 4.) speaking of the Messiah, says, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.'

St. Paul (Hebrew v. 6—10.) unfolds the mystery of Melchizedek. First he exalts the priesthood of Christ, as a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek, and who in this quality 'in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared.' He also says, that our Saviour as a forerunner is entered for us into heaven, being made an high-priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. For, he adds, to this Melchizedek, king of Salem, and priest of the most high God, Abraham gave tithe. Now Melchizedek is, according to the interpretation of his name, first, king of (sedek) justice; secondly, king of (Salem) peace; who is without father, without mother, without genealogy, who has neither beginning nor end of life. Consider therefore how great this Melchizedek is, since Abraham himself gives him tithe, and receives his blessing. Moreover, Levi, who receives tithes from others, paid it himself, as one may say, in the person of Abraham, since he was still in the loins of Abraham his ancestor, when Melchizedek met this patriarch.

"This Canaanitish prince," observes Dr. Hales, "was early considered as a type of Christ, in the Jewish church—'Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek,' (Psal. cx. 4.) who resembled Christ in the following particulars: 1. in his name, Melchizedek, 'king of righteousness;' 2. in his city, Salem, 'peace;' 3. in his offices of king and priest of the most high God; and 4. in the omission of the names of his parents and genealogy, the time of his birth and length of his life; exhibiting an indefinite reign and priesthood; according to the Apostle's exposition. (Heb. vii. 5.) And from whom, perhaps, our Lord adopted the symbols of bread and wine in the eucharist, as of primitive institution." Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 128.

MELITA, Μελίτη, signifies honey-producing. The island on which St. Paul was shipwrecked is usually reckoned to have been Malta. (Acts xxviii. 1.) However, Mr. Bryant, Dr. Hales, and some other eminent critics and commentators, have endeavoured to show that this could not be, for the vessel was then in Adria, the Adriatic Gulf; (Acts xxvii. 27.) and Malta lay too far to the south to be the island in question. It was, say they, an island on the Illyrian coast near Coreyra Nigra, and is the same as that which was anciently called Μελίτη, Μελήτινν, or Μελέρινν, and is now named Melida or Melede. But Mr. Bloomfield observes, 'that as to the opinion that the Melita here mentioned is the Malta of Illyrium (which is supposed by some writers of celebrity), it has been totally refuted by Cluverius, Scaliger, and Bochart, and is, indeed, preposterous to think of.' That Malta in the Mediterranean Sea is the island intended by St. Luke, Mr. Horne thinks evident for the following reasons: the apostle left the island in a ship of Alexandria that had wintered there, on her voyage to Italy; and after touching at Syracuse and Rhegium, landed at Puteoli, thus sailing in a direct course. The other Melita would be far out of the usual track from Alexandria to Italy; and, in sailing from it to Rhegium, Syracuse also would be out of the direct course. The fact, that the vessel was tossed all night before the shipwreck in the Adriatic Sea, does not militate against the probability of its afterwards being driven upon Malta; because the name Adria was applied to the whole Ionian Sea, which lay between Sicily and Greece. See ADRIA.

The tempestuous wind Euroclydon, which shipwrecked the apostle, was a violent easterly, or N.N.E. wind. (Acts xxvii. 14.) It was called by Herodotus, 'Hellespontine,' which shattered and dispersed the fleet of Xerxes, in the Persian war, and is now denominated by mariners, 'a Levanter.' Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica Annotationis Sacrae, vol. v. p. 258; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 601; Rennell's Herod. p. 119; Bryant's Observations and Enquiries relating to various parts of Ancient History; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 462.

MENNONITES, a sect in the United Provinces, in most respects the same with those in other places called Anabaptists. They had their rise in 1536, when Menno Simon, a native of Friesland, who had been a Romish priest, and a notorious profligate, resigned his rank and office in the Romish church, and publicly embraced the communion of the Anabaptists.

Menno was born at Witmarsum a village in the neighbourhood of Bolswort, in Friesland, in the year 1505, and died in 1561, in the duchy of Holstein, at the country seat of a certain nobleman not far from the city of Oldefloe, who, moved with compassion by the view of the perils to which Menno was exposed, and the snares that were daily laid for his ruin, took him, with certain of his associates, into his protection, and gave him an asylum. The writings of Menno, which are almost all composed in the Dutch language, were published in folio at Amsterdam, in the year 1651. About the year 1557, Menno was earnestly solicited by many of the sect with which he had connected himself, to assume among them the rank and functions of a public teacher; and, as he looked upon the persons who made this proposal to be exempt from the fanatical frenzy of their brethren at Munster (though according to other accounts they were originally of the same stamp, only rendered somewhat wiser by their sufferings), he yielded to their entreaties. From this period to the end of his life, he travelled from one country to another with his wife and children, exercising his ministry, under pressures and calamities of various kinds, that succeeded each other without interruption, and constantly exposed to the danger of falling a victim to the severity of the laws. East and West Friesland, together with the province of Groningen, were first visited by this zealous apostle of the Anabaptists: thence he directed his course into Holland, Guelderland, Brabant, and Westphalia, continued it through the German provinces that lie on the coast of the Baltic Sea, and penetrated as far as Livonia. In all these places his ministerial labours were attended with remarkable success, and added to his sect a prodigious number of proselytes. Hence he is deservedly considered as the common chief of almost all the Anabaptists, and the parent of the sect that still subsists under that denomination. Menno was a man of genius, though not of a very sound judgment; he possessed a natural and persuasive eloquence, and such a degree of learning as made him pass for an oracle in the estimation of the multitude. He appears, moreover, to have been a man of probity, of a meek and tractable spirit, gentle in his manners, pliable and obsequious in his commerce with persons of all ranks and characters, and extremely zealous in promoting practical religion and virtue, which he recommended by his example as well as by his precepts. The plan of doctrine and discipline drawn up by Menno was of a much more mild and moderate nature than that of the furious and fanatical Anabaptists, whose tumultuous proceedings have been narrated under that article; but it was rather more severe, though more clear and consistent, than the doctrine of the wiser branches of that sect, who aimed at nothing more than the restoration of the Christian church to its primitive purity. Accordingly, he condemned the plan of ecclesiastical discipline, which was founded on the prospect of a new kingdom to be miraculously established by Jesus Christ on the ruins of civil government and the destruction of human rulers, and which had been the pestilential source of such dreadful commotions, such execrable rebellions, and such enormous crimes. He declared, publicly, his dislike of that doctrine which pointed out the approach of a marvellous reformation in the church, by the means of a new and extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit. He expressed his abhorrence of the licentious tenets which several of the Anabaptists had maintained, with respect to the lawfulness of polygamy and divorce, and finally considered, as unworthy of toleration, those fanatics who were of opinion that the Holy Ghost continued to descend into the minds of many chosen believers, in as extraordinary a manner as he did at the first establishment of the Christian church, and that he testified his peculiar presence to several of the faithful, by miracles, predictions, dreams, and visions of various kinds. He retained, indeed, the doctrines commonly received among the Anabaptists, in relation to the baptism of infants, the Millenium, or thousand years' reign of Christ on earth, the exclusion of magistrates from the Christian church, the abolition of war, the prohibition of oaths, enjoined by our Saviour, and the vanity, as well as the pernicious effects of human science. But while Menno retained these doctrines in a general sense, he explained and modified them in such a manner, as made them resemble the religious tenets that were universally received in the Protestant churches; and this rendered them agreeable to many, and made them appear inoffensive even to numbers who had no inclination to embrace them. It, however, so happened, that the nature of the doctrines considered in themselves, the eloquence of Menno, which set them off to such advantage, and the circumstances of the times, gave a high degree of credit to the religious system of this famous teacher among the Anabaptists, so that it made a rapid progress in that sect. Thus it was in consequence of the ministry of Menno that the different sorts of Anabaptists agreed together in excluding from their communion the fanatics who dishonoured it, and in renouncing all tenets that were detrimental to the authority of civil government, and, by an unexpected coalition, formed themselves into one community.

Though the Mennonites usually pass for a sect of Anabaptists, yet M. Herman Schyn, a Mennonite minister, who published their history and apology, maintains that they are not Anabaptists either in principle or by origin. However, nothing can be more certain than that the first Mennonite congregations were composed of the different sorts of Anabaptists; of those who had always been inoffensive and upright, and of those who, before their conversion by the ministry of Menno, had been seditious fanatics. Besides, it is alleged, that the Mennonites do actually retain at this day some of those opinions and doctrines which led the seditious and turbulent Anabaptists of old to the commission of so many and such enormous crimes. Such, in particular, is the doctrine concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom, or of the church of the New Testament, though modified in such a manner as to have lost its noxious qualities, and to be no longer pernicious in its influence.

The Mennonites are subdivided into several sects, of which the two principal are the Flandrians, or Flemingians, and the Waterlandians. The former derived their name from their being principally natives of Flanders; the latter, from a district in North-Holland, called Waterland, which they inhabited. The opinions, says Mosheim, that are held in common by the Mennonites, seem to be all derived from this fundamental principle,—that the kingdom which Christ established upon earth is a visible church, or community, into which the holy and just alone are to be admitted, and which is consequently exempt from all those institutions and rules of discipline, that have been invented by human wisdom for the correction and reformation of the wicked. This fanatical principle was avowed by the ancient Mennonites; but it is now almost wholly renounced. Yet, from this ancient doctrine many of the religious opinions that distinguish the Mennonites from all other Christian communities seem to be derived. In consequence of this doctrine, they admit none to the sacrament of baptism except persons that are come to the full use of their reason; they neither admit civil rulers into their communion, nor allow any of their members to perform the functions of magistracy; they pretend to deny the lawfulness of repelling force by force, and consider war, in all its shapes, as unchristian and unjust; they entertain the utmost aversion to the execution of justice, and more especially to capital punishments; and they also refuse to confirm their testimony by an oath. The particular sentiments that divided the more considerable societies of the Mennonites are the following. The rigid Mennonites, called the Flemingians, maintain, with various degrees of rigour, the opinions of their founder Menno as to the human nature of Christ, alleging that it was produced in the womb of the Virgin by the creating power of the Holy Ghost; the obligation that binds us to wash the feet of strangers, in consequence of our Saviour's command; the necessity of excommunicating and avoiding, as one would do the plague, not only avowed sinners, but all those who depart, even in some slight instances pertaining to dress, &c. from the simplicity of their ancestors; the contempt due to human learning; and other matters of less moment. However, this austere system declines; and the rigid Mennonites are gradually approaching towards the opinions and discipline of the more moderate, or Waterlandians.

The first settlement of the Mennonites in the United Provinces was granted them by William, Prince of Orange, towards the close of the sixteenth century; but it was not before the following century that their liberty and tranquillity were fixed upon solid foundations, when, by a confession of faith published in the year 1626, they cleared themselves from the imputations of those pernicious and detestable errors that had been laid to their charge. In order to appease their intestine discords, a considerable part of the Anabaptists of Flanders, Germany, and Friesland, concluded their debates in a conference held at Amsterdam in the year 1630, and entered into the bonds of fraternal communion, each reserving to themselves a liberty of retaining certain opinions. This association was renewed and confirmed by new resolutions in the year 1649; in consequence of which the rigorous laws of Menno and his successors were in various respects mitigated and corrected. See ANABAPTISTS. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 142—161; v. p. 45, 46.

MEPHIB/OSHETH, מִפְּיִשֶׁת, signifies out of my mouth proceeds reproach. MEPHIBOSHETH, son of Saul, and of his concubine Rizpah, was delivered up by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord. (2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9.)

MEPHIBOSHETH, son of Jonathan, otherwise named Meribbaal. Mephibosheth was very young, when his father Jonathan was killed in the battle of Gilboa. (2 Sam. iv. 4.) His nurse was in such consternation at this news, that she let the child fall, who from this accident was lame all his life. When David found himself in peaceable possession of the kingdom, he sought for all that remained of the house of Saul, that he might be kind to them in consideration of the friendship between him and Jonathan. He learned that there was a son of Jonathan called Mephibosheth, in the house of Ziba, a servant of Saul. The king sent for him, and told him that for the sake of Jonathan his father he would show kindness to him, that he should have his grandfather's estate, and eat always at his table. At the same time he told Ziba, that he had given Mephibosheth all that belonged to Saul. (2 Sam. ix. 1, &c.)

Some years after this, when Absalom forced his father to leave Jerusalem, Mephibosheth ordered his servant Ziba to saddle him an ass, that he might accompany David; for, being lame, he could not go on foot. But Ziba went after David himself with two asses laden with provisions, and told him that Mephibosheth staid at Jerusalem, in hopes that the people of Israel would restore him to the throne of his ancestors. Then said David to Ziba, I give to you all that belonged to Mephibosheth. But when David returned to Jerusalem in peace, Mephibosheth appeared before him in deep mourning, having neither washed his feet, nor shaved his beard, since the king went. When David saw him, he learned the truth from him; nevertheless Ziba continued to possess half his estate. Mephibosheth left a son named Micah. The time of his death is not known. (1 Chron. viii. 34.)

ME'RAB, מֶרַב, signifies he that fights, or disputes; otherwise, that multiplies; or mistress. Merab was the eldest daughter of King Saul. She was promised to David in marriage, in reward for his victory over Goliath; yet Saul gave her to Adriel, the son of Barzillai, the Meholahite. (1 Sam. xiv. 49.; xviii. 17—19.) Merab had by him six sons, who were delivered to the Gibeonites, and hanged before the Lord. The text insinuates, that the six men that were delivered to the Gibeonites, were the sons of Michal, daughter of Saul, and wife of Adriel. But there is great suspicion, that the name of Michal has been inserted in the text instead of Merab. For 1. Michal did not marry Adriel, but Phaltiel; and 2. we nowhere read that Michal had six sons. Others think, these six were sons of Merab by birth, but of Michal by adoption.

MESOPOTA'MIA, אֲרַם נַהֲרַיִם, in Hebrew, Aram-naharaim, that is, Syria of the two rivers. The Greek word Mesopotamia also signifies between the two rivers. Mesopotamia is a famous province, situated between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. The Hebrews call it Aram-Naharaim, or Aram of the rivers, because it was first peopled by Aram, father of the Syrians, and is situated between two rivers. This country is celebrated in Scripture as the first dwelling of men after the Deluge; and because it gave birth to Phaleg, Heber, Terah, Abraham, Nahor, Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Leah, and to the sons of Jacob. Babylon was in the ancient Mesopotamia, till by vast labour and industry the two rivers, Tigris and Euphrates, were reunited in one channel. The plains of Shinar were in this country. Balaam, son of Beor, was of Mesopotamia. (Deut. xxiii. 4.) Cushanrishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, subdued the Hebrews. (Judg. iii. 8.)

Besides the country commonly called Mesopotamia in Greek, Padan-aram, the plains of Aram, and Aram-Naharaim, in Hebrew, Syria of the two rivers, some mention another in Syria, between the river Marsyas and Orontes. This opinion is founded on what follows. First, the term Mesopotamia signifies simply a country lying between two rivers; and hence this name may be given to any country in such a situation, whatever rivers enclose it. Secondly, the title of Psalm lx. intimates, that David burnt Mesopotamia of Syria, and Syria of Zobah. But it is known that David did not make war with king Zobah but to enlarge his conquests as far as the Euphrates, and that Syria of Zobah was beyond this river. Thirdly, the book of Judith (ii. 24.) says, that Holofernes passed over the Euphrates, went through Mesopotamia, and destroyed all the high cities. It is certain, that this general came out of Assyria. Mesopotamia, properly so called, was in obedience to Nebuchadnezzar his master. He therefore passed over the Euphrates into Mesopotamia of Syria, of which we are speaking, and which was very different from that known to the Greeks and Romans between the Tigris and Euphrates. It remains to be inquired whether these objections are sufficiently strong to set aside the opinion of geographers, who acknowledge only one Mesopotamia, namely Aram-Naharaim. If the texts on which the objection is founded can be explained without the expedient of a second Mesopotamia, we ought not to have recourse to it. The title of Psalm lx. is of little authority, as the greater part of the titles of the Psalms have been placed there long after the authors composed them. Besides, it may be explained by saying, that David fought with Mesopotamia of Syria; that is, that he conquered the auxiliary troops which came from Mesopotamia, beyond the river Euphrates, to the assistance of Hadarezear and the Ammonites. (2 Sam. x. 16. 19.) With respect to the passage of Judith, it may be said, that Holofernes went over the Euphrates twice, by himself in person, or by his captains. The first time when he came into Syria and Cilicia, and reduced those provinces; the second time when he had conquered them, and when he re-passed the Euphrates to reduce some other people. It is not affirmed that he passed in his own person through all the countries mentioned in Judith. It is sufficient if this was done under his orders, and by his troops. Hence it appears, that nothing in the two texts objected obliges us to acknowledge this second Mesopotamia.

MESSIAH, משיח, Μεσσίας, Χριστός, signifies anointed. This name is given principally, and by way of eminence, to that sovereign Deliverer formerly expected by the Jews, and still expected by them to this day. The Jews used to anoint kings, high-priests, and sometimes prophets. Saul, David, Solomon, and Joash, kings of Judah, received the royal unction. Aaron and his sons received the sacerdotal unction; and Elisha, the disciple of Elijah, the prophetic unction. (1 Kings xix. 16.) But sometimes the phrase 'to anoint for an employment,' signifies only a particular designation or choice for such an employment. It is said (2 Sam. xix. 10.) that the Israelites had anointed Absalom to be their king; but it does not appear that he received the royal unction. Cyrus, who founded the empire of the Persians, and who set the Jews at liberty, is called 'the anointed of the Lord.' (Isaiah xlv. 1.) In Ezekiel (xxviii. 14), the name of Messiah is given to the king of Tyre.

St. Luke (iv. 18.) relates, that our Saviour entering a synagogue at Nazareth, opened the book of the prophet Isaiah, and read as follows: 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor.' He then showed them, that this prophecy was accomplished in his own person. St. Peter speaking to Cornelius, the centurion, (Acts x. 37.) says, 'God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power.' It is not recorded, that Jesus Christ ever received any external official unction; and, therefore, his anointing must be understood in a figurative and spiritual sense, to denote his designation or appointment to the office of Messiah. Some, however, have supposed, that when the Spirit descended on Jesus, at his baptism, he then received a peculiar, solemn, and appropriate unction.

Of the many prophecies in the Old Testament, that relate to the coming of the Messiah, we shall only mention those which most distinctly point out the appearance of this great Personage. The first is the promise made to our first parents immediately after the Fall, contained in the sentence pronounced against the serpent, that had betrayed Eve, (Gen. iii. 14, 15.): 'Because thou hast done this,' said God, 'thou art cursed above all cattle. And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.' This prophecy, in the opinion of all the Christian expositors, relates to the destruction of the empire of sin, or Satan, by the coming and death of the Messiah, who was to be born of a woman. The next prophecy is that of the patriarch Jacob, when upon his death-bed he gave his prophetic blessings to all his sons. On this occasion, the good old man is very particular in blessing Judah, of whose seed and tribe our Lord was born: 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, till Shiloh come.' (Gen. xlix. 10.) Shiloh here signifies the person sent; and this was always interpreted by the Jewish doctors as a direct prophecy concerning the sending of the Messiah. The completion of it was very remarkable in the coming of our Saviour. Israel long enjoyed a sceptre of its own; and even after they were in subjection to the Romans, they had a governor over them of the tribe of Judah, till a little before the birth of Christ, when Herod obtained the kingdom, and was the first governor not of Jewish race. Since that period, there has not been any regal power in Judah,—no king, no prince, no governor, ruling over them with the emblem of power, the sceptre; no lawgiver, no judicial authority, has been known among them since the coming of Christ.—The third remarkable prediction concerning the Messiah, is that delivered by the prophet Isaiah, (vii. 14.): 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel,' that is, God with us. The same prophet is very particular in describing the many and great blessings attending the nativity of this divine Personage.—The last prophecy we shall mention under this head, is that of Daniel's seventy weeks, which determines the very time of the coming and death of the Messiah. 'And after three score and ten weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself,' (Dan. ix. 26.): that is, at the end of four hundred and ninety years, reckoning a day for a year, as is usual in the prophetic style. This is the clearest prophecy in the Old Testament respecting the coming of the Messiah; and it determines it to the very time in which Jesus Christ accordingly came.

The ancient Hebrews, being instructed by the prophets, had clear notions of the Messiah; but these were gradually depraved: and when Jesus appeared in Judea, the Jews entertained a false conception of the Messiah, expecting a temporal monarch and conqueror, who should subject the whole world. Hence they were scandalized at the outward appearance, the humility, and seeming weakness of our Saviour. The modern Jews, lying under still greater mistakes, form to themselves chimerical ideas of the Messiah, utterly unknown to their forefathers.

The ancient prophets had foretold, that Messiah should be God and man, exalted and abased, master and servant, priest and victim, king and subject, mortal, and a victor over death, rich and poor; a king, a conqueror, glorious; a man of griefs, involved in infirmities, unknown, in a state of abjection and humiliation. All these contrarieties were to be reconciled in the person of the Messiah, as they really were in the person of Jesus. It was known that the Messiah was to be born (1.) of a virgin, (2.) of the tribe of Judah, (3.) of the race of David, (4.) in the village of Bethlehem; that he was to continue for ever, that his coming was to be concealed, that he was the great prophet promised in the law, that he was both the Son and Lord of David, that he was to perform great miracles, that he should restore all things, that he should die and rise again, that Elias should be the forerunner of his appearance, that a proof of his verity should be the cure of lepers, life restored to the dead, and the Gospel preached to the poor; that he should not destroy, but perfect and fulfil the law; that he should be a stone of offence, and a stumbling-block, against which many should bruise themselves; that he should suffer infinite oppositions and contradictions; that from his time idolatry and impiety should be banished; and that a strange people should submit themselves to his authority.

When Jesus appeared in Judea, these notions were common among the Jews. Our Saviour appeals even to themselves, and asks, if these are not the characters of the Messiah? and if they do not see their completion in himself? The evangelists take care to put the Jews in mind of them, proving by them, that Jesus is the Christ whom they expected. They quote the prophecies made to them, which then were acknowledged to belong to the Messiah, though they have been controverted by the Jews since. It may be seen in the early fathers of the church, and in the most ancient Jewish authors, that in the beginning of Christianity they did not call in doubt many prophecies which their forefathers understood of the Messiah. But in succeeding ages they began to deny that the passages we quote against them should be understood of the Messiah, endeavouring to defend themselves from arguments out of their own Scriptures. After this they fell into new schemes, and new notions, concerning the Messiah.

Some of them, as the famous Hillel, who lived, according to the Jews, before Christ, maintain that the Messiah was already come, in the person of king Hezekiah. Others, that the belief of the coming of the Messiah is no article of faith, and he that denies this doctrine makes only a small breach in the law; he only lops off a branch from the tree, without hurting the root. This was affirmed by Joseph Albo, the Jew, in a conference held in Spain, in the presence of Pope Benedict XIII. Buxtorf says, that the greater part of the modern Rabbins believe that the Messiah has been come a long time, but keeps himself concealed in some part of the world or other, and will not manifest himself, because of the sins of the Jews. Jarchi affirms, that the Hebrews believed the Messiah was born on the day of the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Some assign him the terrestrial paradise for his habitation; others, the city of Rome, where, according to the Talmudists, he keeps himself concealed among the leprous and infirm, at the gate of the city, expecting Elias to come to manifest him.

A great number believe that he is not yet come; but they are strangely divided about the time and circumstances of his coming. Some expect him at the end of six thousand years. They suppose Jesus Christ to be born in the year of the world 3761. Add to this number 1835, it will make 5596—consequently they have 404 years to expect still. Kimchi, who lived in the twelfth century, was of opinion, that the coming of the Messiah was very near. David, the grandson of Maimonides, was advised with in this matter; Maimonides himself had been consulted about it; but neither of them could say any thing to the purpose. At length, tired out with these uncertainties, they have pronounced an anathema against all who shall pretend to calculate the time of the coming of the Messiah.

To reconcile those prophecies which seem to oppose each other, some have had recourse to an hypothesis of two Messiahs,—one in a state of humiliation, in poverty, and sufferings; the other in splendour, glory, and magnificence; but both of them to be mere men. The first is to proceed from the tribe of Joseph, and the family of Ephraim; his father is to be called Huziel, and himself Nehemiah. He is to appear at the head of an army, composed of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, of Benjamin and part of Gad, and shall make war with the Idumæans, for so are designated the Christians and Romans, whose empire they are to destroy, and bring back the Jews in triumph to Jerusalem. The second Messiah is to be of the race of David, is to bring the first Messiah to life again, to assemble all Israel, to raise those that are dead, to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, and to rule over the whole world.

Jesus Christ gives warning to his disciples, that false prophets and false Messiahs should arise, (Mark xiii. 22.); that they should perform signs and wonders, by which even the elect themselves would be in danger. The event has verified his prediction. Every age among the Jews has produced false prophets and false Christs, who have succeeded in deceiving many of that nation. One appeared even in the age of Christ himself; this was Simon Magus, who reported at Samaria that he was the great power of God. (Acts viii. 9.) In the following century, Barchochebas by his impostures drew the most terrible persecutions on the Jews that they had ever suffered. See BARCHOCHÉBAS.

About A.D. 434, there appeared in the isle of Candia a false Messiah, called Moses, who pretended to be the ancient legislator of the Jews, descended from heaven to procure a glorious deliverance for the Jews of that island, by making them pass over the sea, into the Land of Promise. The Jews of Candia were foolish enough to be persuaded by him; many of them jumped into the sea in expectation that it would open to give them a safe passage. A great number were drowned, and the rest got out again as well as they could; the impostor was sought for to be punished, but he disappeared. This made it suspected that he might be some demon, who had assumed a human shape to abuse the Jews.

A.D. 530, there appeared in Palestine a false Messiah called Julian; he gave himself out to be a conqueror, and assured his followers that he would deliver them from the oppression of the Christians by force of arms. Misled by such promises, the Jews took arms, and killed many Christians. But the emperor Justinian sending troops, Julian was taken and executed, and his party dispersed.

A.D. 714, a Jew, called Serenus, pretended to the Spanish Jews that he would conduct them to Palestine, and set up his empire there. Several believed in this new Messiah, forsook their country and their business, and began to follow him. But they soon found him out to be a cheat, and had time enough to repent of their credulity.

The twelfth century was very fruitful in this kind of impostures; there appeared no less than seven or eight in France, Spain, Persia, &c. One, who appeared in Moravia, was said to have the secret of rendering himself invisible when he pleased, and to charm the eyes of those who followed him.

All these impostures, and their ill success, have not been able to cure the Jews of their whimsical notions concerning the Messiah whom they expect. One of their nation, born at Aleppo, in the seventeenth century, called Zabatai Tzevi, attempted about A.D. 1666 to be received as the Messiah. He had concerted this design very early, and learned whatever might be necessary for the better acting of his part. He preached in the fields before the Turks, who only derided him; but his disciples were in great admiration of him. He bragged that he could raise himself up above the clouds, as Isaiah had foretold, (xiv. 14.) And having asked his disciples if they had not seen him do it, he reproached the blindness of those who had sincerity enough not to affirm it. He was summoned before the heads of the synagogue at Smyrna, where he then resided, and was condemned to death: but no one would execute this sentence; so that they were contented to banish him. Having gone through Greece, he came to Alexandria, and thence to Gaza, where he found a Jew called Nathan Levi, or Benjamin, whom he persuaded to act the part of the prophet Elias, who was to go before the Messiah. They came to Jerusalem, where Nathan declared Tzevi to be him whom they expected. Part of the Jews of the country were seduced into the cheat; but the wiser sort opposed, and excommunicated him. Tzevi departed for Constantinople, where the Grand Signior caused him to be apprehended, and ordered him to be run through with a sword, to try if he was invulnerable. Tzevi, however, chose to turn Mahometan rather than suffer death; and thus this imposture ended. Basnage's Hist. of the Jews, tome iii. lib. v. cap. 18; Calmef's Dictionary; *Broughton's Hist. METHODISTS. Name.—The body of Christians to which this name is chiefly and properly applied, are the followers of the Rev. John Wesley, who was the founder of this numerous society. This name was first given to Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, and some serious young students who associated with them, by a student of Merton College, Oxford, on account of the regularity which they maintained in their lives, and pursued in their studies; in allusion to a certain college of physicians at Rome, who flourished about the time of Nero, and were remarkable for putting their patients under regimen, and practising medicine by method, and, therefore, were called Methodists. The term, however, is applied to the followers of Mr. Whitfield, and to the English Independents patronized by the late Countess of Huntingdon. But there is only one body to which the name properly belongs; and these are the followers of John Wesley, whose opinions they hold, and whose discipline they maintain.

Rise and Founders.—The Methodist Society was first founded at Oxford in 1729. Mr. John Wesley, then a fellow of Lincoln College, Mr. Charles Wesley, student of Christ Church, Mr. Richard Morgan, commoner of Christ Church, and Mr. Kirkman of Merton College, set apart some evenings in the week for reading the Greek Testament, conversation, and prayer. The next year, two or three of Mr. John Wesley's pupils, and one of Mr. Charles Wesley's, desired the liberty of meeting with them. In 1732, Mr. Benjamin Ingham, of Queen's College, and Mr. Broughton, of Exeter, were added to the number. Soon after, they were joined by Mr. Clayton, of Brazenose College, and two or three of his pupils, and by Mr. James Hervey, pupil to Mr. John Wesley, and in 1735, by the celebrated Mr. George Whitfield, of Pembroke College, then in his 18th year. This society of Collegians is considered as the first Methodists. They formed rules for the regulation of their time and studies, for reading the Scriptures, and self-examination. They also received the Lord's Supper every week. They visited the prisoners in the castle, and the sick poor in the town; and they instituted a fund for the relief of the poor. In order to accomplish this benevolent design, Mr Wesley abridged himself, not only of all superfluities, but of many of the necessities of life.

In 1735, Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, Mr. Ingham, and Mr. Delamotte, sailed for Georgia, in order to preach the Gospel to the Indians. Whilst on their passage, Mr. John Wesley adopted the plan of preaching extempore; and from that time made it his constant practice, so long as he lived. During the voyage, they still maintained that regularity in the distribution of their time, and that singular seriousness in conversation, which at first procured them the name of Methodists. It appears, however, that they failed in their design of preaching the Gospel to the Indians. Whilst Mr. Wesley was employed at Savannah, several circumstances of a disagreeable nature occurred, which induced him to return to England, after an absence of nearly two years, when he was succeeded by Mr. Whitfield, whose repeated labours in that part of the world are well known.

Upon Mr. Wesley's return to England, he was invited to preach in several churches, but the concourse of people who followed him being great, and some of his tenets rather strange, the genteel part of the congregation were annoyed by the crowds, and the clergy took offence at his doctrines, so that the churches in general were soon shut against him. He was, therefore, at length compelled to take the open air, and commence field preacher. This seeming departure from decorum he justified on several grounds, among which he observes, that field preaching was a sudden expedient, and a thing submitted to, rather than chosen; 'because,' says he, 'I thought preaching even thus, better than not preaching at all.' This may be considered as the commencement of his itinerancy. On May 1, 1738, Mr. Wesley formed his hearers into a society, in which he was assisted by Peter Bohler, a young Moravian teacher; and this was the first regular society formed by Mr. Wesley, though it seems he did not consider this as the origin of Methodism, which he referred to an earlier period. The Rev. George Whitfield had, during this time, been labouring chiefly in America, where he imbibed certain doctrines, contrary to those taught by Mr. Wesley. On his return to England, in 1741, a separation took place between him and Mr. Wesley. See WHITFIELDITES.

Progress and Present State of Methodism.

—Mr. Wesley finding his societies increasing very fast in London, Bristol, and other places, selected from his followers those whom he thought the best qualified to instruct the rest. This was the origin of his lay-preachers. We are told by a follower of Mr. Wesley, that he was at first exceedingly averse from employing them; but that having in vain solicited assistance from some of the established clergy, and not being able to give due attention to all his societies, and at the same time to extend his sphere of action, necessity obliged him to have recourse to this measure. Speaking of these ‘unlettered men,’ Mr. Wesley affirmed, that they had ‘help from God for that great work, the saving of souls from death, since he had enabled, and did enable them still, to turn many to righteousness.—Thus hath he destroyed the wisdom of the wise, and brought to nought the understanding of the prudent.’ Though Mr. Wesley and some of his associates had taken orders regularly in the church of England, yet this circumstance, which increased their ministerial respectability in the general estimation, did not add to their consequence in the opinion of the devotees of grace, who were ready to listen with profound attention to the effusions of the lowest and most illiterate mechanics. We are told, indeed, that the labours of these unlettered men were eminently useful in every part of the kingdom, and numerous societies were formed. Even the colliers of Kingswood, and the miners of Cornwall, who were extremely ignorant, ferocious, and wicked, listened to the discourses of these itinerants, by whom some thousands of them were reclaimed from their vicious courses.

It appears from the minutes of the eighty-fifth annual conference, held in London, in July and August 1828, that the following number of members belong to the Methodist Society:—

|------------------------------|---------|
| In Great Britain..... | 245,194 |
| In Ireland..... | 22,760 |
| In our foreign stations..... | 36,917 |

|--|---------|
| Under the British and Irish conferences..... | 304,871 |
| Under the American conferences in 1827..... | 381,997 |

Total number throughout the world 686,868

This number, however, is exclusive of regular travelling preachers, who are statedly employed in the work of the ministry. Of these, and of supernumerary and superannuated preachers, the number is as follows:—

|-------------------------------------|-----|
| In Great Britain, | |
| Regular preachers..... | 741 |
| Supernumerary and superannuated | 88 |
| In Ireland, | |
| Regular preachers in the circuits.. | 87 |

| Regular preachers and assistant missionaries on the list..... | 169 |
| Supernumerary and superannuated preachers..... | 3 |
| In the American connection in 1827, | |
| Regular preachers in circuits, and missionaries to the Indians..... | 1465 |
| Supernumerary and superannuated preachers..... | 111 |
| Total of preachers throughout the world..... | 2722 |

From the same minutes it appears, that there has been an increase in the year ending July 1828, of 7955 members in Great Britain, and of 161 in Ireland, as compared with the minutes of the year 1827; and that there was an increase in the United States of America of 21,197 in the year 1827. The Methodist Magazine for February 1829, states that the receipts for the Wesleyan Methodist Societies, for the last year, amounted to upwards of fifty thousand pounds, and that the expenditure was upwards of forty-six thousand pounds. The same work also states, that the amount of contributions for the Methodist Societies, from the 13th day of December 1828, is 16,566*l.* 7*s.*

Doctrines.—1. The Methodists hold the doctrine of Original Sin. They maintain the total fall of man in Adam, and his utter inability to recover himself, or take one step towards his recovery, ‘without the grace of God preventing him, that he may have a good will, and working with him, when he has that good will.’

2. They hold General Redemption. They assert ‘that Christ, by the grace of God, tasted death for every man.’ This grace they call free, as extending itself freely to all. They say, that ‘Christ is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe;’ and that consequently they are authorized to offer salvation to all, and ‘preach the Gospel to every creature.’

3. They hold Justification by Faith. ‘Justification,’ says Mr. Wesley, ‘sometimes means our acquittal at the last day. (Matt. xii. 37.) But this is altogether out of the present question; for that justification whereof our articles and homilies speak, signifies present forgiveness, pardon of sins, and consequently acceptance with God, who therein (Rom. iii. 25.) declares his righteousness, or justice, and mercy, by or for ‘the remission of the sins that are past, saying, I will be merciful to thy unrighteousness, and thine iniquities I will remember no more.’ I believe the condition of this is faith, (Rom. iv. 5, &c.); I mean not only, that without faith we cannot be justified; but also, that as soon as any one has true faith, in that moment he is justified.

Faith, in general, is a Divine supernatural evidence, or conviction, of things not seen, not discoverable by our bodily senses, as being either past, future, or spiritual. Justifying faith implies, not only a Divine evidence, or conviction, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, but a sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins; that he loved me, and gave himself for me. And the moment a penitent sinner believes this, God pardons and absolves him.'

This faith, Mr. Wesley affirms, 'is the gift of God. No man is able to work it in himself. It is a work of Omnipotence. It requires no less power thus to quicken a dead soul, than to raise a body that lies in the grave. It is a new creation, and none can create a soul anew, but He who at first created the heavens and the earth. It is the free gift of God, which he bestows, not on those who are worthy of his favour, not on such as are previously holy, and so fit to be crowned with all the blessings of his goodness, but on the ungodly and unholy: on those who, till that hour, were fit only for everlasting destruction; those in whom was no good thing, and whose only plea was, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.' No merit, no goodness, in man, precedes the forgiving love of God. His pardoning mercy supposes nothing in us but a sense of mere sin and misery; and to all who see, and feel, and own, their wants, and their utter inability to remove them, God freely gives faith, for the sake of him in whom he is always well pleased.'

'Good works follow this faith, (Luke vi. 43.) but cannot go before it; much less can sanctification, which implies a continued course of good works, springing from holiness of heart. But it is allowed, that entire sanctification goes before our justification, at the last day. (Heb. xii. 14.) It is allowed also, that repentance, (Mark i. 15.) and fruits meet for repentance, (Matt. iii. 8.) go before faith. Repentance absolutely must go before faith; fruits meet for it, if there be an opportunity.'

Mr. Wesley maintained also salvation in general by faith. 'By salvation I mean,' says he, 'not barely, according to the vulgar notion, deliverance from hell, or going to heaven, but a present deliverance from sin; a restoration of the soul to its primitive health, its original purity; a recovery of the Divine nature; the renewal of our souls after the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness, in justice, mercy, and truth. This implies all holy and heavenly tempers, and, by consequence, all holiness of conversation. Now, if by salvation we mean a present salvation from sin, we cannot say holiness is the condition of it; for it is the thing itself. Salvation, in this sense, and holiness, are synonymous terms. We must therefore say, "we are saved by faith." Faith is the condition of this salvation; for without faith, we cannot be thus saved.' But though the Methodists renounce all works from having any part in a sinner's justification, yet they maintain that good works uniformly flow from it.

4. The Methodists hold the Witness of the Spirit. This is defined by Mr. Wesley as follows: 'The testimony of the Spirit is an inward impression on the soul, whereby the Spirit of God directly witnesses to my spirit, that I am a child of God; that Jesus Christ hath loved me, and given himself for me; that all my sins are blotted out, and I, even I, am reconciled to God. The manner how the Divine testimony is manifested to the heart, I do not take upon me to explain. Such knowledge is too wonderful and excellent for me, I cannot attain to it. The wind bloweth, and I hear the sound thereof: but I cannot tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth. As no man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man that is in him; so the manner of the things of God knoweth no man, save the Spirit of God. But the fact we know, namely, that the Spirit of God does give a believer such a testimony of his adoption, that, while it is present to the soul, he can no more doubt the reality of his sonship, than he can doubt the shining of the sun, while he stands in the full blaze of his beams.' He also declares his sentiments on this point, in a quotation from Bishop Pearson: 'It is the office of the Holy Ghost,' says that prelate, 'to assure us of the adoption of sons, to create in us a sense of the paternal love of God towards us, to give us an earnest of our everlasting inheritance. The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us. (Rom. v. 5.) For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. And because we are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father. For we have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but we have received the Spirit of Adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father; the Spirit itself bearing witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.' (Rom. viii. 14. 16.)

5. They hold Christian Perfection. The Methodists maintain, that, by virtue of the blood of Jesus Christ, and the operations of the Holy Spirit, it is their privilege to arrive at that maturity in grace, and participation of the Divine nature, which excludes sin from the heart, and fills it with perfect love to God and man. This they denominate Christian perfection. The subject will be best stated in their own words, by laying before the reader a few extracts from the minutes of their conferences. Q. 'What is implied in being a perfect Christian?' A. 'The loving the Lord our God with all our heart, and with all our mind, and soul, and strength.' (Deut. vi. 5.; xxx. 6. Ezek.

xxxvi. 25. 29.) Q. "Does this imply that all inward sin is taken away?" A. "Without doubt, or how could he be said to be saved from all his uncleannesses?" Q. "Is there any clear Scripture promise of this, that God will save us from all sin?" A. "There is; (Psalm cxxx. 8.) 'He shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.' This is more largely expressed in the prophecy of Ezekiel: 'Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you,' &c. (Ezek. xxxvi. 25—29.) No promise can be more clear. To this the Apostle plainly refers in that exhortation; 'having these promises,' &c. (2 Cor. vii. 1.) Equally clear and express is that ancient promise, 'the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart,' &c. (Deut. xxx. 6.)" Q. "But does any assertion answerable to this occur in the New Testament?" A. "There does, and that laid down in the plainest terms, (1 John iii. 8.): 'For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil;' without any limitation, or restriction; but all sin is the work of the devil; parallel to which is that assertion of St. Paul, (Eph. v. 25—27.) 'Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it,' &c. To the same effect is his assertion, (Rom. viii. 3, 4.) 'God sent his Son, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us,' &c. Q. "Does the New Testament afford any farther ground for expecting to be saved from all sin?" A. "Undoubtedly it does, both in those prayers and commands which are equivalent to the strongest assertions." Q. "What prayers do you mean?" A. "Prayers for entire sanctification; which, were there no such thing, would be mere mockery of God. Such, in particular, are, 1. 'Deliver us from evil;' now when this is done, when we are delivered from all evil, there can be no sin remaining. 2. 'Neither pray I for these alone.' (John xvii. 20. 23.) 3. 'I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' &c. (Ephes. iii. 14. 16. 19.) 4. 'The very God of peace sanctify you wholly. And I pray God,' &c. (1 Thess. v. 23.)" Q. "What commands are there to the same effect?" A. 1. "'Be ye perfect as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' (Matt. v. 48.) 2. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart,' &c. (Matt. xxii. 37.) If the love of God fill all the heart, no sin can be there." Q. "But how does it appear that this is to be done before the moment of death?" A. "First, from the very nature of a command, which is not given to the dead, but to the living. 'Thou shalt love God with all thy heart,' cannot mean thou shalt do this when thou diest, but, while thou livest. Secondly, from express texts of Scripture: 'The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men,' &c. (Titus ii. 11. 14.) 'He hath raised up a horn of salvation for us,' &c. 'That he would grant unto us that we,' &c. (Luke i. 69. 74, 75.)" Q. "Is there any example in Scripture of persons who had attained to this?" A. "Yes, St. John, and all those of whom he says in his First Epistle (iv. 17.) 'Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment, because as he is, so are we in this world.'"

This doctrine Mr. Wesley endeavoured to modify by observing, that 'Christian perfection does not imply an exemption from ignorance or mistake, infirmities or temptations; but it implies the being so crucified with Christ, as to be able to testify, 'I live not, but Christ liveth in me,' (Gal. ii. 20.) and 'hath purified my heart by faith.' (Acts xv. 9.) Again, he observes on the same subject as follows: 'To explain myself a little further on this head, 1. Not only sin, properly so called, that is, a voluntary transgression of a known law; but sin, improperly so called, that is, an involuntary transgression of a divine law, known or unknown, needs the atoning blood. 2. I believe there is no such perfection in this life as excludes these involuntary transgressions, which I apprehend to be naturally consequent on the ignorance and mistakes inseparable from mortality. 3. Therefore sinless perfection is a phrase I never use, lest I should seem to contradict myself. 4. I believe a person filled with the love of God is still liable to these involuntary transgressions. 5. Such transgressions you may call sins, if you please; I do not, for the reasons above mentioned.'

Church Discipline and Government.—Mr. Wesley drew up certain regulations, or rules, which are still observed by his followers. Each society is divided into smaller companies, called Classes, each of which consists of from twelve to twenty persons, one of whom, generally a person of more experience than the rest, is styled the Leader. It is the business of a leader, 1. To see each person in his class once a week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper; to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; to receive what they are willing to give to the poor, or toward the support of the Gospel. 2. To meet the minister and stewards of the society once a week, in order to inform the minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly, and will not be reproved; to pay to the stewards what they have received of their several classes in the week preceding; and to show their account of what each person has contributed.

There is only one condition previously required of those who desire admission into this society, namely, a desire to flee from the wrath to come, to be saved from their sins. But in order to continue therein, it is expected that all the members should continue to evidence this desire of salvation: First, By doing no harm, by avoiding evil of every kind; such as taking the name of God in vain, profaning the sabbath, drunkenness, fighting and broiling, brother going to law with brother, dealing in unaccustomed goods, taking unlawful interest, speaking evil of magistrates and ministers, acting unfairly, costly dress, fashionable amusements, borrowing money without a probability of returning it, or taking up goods without a probability of paying for them, &c. Secondly, By doing good, according to their ability, as they have opportunity, to all men: to their bodies, by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and visiting or helping them that are sick or in prison; to their souls, by instructing, reproving, or exhorting, all they have any intercourse with. By doing good, especially to them that are of the household of faith, employing them in preference to others, and, by this means, assisting each other in business; by diligence and frugality in their temporal concerns; by perseverance, and patiently enduring reproach, &c. Thirdly, By attending on all the ordinances of God: such as the public worship of God; the ministry of the word, either read or expounded; the Lord's Supper; family and private prayer; searching the Scriptures, fasting, &c. These are the general rules of the society. If any of the members do not observe them, or habitually break any of them, they are admonished, and borne with for a season; but, if they repent not, expulsion follows.

A number of these societies united together form what is called a Circuit. A Circuit generally includes a large market-town, and the circumjacent villages, to the extent of ten or fifteen miles. To one circuit, two or three, and sometimes four, preachers are appointed, one of whom is styled the Superintendent; and this is the sphere of their labours for at least one year, or not more than two years. Once a quarter, the preachers meet all the classes, and speak personally to each member. Those who have walked orderly the preceding quarter then receive a ticket. These tickets are in some respects analogous to the tesserae of the ancients, and answer all the purposes of the commendatory letters spoken of by the apostle. Their chief use is to prevent imposture. After the visitation of the classes, a meeting is held, consisting of all the preachers, leaders, and stewards, in the circuit. At this meeting, the stewards deliver their collections to a circuit steward, and every thing relating to temporal matters is publicly settled. At this meeting the candidates for the ministry are proposed, and the stewards, after officiating a definite period, are changed. It is superior to a leader's meeting, and is called a Quarterly Meeting.

A number of these circuits, from five to ten, more or fewer, according to their extent, form a District, the preachers of which meet annually. Every district has a chairman, who fixes the time of meeting. These assemblies have authority, 1. to try and suspend preachers who are found immoral, erroneous in doctrine, or deficient in abilities; 2. to decide concerning the building of chapels; 3. to examine the demands from the circuits respecting the support of the preachers, and of their families; and 4. to elect a representative to attend and form a committee, four days before the meeting of the conference, in order to prepare a draught of the stations for the ensuing year. The judgment of this meeting is conclusive until conference, to which an appeal is allowed in all cases.

The Conference, strictly speaking, consists only of a hundred of the senior travelling preachers, in consequence of a deed of declaration executed by Mr. Wesley, and enrolled in Chancery. But, generally speaking, the conference is composed of the preachers elected at the preceding district meetings as representatives; of the other superintendents of the districts; and of every preacher who chooses to attend; all of them (except the probationers) having an equal right to vote, &c. whether they belong to the hundred or not. At the conference, every preacher's character undergoes the strictest scrutiny; and if any charge be proved against him, he is punished accordingly. The preachers are also stationed; the proceedings of the subordinate meetings are reviewed; and the state of the connexion at large is considered. It is the supreme court of the Methodists, over which there is no control, and from whose decisions there is no appeal. The conference is commonly held in London, at Leeds, Bristol, and Manchester, in rotation, about the latter end of July; and the time which it occupies seldom exceeds a fortnight.

Ordinances and Worship.—Class Meetings are each composed of from twelve to twenty persons, one of whom is styled the Leader. When they assemble, which is once a week, the leader gives out a few verses of a hymn, which they join in singing. He then makes a short prayer; after which, he converses with each member respecting Christian experience, gives suitable advice to all, and concludes by singing and praying.

Band Meetings consist of about four or five members, who are nearly of the same age, in nearly similar circumstances, and of the same sex, who meet together once a week, in order to speak their minds more freely than it would be agreeable to do in a promiscuous assembly of members, such as a class meeting. The meeting is conducted in nearly the same manner as a class meeting. At stated periods, those who meet in these private bands, meet all together, forming a public or select band, when, after singing and prayer, any of the members are at liberty to rise and speak their experience. After a few of them have spoken, the meeting, as usual, is concluded with singing and prayer.

Watch-nights are rather similar to the vigils of the ancients, which they kept on the evenings preceding the grand festivals. They are held once a quarter. On these occasions, three or four of the preachers officiate, and a great concourse of people attend. The service commences between eight and nine at night. After one of the ministers has preached, the rest pray and exhort, giving out at intervals suitable hymns, which the congregation join in singing till a few minutes after twelve o'clock, when they conclude.

Love-feasts are also held quarterly. No persons are admitted who cannot produce a ticket to show that they are members, or a note of admittance from the superintendent. However, any serious person, who has never been present at one of these meetings may be supplied with a note for once, but not oftener, unless he becomes a member. The meeting begins with singing and prayer. Afterwards, small pieces of bread, or plain cake, and some water, are distributed; and all present eat and drink together, in token of their Christian love to each other. Then if any persons have any thing particular to say concerning their present Christian experience, or the manner in which they were first brought to the knowledge of the truth, they are permitted to speak. When a few of them have spoken, a collection is made for the poor, and the meeting is concluded with singing and prayer. This institution has no relation to the Lord's Supper. The elements of the Lord's Supper are bread and wine; but at the love-feasts, bread and water only are used. The Methodists consider the former as a positive institution, which they are bound to observe as Christians; the latter as merely prudential, which they observe because they think them scriptural and edifying. They suppose that St. Jude (12.) alludes to these love-feasts, when, speaking of some evil doers, that associated with the Christians, he says, 'These are spots in your feasts of love;' and that of them also the apostle Peter speaks. METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, or NEW ITINERANCY. Date and Grounds of the Separation.—Mr. Wesley professed a strong attachment to the church of England, and exhorted the societies under his care to attend her service, and receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper from the regular clergy. But in the latter part of his life, he thought proper to assume the episcopal office, so as to consecrate some to the office of bishops, and ordain several priests for America and Scotland: but, as one or two of these his bishops have never left England, since their appointment to the office, some think that he intended a regular ordination should take place, when the state of the connexion might render it necessary.—During his life, some of the societies petitioned to have preaching in their own chapels in church hours, and the Lord's Supper administered by the travelling preachers. This request, however, he generally refused; and, where it could be conveniently done, sent some of the clergymen, who officiated at the New Chapel, London, to perform these solemn offices.

The same request was renewed soon after his death, by many of the societies; when they had the mortification to find that this question was decided by lot, and not by the use of reason and serious discussion; which, together with some other real or imaginary grounds of offence, soon brought on a division and separation.

A separation took place in 1797. The Methodist New Connexion declare the grounds of this separation to be church government and discipline, and not doctrines, as affirmed by some of their opponents. They object to the Old Methodists, for having formed a hierarchy, or priestly corporation; and they say, that, in so doing, they have robbed the people of those privileges, which, as members of a Christian church, they are entitled to by reason and Scripture. The New Connexion have, therefore, attempted to establish every part of their church government on popular principles, and profess to have united, as much as possible, the ministers and the people in every department of it. This is quite contrary, say they, to the original government of the Methodists, which, in the most important cases, is confined to the ministers only, as appears by considering the conference or yearly meeting; for of this meeting no person, who is not a travelling preacher, has ever been suffered to enter as a member. Indeed, this is the point to which the preachers have always stedfastly adhered with the utmost firmness and resolution, and on which the division, at present, is said entirely to rest. They are also upbraided by the members of the New Connexion with having abused the power which they have assumed. The New Methodists are sometimes called Kilhamites, from Mr. Alexander Kilham, who took so active a part in the separation, that he is considered by many as the head and founder of the New Connexion. Though these are the points on which the division seems principally to have rested, yet there are several other things that have contributed to it. The attachment of the Old Methodists to the established church, which originated in Mr. Wesley, and was much cherished by him and many of the preachers, and also the dislike to the church, in many others of the preachers and of the societies, were never-failing subjects of contention. As all parties are distinguished in their contests by some badge or discriminating circumstance, so here the receiving or not receiving the Lord's Supper, in the established church, was long considered as the criterion of Methodistical zeal or disaffection. Thus the rupture which had been long foreseen by intelligent persons, and for which the minds of the Methodists had been undesignedly prepared, became inevitable when Mr. Wesley's influence no longer interfered.

Government, Discipline, &c.—The New Methodists profess to proceed upon liberal, open, and ingenuous principles, in the construction of their plan of church government; and their ultimate decision in all disputed matters is in their popular annual assembly, chosen, by certain rules, from among the preachers and societies. To them it appears agreeable, both to reason and the customs of the primitive church, that the people should have a voice in the temporal concerns of the societies, should vote in the election of church officers, and give their suffrages in spiritual concerns. When this subject was discussed, in the conference at Leeds, in 1797, various arguments were produced on both sides of the question; and on its being decided against them, the dissentients proposed a plan for a new Itinerancy, and formed themselves into a meeting, in order to carry it into immediate effect. Of this meeting Mr. William Thom was chosen president, and Mr. Alexander Kilham, secretary. A form of church government, suited to an itinerant ministry, was drawn up at the request of the meeting by these two brethren, and, with a few alterations, was accepted by the conference of preachers and delegates.

The preachers and people are incorporated in all meetings for business, not by temporary concession, but by the essential principles of their constitution; for the private members choose the class leaders; the leaders' meeting nominates the stewards; and the society confirms or rejects the nomination. The quarterly meetings are composed of the general stewards and representatives chosen by the different societies of the circuits; and the fourth quarterly meeting of the year appoints the preacher and delegates of every circuit that shall attend the general conference.

Numbers.—In the year 1806, the New Methodists had 18 circuits, upwards of 30 preachers, and about 5918 members. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. pp. 134—139.

METHU'SELAH, מֶתְשֶׁלַח, signifies he has sent his death; otherwise, the arms of his death; otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, spoil of his death; otherwise, man that demands. Methuselah, son of Enoch, (Gen. v. 21, 22.) was born in the year of the world 687, begat Lamech in 874, and died in the year of the world 1656, aged nine hundred and sixty-nine years; the greatest age attained by any mortal man. This same year, the year of the world 1656, was the year of the Deluge.

MICAH, מִיכָיִהוּ, Michaihu, signifies who is like to God? Micah, of the tribe of Ephraim, was son of a rich widow, who became an occasion of falling to Israel. (Judg. xvii. xviii.) The mother of Micah had laid by a reserve of eleven hundred shekels, about 125*l.* 10*s.* This money being missing, she was in a great passion about it, and even uttered heavy imprecations against the thief.—Whether Micah had taken it himself, or whether he recovered it from some one who had taken it, he comes and tells his mother that it was in his custody. The mother recovered her temper, and, blessing her son for his diligence, told him it was dedicated to God; that she would have an ephod made with it, and kept at their house, for the use of a domestic chapel. She immediately causes an ephod or priestly habit to be prepared with this money, and images of metal. He made one of his own sons priest; and afterwards a young Levite.

It is believed this happened in the interval of time, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that succeeded him, till Othniel judged Israel. During this time the tribe of Dan, being straitened in their inheritance, sent six hundred men to seek a more convenient settlement. They passed by Micah's house, on the mountains of Ephraim, and desired the Levite, who resided there, to inquire of the Lord about the success of their expedition. He answered them, that the Lord would prosper their undertaking. They came a second time to the house of Micah; and, having persuaded the priest to their party, they took away the ephod, and the graven images, and went their way. Micah runs after them, crying out; but they threaten him, and oblige him to retire. Having taken Laish, they there set up the idol purloined from Micah, and appointed Jonathan, son of Gershom, the son of Moses, their priest. This idol continued here all the time the house of God was at Shiloh, and to the captivity of the country, or, according to another version of the Hebrew, to the time of the deliverance of the country. Some understand it, of the deliverance of the country by Samuel; and others, of the captivity of the ten tribes by the kings of Assyria, Shalmaneser, and Tiglath-pileser. During all this time, the city of Laish, otherwise called Dan, was a place of idolatry and superstition; worshipping either the teraphim of Micah, or the golden calves of Jeroboam.

MICAH, מִכָּה, signifies poor, humble, otherwise, who strikes, or is struck; otherwise, who is there? otherwise, the waters here. Micah, the Morasthite, or of Moresa, a village near the city Eleutheropolis, in the south of Judah, is the seventh in order of the twelve lesser prophets. He prophesied under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, about fifty years, from about the year of the world 3245, or the beginning of the reign of Jotham, to the year of the world 3306, or the last year of Hezekiah. Some have confounded him, but very improperly, with Micaiah, son of Imlah, who lived in the kingdom of the ten tribes, under the reign of Ahab. The spurious Dorotheus says, that Micah was buried in the burying-place of the Anakim, whose habitation had been at Hebron. This prophet was contemporary with Isaiah, and has some expressions in common with him. Compare Isaiah ii. 2. with Micah iv. 1. and Isaiah xli. 15. with Micah iv. 13.

The prophecy of Micah contains only seven chapters. He first foretells the calamities of Samaria; afterwards he prophesies against Judah; then he exclaims against the iniquities of Samaria: he foretells the captivity of the ten tribes, and their return. The third chapter contains a pathetic invective against the princes of the house of Jacob, and the judges of the house of Israel; which Calmet thinks is intended against the chiefs of the kingdom of Judah, the judges, the magistrates, the priests, the false prophets, &c. We are informed by Jeremiah, (xxvi. 18, 19, &c.) that this prophecy was pronounced in the time of Hezekiah; and that in the days of Jehoiakim it protected Jeremiah from death, who prophesied much the same against Jerusalem, as Micah had done.

After these terrible denunciations, Micah speaks of the reign of the Messiah, and the establishment of his kingdom. He points out particularly that the Messiah should be born at Bethlehem, and that his dominion should extend to the utmost parts of the earth. The fifth chapter describes the flourishing state of the Jews in their own country, after their return from the captivity. The last two chapters contain a long invective against the iniquities of Samaria. He then foretells the fall of Babylon, and the re-establishment of Israel.

‘The style of Micah,’ says Bishop Tomline, ‘is nervous, concise, and elegant, often elevated and poetical, but sometimes obscure from sudden transitions of subject; and the contrast of the neglected duties of justice, mercy, humility, and piety, with the punctilious observance of the ceremonial sacrifices, affords a beautiful example of the harmony which subsists between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations, and shows that the law partook, in some degree at least, of that spiritual nature, which more immediately characterizes the religion of Jesus.’

Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theol. vol. i. p. 125.

MICAI'AH, מִיכָאֵל, Mīchā'el, signifies who is like to God? Micaiah, or Michaiah, was the son of Imlah, of Ephraim, and a prophet of the Lord. It is thought that it was Micaiah, though the Scripture does not mention his name, who directed one of his associates to strike him, and to wound him; which he refusing, Micaiah told him a lion should meet and kill him: which happened accordingly. Micaiah, meeting another, desired of him the same thing, which he performed. Thus the prophet being disfigured, threw dust in his face, and went to meet king Ahab. He complained that being charged with a prisoner, he had escaped, but his ransom was required of him. The king gave sentence against him. At this the prophet wiping the dust off his face, and discovering himself to Ahab, said, Just so says the Lord to thee; because thou hast let go a man deserving of death, thy life shall answer for his life, and thy people for his people. He spoke of Benhadad, king of Syria, whom Ahab had suffered to escape when he was in his power. (1 Kings xx. 35.)

About three years after, when Ahab made war against Benhadad king of Syria, he invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to accompany him in this expedition. (1 Kings xxii. 3, 4, 5, &c.) Jehoshaphat, who was then at Samaria, consented, but desired that a prophet of the Lord might be consulted about their success; for he would not rely on the prophets of Baal, who had assured Ahab of victory. They then brought Micaiah, the son of Imlah, before the kings, and desired him by the way, that his words might agree with the words of the other prophets, who all had promised the king success. Ahab having inquired of him, whether they should march against Ramoth-gilead or not, Micaiah answered, March on and prosper, the Lord shall deliver it into thine hands. The king replied, I adjure thee in the name of the Lord, to answer only according to the truth. Then Micaiah says to him with a more serious countenance,—I saw all Israel dispersed upon the mountains, like sheep that have no shepherd; and the Lord said, They have no captain, let every one return in peace to his own house. Micaiah added, I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and the heavenly host on his right hand and on his left. And the Lord said, Who shall seduce Ahab, king of Israel, to march against Ramoth-gilead, that he may die there? One answered one thing, and another another. Then an evil spirit stepped forth, and said, I will seduce Ahab, by putting a lie into the mouth of all his prophets. The Lord said to him, Go, and thou shalt succeed. Now has the Lord put a lying spirit in the mouth of all thy prophets, and has passed sentence against thee.

At the same time Zedekiah, son of Chenaanah, stepped up to Micaiah, and gave him a blow on the face, saying, 'Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to speak unto thee?' To whom Micaiah replied, 'This thou shalt see, when thou shalt skulk from chamber to chamber to hide thyself. Then Ahab, king of Israel, said to his people, Take Micaiah and carry him to Amon the governor of Samaria, and let him be fed with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, till I return in peace. Micaiah answered, If thou return at all in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me. The event justified the prediction of Micaiah. We hear no more of Micaiah the son of Imlah.

MICHAEL, מִיכָאֵל, signifies who is like to God ? otherwise, humility, poorness of God. The Scripture account of Michael is, that he was an arch-angel, who presided over the Jewish nation, as other angels did over the Gentile world, as is evident of the kingdoms of Persia and Greece, (Dan. x. 13.); that he had an army of angels under his command, (Rev. xii. 7.); that he fought with the dragon, or Satan and his angels; and that, contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses. (Jude 9.) With respect to the combat between Michael and the Dragon, some authors understand it literally, and think it denotes the expulsion of certain rebellious angels, with their head or leader from the presence of God. Others take it in a figurative sense, and refer it either to the contest that happened at Rome, between St. Peter and Simon Magus, in which the apostle prevailed over the magician; or to those violent persecutions under which the church laboured for three hundred years, and which happily ceased when the powers of the world became Christian. Among the commentators, who maintain the former opinion, is Grotius; and among those who understand it in a figurative sense, are Hammond and Mede.

The contest respecting the body of Moses, is likewise taken both literally and figuratively. Those who understand it literally, are of opinion, that Michael, by the order of God, hid the body of Moses after his death; and that the devil endeavoured to discover it, as a fit means to entice the people to idolatry, by a superstitious worship of his relics. But this dispute is figuratively understood to be a controversy about rebuilding the temple, and restoring the service of God among the Jews at Jerusalem; the Jewish church being properly styled the body of Moses. It is thought by some, that this story of the contest between Michael and the devil, was taken by St. Jude out of an apocryphal book, called 'The Assumption of Moses.' Might not the apostle have used it merely as a popular illustration, without vouching for the fact, of that sober and wholesome doctrine, not to speak evil of dignities, from the example of an archangel, who did not venture to rail even at the devil, but meekly said, 'The Lord rebuke thee?' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1144; Michælis's Introduction to the New Testament, vol. vi. p. 392.

MICHAL, מִיכָאֵל, signifies who is it that has all ? otherwise, who is perfect, or complete ? otherwise, the whole is water ; otherwise, defence. Michal was daughter of king Saul. The Hebrews think, that she was also named Eglah, and was mother of Ithream, (2 Sam. iii. 5.) but this opinion has no foundation. Michal falling in love with David, and her father Saul being informed of it, he was not a little glad, saying, I will give her to David for a wife, that he may fall by the hands of the Philistines. Saul therefore bid his confidants insinuate to David to improve his good fortune. David at first declined; but, finding his valour might serve instead of a dowry, he doubled what Saul required as proofs of his victory over the Philistines, and Saul gave him his daughter Michal.

Some time after, Saul sent his guards after David, to seize him in his own house during the night, and to bring him with them on the morrow. But Michal let him down through a window, and he escaped. Michal then took a figure, and laid it in David's bed, and put a pillow of goat's hair for its bolster, and covered it with a cloth. Saul sent next morning to take David, and gave orders that he should be brought in his bed; but they found nothing except a figure, and Michal excused herself by saying, that David threatened to kill her if she did not favour his escape. Some time after, Saul gave Michal to Phalti, or Phaltiel, son of Laish of Gallim.

David, when he came to the crown, caused Michal to be restored to him; and this was one condition that he stipulated with Abner. Then David sent messengers to Ishbosheth, who sent her back to David, and Phaltiel followed her weeping as far as Bahurim. The Hebrews pretend, that Phaltiel never came near Michal, who in strictness could not be his wife, since she never had been divorced from David. Others believe that Michal had five sons by Phaltiel, whom the Gibeonites executed. (2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9.) See MERAB.

David, from the very beginning of his reign, had formed a design of translating the ark of the covenant from Shiloh to Jerusalem, where he had fixed his habitation. This pious design he executed with great pomp and ceremony; he himself leaping and dancing for joy in this solemnity. Michal observing this at a window, where she had placed herself to see the procession, conceived no small contempt for king David; and, when he returned to his palace, she upbraided him with descending to such meannesses, as to dance and play among his servants, acting rather like a buffoon than a king. David vindicated himself by telling her, that he would dance and appear still more vile before the Lord, who had preferred him to be king of Israel, before her father and all his family. Michal had no children to the day of her death, which the Scripture seems to impute to these reproaches made to David. The time of her death is unknown.

MID'IAN, מִדְיָן, signifies judgment; otherwise, measure, habit, covering. Midian was the fourth son of Abraham and Keturah. (Gen. xxv. 2.) The Midianites, (Numb. xxii. 4. 7.; xxv. 15.; xxxi. 2, &c.) whose daughters seduced Israel, even to the worshipping of Baal-peor, were descendants of Midian, the son of Abraham. The Midianites, who were overcome by Hadad son of Bedad, king of Edom, (Gen. xxxvi. 35.) and those who oppressed Israel, and were defeated by Gideon, (Judg. vi. 1, 2, &c.; vii. 1, 2, &c.) were also descended from Midian, son of Abraham, whose habitation was east of the Dead Sea, and south of the country of Moab. Their capital city was called Midian, and its remains were to be seen in the time of Jerome and Eusebius. It was situated on the Arnon, and south of the city Ar, or Areopolis.

The Lord intended to punish the Midianites, because their daughters had seduced Israel to the worship of Peor. God says to Moses, 'Take a thousand men out of each tribe, and send them under the command of Phinehas, son of the high priest Eleazar, to execute my vengeance against the Midianites. Phinehas marched therefore at the head of twelve thousand men, having with him the ark of the covenant, according to some commentators, and the trumpets of the tabernacle. He defeated the Midianites, and slew five of their kings, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, who reigned over several cities of the country of Midian, lying east of the Dead Sea. God permitted also, that the wicked prophet Balaam should be involved in their misfortune, and lose his life. The Israelites took the women, the children, the flocks, and whatever belonged to the Midianites; they burned their cities, villages, and forts; and they brought into their camp all the booty they had got in this expedition.

MIDIAN was probably the son of Cush, since Zipporah the wife of Moses, who was a Midianite, was nevertheless a Cushite, (Numb. xii. 1.); and since Habakkuk (iii. 7.) puts the Midianites with the Cushites, as if they were synonymous, or at least neighbours. This Midian peopled the country of Midian, east of the Red Sea. Into this country Moses withdrew, and there married Zipporah the daughter of Jethro. (Exod. ii. 15, &c.) It was these Midianites who trembled for fear, when they heard the Hebrews had passed through the Red Sea.

(Hab. iii. 7.) Abulfeda, speaking of the city of Midian, says, 'Madyan is a city, in ruins, on the shore of the Red Sea, on the side opposite to Tabuc, from which it is distant about six days' journey. At Midian may be seen the famous well, where Moses watered the flocks of Schoaib, for thus the Mahometans call Jethro. This city was the capital of the tribe of Midian among the Israelites. According to Ibusaid, the bay of the Red Sea in this place is about one hundred thousand paces wide.'

It should seem as if the Orientals knew no other Midianites than those on the shore of the Red Sea, near Mount Sinai, among whom Moses took refuge.

MIGDOL, מִגְדֹּל, signifies a tower, or greatness, and was a frontier town of Lower Egypt towards the Red Sea, between which and that sea the Israelites encamped. (Exod. xiv. 2.) It is there rendered by the Septuagint Magdolos; and there also Herodotus represents Nekus, or Pharaoh-Necho, as gaining a great victory over the Jews; mistaking Magdolos for Megiddo. Jeremiah represents it as belonging to Egypt proper, (Jer. xlv. 14.) and in the neighbourhood of Tahpanes or Daphnæ. The Itinerary of Antoninus reckons it a little to the south of the Delta, about twelve miles from Pelusium.

On the contrary, the learned editor of Calmet's Dictionary considers Migdol 'a tower,' which he places at Bir Suez, 'the well of water,' because he thinks this well was worth protecting by a tower, there being no other fresh water, then known, in the neighbourhood. He observes, that nobody acquainted with the value and scarcity of water in the East, will imagine that a tower, if inhabited, could be of use, or its inhabitants or garrison subsist, without water. It was necessary, therefore, for the protection of this water for the use of the inhabitants at Baal-zephon, that a tower should secure it. He has placed, he says, Baal-zephon at Suez, because it adjoins to Pi-hahiroth; so that whatever station was 'in the face of Pi-hahiroth,' was also in the face of Baal-zephon. See BAAL-ZEPHON, and PI-HAHIROTH. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. xxxix. p. 69; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 376.

MILE'TUS, or MILETUM, Μίλητος, signifies red, or deep purple. Miletus was a town in the province of Caria, in Asia Minor. This city, situated beyond the river Meander, was originally a colony of Cretans. It became so powerful, that it sent out settlers to a great number of cities on the Euxine Sea, and many others on the continent. 'Miletus,' says Dr. Chandler, 'was once exceedingly powerful, and illustrious. Its early navigators extended its commerce to remote regions. The whole Euxine Sea, the Propontis, Egypt, and other countries, were frequented by its ships, and settled by its colonies. It boasted a venerable band of memorable men; Hecataeus, an early historian, and Thales, the father of philosophy. It withstood Darius, and refused to admit Alexander. It has been styled the metropolis and head of Ionia; the bulwark of Asia; chief in war and peace; mighty by sea; the fertile mother which had poured forth her sons to every quarter, counting not fewer than seventy-five cities descended from her. It afterwards fell so low as to furnish a proverbial saying, 'The Milesians were once great;' but if we compare its ancient glory, and its subsequent humiliation, with its present state, we may justly exclaim, 'Miletus how much lower art thou now fallen!' It is now called by the Turks Melas, or according to Mr. Cruttwell, Milet.

St. Paul going from Corinth to Jerusalem, passed by Miletus, and as he went by sea, and so could not take Ephesus in his way, &c. he caused the bishops of the church of Ephesus to come to Miletus, which was about twelve leagues from thence. (Acts xx. 14, 15, &c.) Sacred Geography; Dr. Chandler's Travels.

MILETUS, a city of Crete. It seems proper to refer to this Miletus, what St. Paul says, (2 Tim. iv. 20.) 'Trophimus have I left at Miletus sick;' because when St. Paul visited Miletus near Ephesus, (Acts xx. 17.) Trophimus went with him to Jerusalem, and St. Paul did not return to that Miletus. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary.

MILLENARIANS. Name.—Millenarians are those who believe, according to an ancient tradition in the church, grounded on some doubtful texts in the book of Revelation and other Scriptures, that our Saviour shall reign a thousand years with the faithful upon earth after the first resurrection, before the full completion of final happiness; and their name, taken from the Latin word mille, a thousand, has a direct allusion to the duration of this spiritual empire, which is styled the Millennium. The same name is also given to many who reject the literal interpretation of the Millennium, both as to its nature and its duration.

Origin, Rise, and Progress.—A Millennium, or a future paradisaical state of the earth, is viewed by some as a doctrine not of Christian, but of Jewish origin. The tradition which fixes the duration of the world in its present imperfect state to 6,000 years, and announces the approach of a Sabbath of 1,000 years of universal peace and plenty, to be ushered in by the glorious advent of the Messiah, has been traced up to Elias, a rabbinical writer, who flourished about two centuries before the birth of Christ, and, by some, even to Elias the Tishbite. It certainly obtained among the Chaldeans from the earliest times; and it is countenanced by Barnabas, Irenæus, and other primitive writers, and also by the Jews at the present day. But though the theory is animating and consolatory, and not very improbable, yet, as it has not the sanction of Scripture to support it, we are not bound to respect it any further than as a doubtful tradition. The Jews understood several passages of the prophets, as Zechariah, (xiv. 16.) &c. of the Millennium, in which, according to their carnal apprehensions, the Messiah is to reign on earth, and to bring all nations within the pale, and under subjection to the ordinances of the Jewish church.

Justin Martyr, the most ancient of the fathers, was a great supporter of the doctrine of the Millennium, or that our Saviour shall reign with the faithful upon earth, after the resurrection, for a thousand years, which he declares was the belief of all orthodox Christians. But this opinion is not generally followed; for, though there has been, perhaps, no age of the church in which this doctrine was not admitted by one or more divines of the first eminence, it yet appears, from the writings of Eusebius, Irenæus, and others among the ancients, as well as from the histories of Dupin, Mosheim, and other moderns, that it was never adopted by the whole church, nor formed an article of the established creed in any nation. Origen, the most learned of the fathers, and Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, usually, for his immense erudition, surnamed the Great, both opposed the doctrine that prevailed on the subject in their day; and Dr. Whitby, in his learned treatise on the subject, proves, first, that the Millennium was never generally received in the church of Christ; and, secondly, that there is no just ground to think it was derived from the apostles.

On the other hand, Dr. T. Burnet, and others, maintain that it was very generally admitted till the Nicene Council, in 325, or till the fourth century. The doctor supposes Dionysius of Alexandria, who wrote against Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, before the middle of the third century, to have been the first that attacked this doctrine; but Origen had previously assailed it in many of his fictitious additions. The truth seems to be, as Mr. Gray remarks, 'that a spiritual reign of Christ was believed by all who carefully examined the Scriptures, though the popular notions of the Millennium were often rejected; and ancient as well as modern writers, assailed the extravagant superstructure, not the Scriptural foundation of the doctrine.' During the interregnum in England, in the time of Cromwell, there arose a set of enthusiasts, sometimes called Millenarians, but more frequently Fifth Monarchy Men, who expected the sudden appearance of Christ to establish on earth a new monarchy or kingdom. In consequence of this, some of them aimed at the subversion of all human government. In ancient history we read of four great monarchies, the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and the Roman; and these men, believing that this new spiritual kingdom of Christ was to be the fifth, obtained the name by which they were called. They claimed to be the saints of God, and to have the dominion of saints, (Dan. vii. 27.) expecting that, when Christ was come into this kingdom, to begin his reign on earth, they, as his deputies, were to govern all things under him. They went so far as to give up their own Christian names, and assume others from Scripture, like the Manicheans of old.

Distinguishing Tenets.—About the middle of the fourth century, the Millenarians held the following tenets: 1. that the city of Jerusalem should be rebuilt, and that the land of Judea should be the habitation of those who were to reign on the earth a thousand years; 2. that the first resurrection was not to be confined to the martyrs, but that, after the fall of Antichrist, all the just were to rise, and all that were on the earth were to continue for that space of time; 3. that Christ shall then come down from heaven, and be seen on earth, and reign there with his servants; 4. that the saints, during this period, shall enjoy all the delights of a terrestrial paradise.

These opinions were founded on several passages in Scripture, which the Millenarians, among the fathers, understood in no other than a literal sense; but which those moderns, who hold nearly the same opinion, consider as partly literal, and partly metaphorical. Of these passages, that upon which the greatest stress has been laid, is perhaps Rev. xx. 1—7. This passage the ancient Millenarians took in a sense grossly literal, and taught, that, during the Millennium, the saints on earth were to enjoy every bodily delight. Most of the moderns, on the other hand, consider the power and pleasures of this kingdom as wholly spiritual; and they represent them as not to commence till after the conflagration of the present earth. But that this last supposition is a mistake, the following verses assure us; for we are there told, that, ‘when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth;’ and we have no reason to believe that he will have such power or such liberty in ‘the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.’

The opinions of the moderns on this subject may be reduced to two. 1. Some believe that Christ will reign personally on the earth, and that the prophecies of the Millennium point to a resurrection of martyrs and other just men, to reign with him a thousand years in a visible kingdom. 2.

Others are inclined to believe, that, by the reign of Christ and the saints for a thousand years on earth, ‘nothing more is meant than that, before the general judgment, the Jews shall be converted,—genuine Christianity be diffused through all nations, and mankind enjoy that peace and happiness, which the faith and precepts of the Gospel are calculated to confer on all by whom they are sincerely embraced.’ The state of the Christian church, say they, will be, for a thousand years before the general judgment, so pure and so widely extended, that, when compared with the state of the world in the ages preceding, it may, in the language of Scripture, be called a resurrection from the dead. In support of this interpretation, they quote two passages from St. Paul, in which a conversion from Paganism to Christianity, and a reformation of life, is called a resurrection from the dead. (Rom. vi. 13. Ephes. v. 14.) There is indeed an order in the resurrection, (1 Cor. xv. 23.) but we nowhere observe mention made of a first and second resurrection at the distance of 1000 years from each other: yet, were the Millenarian hypothesis well founded, the words should rather have run thus: ‘Christ the first fruits, then the martyrs at his coming, and a thousand years afterwards the residue of mankind,—then cometh the end,’ &c.

Mr. Joseph Mede, Dr. Gill, Bishop Newton, Mr. Winchester, Mr. Eyre, Mr. Kett, &c., are advocates for the first of these opinions, and contend for the personal reign of Christ on earth. ‘When these great events shall come to pass,’ says Bishop Newton, ‘of which we collect from the prophecies, this to be the proper order; the Protestant witnesses shall be greatly exalted, and the 1260 years of their prophesying in sackcloth, and of the tyranny of the beast, shall end together; the conversion and restoration of the Jews succeed; then follows the ruin of the Ottoman empire; and then the total destruction of Rome, and of Antichrist. When these great events, I say, shall come to pass, then shall the kingdom of Christ commence, or the reign of the saints upon earth. So Daniel expressly informs us, that the kingdom of Christ and the saints will be raised upon the ruins of the kingdom of Antichrist. (Dan. vii. 26, 27.) So likewise St. John saith, (Rev. xx. 2—6.) that upon the final destruction of the beast and of the false prophet, “Satan is bound,” &c. It is, I conceive, to these great events, the fall of Antichrist, the re-establishment of the Jews, and the beginning of the glorious Millennium, that the three different dates in Daniel of 1260 years, 1290 years, and 1335 years, are to be referred. And as Daniel saith, (xii. 12.) “Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the 1335 years,” so St. John saith, (Rev. xx. 6.) “Blessed and holy, is he that hath part in the first resurrection.”

Blessed and happy indeed will be this period: and it is very observable, that the martyrs and confessors of Jesus, in Papal as well as Pagan times, will be raised to partake of this felicity. Then shall all those gracious promises in the Old Testament be fulfilled,—of the amplitude and extent,—of the peace and prosperity,—of the glory and happiness of the church in the latter days. Then, in the full sense of the words, (Rev. xi. 15.) “Shall the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.” According to tradition, these thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints, will be the seventh Millennium of the world; for as God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh, so the world, it is argued, will continue 6000 years, and the seventh thousand will be the great Sabbatism, or holy rest to the people of God: “One day being with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.” (2 Pet. iii. 8.) According to tradition too, these thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints are the great day of judgment, in the morning or beginning whereof, shall be the coming of Christ in flaming fire, and the particular judgment of Antichrist, and the first resurrection; and in the evening or conclusion whereof, shall be the general resurrection of the dead, small and great; “and they shall be judged every man according to his works.”

Such is the representation of the Millennium, as given by those who embrace the opinion of Christ's reigning personally on earth during the period of one thousand years. But Dr. Whitby, Mr. Lowman, Dr. Priestley, &c. contend against the literal interpretation of the Millennium, both as to its nature and duration. Dr. Priestley, entertaining an exalted idea of the advantages to which our nature may be destined, treats the limitation of the world's duration to seven thousand years, as a rabbinical fable; and he intimates, that the thousand years may be interpreted prophetically, in which sense every day would signify a year, and the Millennium continue three hundred and sixty-five thousand years! Again, he supposes that there will be no resurrection of any individuals, till the general resurrection; and that the Millennium implies only the revival of religion. It would seem, however, that Dr. Priestley was inclined, at a later period of his life, to the personal reign of Christ. The author of the ‘Illustrations of Prophecy’ contends, that in the Millennium an amelioration of the human race will gradually take place, by natural means, throughout the world.

On this subject, Mr. Evans seems to be correct when he says, ‘that we cannot suggest our opinions with too great a degree of modesty.’ Mr. Faber also observes, that ‘respecting the yet future and mysterious Millennium, the less that is said upon the subject the better. Unable myself to form the slightest conception of its specific nature, I shall weary neither my own nor my reader's patience with premature remarks upon it. That it will be a season of great blessedness is certain; further than this we know nothing definitely.’

The Millenarians do not form a sect distinct from others, but their distinguishing tenet, in one view or other, prevails in a greater or less degree among most denominations into which the Christian world is divided. Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. pp. 362—374; Mr. Robert Gray's Discourses, Discourse x.; Bishop Newton's 25th and 26th Dissertations on the Prophecies.

MINISTER, one who attends, or waits on another. Thus, Elisha was the minister of Elijah, and rendered him services of various kinds (2 Kings iii. 11.); and Joshua was the servant of Moses. (Exod. xxiv. 13.; xxxiii. 11.) These persons by no means felt themselves degraded by their stations, but in due time succeeded to the offices of their masters. In like manner, John Mark was minister to Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii. 5.). Christ is called a minister of the true, that is, the heavenly sanctuary.

The office of the minister of the synagogue, (Luke iv. 20.) consisted in keeping the book of the law, in observing that those who read in it read correctly, &c. The Rabbins say, that he was the same as the angel of the church, or overseer. Lightfoot says, Baal Aruch expounds the chazan, or minister of the congregation, by sheliach hatzibbor, or angel of the congregation. Some understand the word chazan to answer to the Greek diákonos, deacon.

Ministers were servants, yet servants not menial, but honourable. Those who dispense the word, and conduct the service of God; those who dispense the laws, and promote the welfare of the community; the holy angels, who, in obedience to the Divine commands, protect, preserve, succour, and benefit the godly; are all ministers, beneficial ministers, to those under their charge. (Heb. viii. 2. Exod. xxx. 10. Levit. xvi. 15. 1 Cor. iv. 1. Rom. xiii. 6. Psalm civ. 4.) Supplem. Addenda to Calmet's Dict.; Prideaux, part i. book vi.

MIRACLE has been defined, an event out of the ordinary and settled course of nature, and such as could not have been produced either by the operation of its general laws, or the combination of contingent circumstances; or, an operation performed by any particular agent, which transcends his skill and power, and which required the assistance of a supernatural Being.

Mr. Hume has insidiously or erroneously maintained, that a miracle is contrary to experience; but in reality it is only different from experience. Experience informs us, that one event has happened often; testimony informs us, that another event has happened once, or oftener. That diseases should be generally cured by the application of external causes, and, sometimes, at the mere word of a prophet, and without the visible application of causes, are facts not inconsistent with each other in the nature of things themselves, nor irreconcilable according to our ideas. Each fact may arise from its own proper cause; each may exist independently of the other; and each is known by its own proper proof, whether of sense or testimony. As secret causes often produce events contrary to those we do expect from experience, it is equally conceivable, that events should sometimes be produced which we do not expect. To pronounce, therefore, a miracle to be false, because it is different from experience, is only to conclude against its general existence, from the very circumstance which constitutes its particular nature; for if it were not different from experience, where would be its singularity? Or what particular proof could be drawn from it, if it happened according to the ordinary train of human events, or was included in the operation of the general laws of nature? We grant that it does differ from experience; but we do not presume to make our experience the standard of the divine conduct. He that acknowledges a God, must at least admit the possibility of a miracle. The Atheist, that makes him inseparable from what is called nature, and binds him to its laws by an insurmountable necessity; that deprives him of will, and wisdom, and power, as a distinct and independent Being; may deny even the very possibility of a miraculous interposition, which can in any instance suspend or counteract those general laws by which the world is governed. But he who allows of a First Cause, in itself perfect and intelligent, abstractedly from those effects which his wisdom and power have produced, must, at the same time, allow that this Cause can be under no such restraints as to be debarred the liberty of controlling its laws as often as it sees fit. Surely the Being that made the world can govern it, or any part of it, in such a manner as he pleases; and he that constituted the very laws by which it is in general conducted, may suspend the operation of those laws in any given instance, or impress new powers on matter, in order to produce new and extraordinary effects.

In judging of miracles there are certain criteria, peculiar to the subject, sufficient to conduct our inquiries, and warrant our determination. Assuredly they do not appeal to our ignorance, for they presuppose not only the existence of a general order of things, but our actual knowledge of the appearance that order exhibits, and of the secondary material causes, from which it, in most cases, proceeds. If a miraculous event were effected by the immediate hand of God, and yet bore no mark of distinction from the ordinary effects of his agency, it would impress no conviction, and probably awaken no attention. Our knowledge of the ordinary course of things, though limited, is real; and therefore it is essential to a miracle, both that it differ from that course, and be accompanied with peculiar and unequivocal signs of such difference. We have been told, that the course of nature is fixed and unalterable; and, therefore, it is not consistent with the immutability of God to perform miracles. But, surely, they who reason in this manner, beg the point in question. We have no right to assume, that the Deity has ordained such general laws as will exclude his interposition; and we cannot suppose that he would forbear to interfere, where any important end could be answered. This interposition, though it controls, in particular cases, the energy, does not diminish the utility of those laws. It leaves them to fulfil their own proper purposes, and effects only a distinct purpose for which they were not calculated. If the course of nature implies the general laws of matter and motion, into which the most opposite phenomena may be resolved, it is certain, that we do not yet know them in their full extent; and, therefore, that events, which are related by judicious and disinterested persons, and at the same time imply no gross contradiction, are possible in themselves, and capable of a certain degree of proof. If the course of nature implies the whole order of events, which God has ordained for the government of the world, it includes both his ordinary and extraordinary dispensations, and among them miracles may have their place, as a part of the universal plan. It is, indeed, consistent with sound philosophy, and not inconsistent with pure religion, to acknowledge that they were disposed by the Supreme Being at the same time with the more ordinary effects of his power; that their causes and occasions were arranged with the same regularity; and that, in reference chiefly to their concomitant circumstances of person and times, to the specific ends for which they were employed, and to our idea of the immediate necessity there is for a divine Agent, miracles differ from common events, in which the hand of God acts as efficaciously, though less visibly. On this consideration of the subject, miracles, instead of contradicting nature, form a part of it. All I object to is, that what our limited reason, and scanty experience may comprehend, should be represented as a full and exact view of the possible or ac-

If we be asked, whether miracles are credible? we reply, that, abstractedly considered, they are not totally incredible; that they are capable of indirect proof from analogy; and of direct, from testimony: that in the common and daily course of worldly affairs, events, the improbability of which, antecedently to all testimony, was very great, are proved to have happened by the authority of competent and honest witnesses; that the Christian miracles were objects of real and proper experience to those who saw them; and that whatsoever the senses of mankind can perceive, their report may substantiate. Should it be asked, whether miracles were necessary? and whether the end proposed to be effected by them could warrant so immediate and extraordinary an interference of the Almighty, as such extraordinary operations suppose? to this we might answer, that, if the fact be established, all reasonings à priori concerning their necessity must be frivolous, and may be false. We are not capable of deciding on a question, which, however simple in appearance, is yet too complex in its parts, and too extensive in its object, to be fully comprehended by the human understanding. Whether God could, or could not, have effected all the ends designed to be promoted by the Gospel, without deviating from the common course of his Providence, and interfering with its general laws, is a speculation that a modest inquirer would carefully avoid; for it carries on the very face of it a degree of presumption, totally unbecoming the state of a mortal being. Infinitely safer is it for us to acquiesce in what the Almighty has done, than to embarrass our minds with speculations about what he might have done. Inquiries of this kind are generally inconclusive, and always useless. They rest on no solid principles, are conducted by no fixed rules, and lead to no clear conviction. They begin from curiosity or vanity; they are prosecuted amidst ignorance and error; and they frequently terminate in impious presumption, or universal scepticism. God is the best, and, indeed, the only judge, how far miracles are proper to promote any particular design of his Providence; and how far that design would have been left unaccomplished, if common and ordinary methods only had been pursued. So from the absence of miracles we may conclude, in any supposed case, that they were not necessary; from their existence, supported by fair testimony, in any given case, we may infer with confidence that they are proper. A view of the state of the world in general, and of the Jewish nation in particular, and an examination of the nature and tendency of the Christian religion, will point out very clearly the great expediency of a miraculous interposition: and when we reflect on the gracious and important ends that were to be effected by it, we shall be convinced that it was not an idle and useless display of divine power; but that while the means effected and confirmed the end, the end fully justified and illustrated the means. If we reflect on the almost irresistible force of prejudice, and the strong opposition it universally made to the establishment of a new religion, on the demolition of rites and ceremonies, which authority had made sacred, and custom had familiarized; if we reflect on the extent and importance, as well as the singularity, of the Christian plan; what was its avowed purpose to effect, and what difficulties it was necessarily called to struggle with before that purpose could be effected; how much it was opposed by the opinions and the practice of the generality of mankind; by philosophy; by superstition; by corrupt passions, and inveterate habits; by pride, and sensuality; in short, by every engine of human influence,—whether formed by craft, or aided by power; if we seriously reflect on these things, and give them their due force, (and experience shows us that we can scarcely give them too much,) we shall be induced to admit even the necessity of a miraculous interposition, at a time when common means must inevitably, in our apprehensions, have failed of success.

The revelation of the divine will by inspired persons is, as such, miraculous; and, therefore, before the adversaries of the Gospel can employ, with propriety, their objections to the particular miracles on which its credibility is rested, they should show the impossibility of any revelation. In whatever age the revelation is given, succeeding ages can know it only from testimony; and if they admit, on the report of their fellow-creatures, that God had inspired any being with the preternatural knowledge of his will, why should they deny that he had enabled the same being to heal the sick, or to cleanse the leprous? How, may it be asked, should the divine Teacher give a more direct and consistent proof of his preternatural commission, than by displaying those signs and wonders, which mark the finger of God? That the apostles could not be deceived, and that they had no temptation to deceive, has been repeatedly demonstrated. So powerful, indeed, is the proof adduced in support of their testimony, that the infidels of these latter days have been obliged to abandon the ground on which their predecessors stood; to disclaim all moral evidences arising from the character and relation of eye-witnesses; and to maintain, upon metaphysical, rather than historical principles, that miracles are utterly incapable, in their own nature, of existing in any circumstances, or of being supported by any evidence. Dr. White's Sermons, Sermon vii. pp. 284, &c., Notes pp. l. li. &c.

MIR/IAM, מִרְיָם, Mapiām, signifies exalted; otherwise, bitterness of the sea; otherwise, myrrh of the sea; otherwise, lady, or mistress of the sea. Miriam, sister of Moses and Aaron, and daughter of Amram and Jochebed, was born about the year of the world 2424. She might be ten or twelve years old when her brother Moses was exposed on the banks of the Nile, since Miriam was watching there, and offered herself to Pharaoh's daughter to fetch her a nurse. The princess accepting the offer, Miriam fetched her own mother, to whom the young Moses was given to nurse. (Exod. ii. 4, 5, &c.) It is thought that Miriam married Hur, of the tribe of Judah; but it does not appear that she had any children by him.

Miriam had the gift of prophecy, as she insinuates, (Exod. xv. 20. Numb. xii. 2). "Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us?" After the passage of the Red Sea, Miriam led the choirs and dances of the women, and sung with them the canticle, Sing ye to the Lord, &c. whilst Moses sung it in another choir of men. (Exod. xv. 21.) When Zipporah, the wife of Moses, arrived in the camp of Israel, Miriam and Aaron disputed with her, speaking against Moses on her account. (Numb. xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) This conduct the Lord punished by visiting Miriam with a leprosy. Aaron interceded with Moses for her recovery, and besought the Lord, who ordered her to be shut out of the camp seven days.

We are acquainted with no subsequent particulars of the life of Miriam. Her death happened in the first month of the fortieth year after the Exodus, at the encampment of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin. (Numb. xx. 1.) The people mourned for her, and she was there buried.

MISHNA, or MISNA, מִשְׁנָה, signifies repetition, and is properly the code of the Jewish civil law. The Mishna contains the text; and the Gemara, which is the second part of the Talmud, contains the commentaries: so that the Gemara is, as it were, a glossary on the Mishna. The Mishna consists of various traditions of the Jews, and of explanations of several passages of Scripture. These traditions serving as an explication of the written law, and supplementary to it, are said to have been delivered to Moses during the time of his abode upon the Mount; which he afterwards communicated to Aaron, Eleazar, and his servant Joshua. By these they were transmitted to the seventy elders; by them to the prophets, who communicated them to the men of the Great San-hedrim, from whom the wise men of Jerusalem and Babylon received them. According to Dr. Prideaux, they passed from Jeremiah to Baruch, from him to Ezra, and from Ezra to the men of the Great Synagogue, the last of whom was Simon the Just, who delivered them to Antigonus of Socho. From him they came down in regular succession to Simeon, who took our Saviour in his arms; to Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul was brought up; and last of all, to Rabbi Judah the Holy, who committed them to writing in the Mishna.

Dr. Prideaux, rejecting this Jewish fiction, observes, that after the death of Simon the Just, about 299 years before Christ, arose the Tannaim or Mishnaical doctors, who, by their comments and conclusions, added to the number of those traditions which had been received and allowed by Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue. Hence, towards the middle of the second century after Christ, under the reign of the Roman emperor Antoninus Pius, it was found necessary to commit these traditions to writing. This was requisite, because the traditions had been so much increased, that they could no longer be preserved by the memory of man; and also because their country had suffered considerably in the reign of the emperor Adrian, and many of their schools being dissolved, and their learned men cut off, the usual method of preserving their traditions had failed. Lest, therefore, the traditions should be forgotten and lost, it was resolved that they should be collected and committed to writing. Rabbi Judah, who was at that time rector of the school at Tiberias in Galilee, and president of the Sanhedrim at that place, undertook the work. He compiled it in six books, each consisting of several tracts, which altogether form the number of sixty-three. Doctor Prideaux computes that the Mishna was composed about the year 150 of our Lord. Dr. Lightfoot, however, says, that Rabbi Judah compiled the Mishna about the year of Christ 190, in the latter end of the reign of Commodus, or, as some compute, in the year of Christ 220. Dr. Lardner is of opinion, that this work could not have been finished before the year 190, or later.

Thus the book called the Mishna was formed; a book which was received by the Jews with great veneration, and which has been always held in high esteem among them. Their opinion of it is, that all the particulars which it contains were dictated by God himself to Moses upon Mount Sinai, as well as the written word itself; and, consequently, that it must be of the same divine authority, and ought to be as religiously observed. See GEMARA, TALMUD. Prideaux's Connection, vol. ii. p. 468, &c. edit. 1749; Lardner's Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. i. p. 178.

MISREPRESENTATION, the act of wilfully representing a thing otherwise than it is. We ought to be careful not to misrepresent the actions of others; and we should, with equal solicitude, avoid any misrepresentations of their words. Verbal misrepresentations may be productive of the greatest injury, and are indicative of radical malevolence. Words in themselves, and taken in their insulated state, are capable of diverse meanings; and he who reports any impressions without noticing what went before, or what followed after, may easily pervert the most harmless into the most criminal expressions; or cause the foulest inferences to be drawn from the most innocent discourse. What confusion and inquietude in society, what suspensions of confidence, what interruptions of good neighbourhood, what bitterness and animosity, are occasioned by verbal misrepresentations! How often has the fondest love been thus blighted, and the warmest friendship turned cold! The perverse construction, the imperfect repetition, or the mutilated statement, of what others have said, is one of the common expedients which the artful and treacherous know so well how to employ to serve their own sinister ends, to promote their own interested views, and to produce endless feuds, inextinguishable jealousies, and irreconcilable animosities. As the words of men may thus be misrepresented to serve the most mischievous purposes, it earnestly behoves us, on all occasions, when we repeat the discourse of others, to adhere as closely as possible to the words, and never wilfully to deviate from the sense. We ought to beware of stating that to have been designed as a positive declaration, which was intended only as a casual supposition; we are not to represent that as a literal affirmation, which was meant only as an incidental illustration, or a figurative ornament; for it is possible in this way to render an exact copy of the words, and yet a malicious perversion of the sense. But when we report what others have said, and particularly when the interest of the individual is in the least degree concerned in the fidelity of the representation, we are not only to repeat the expressions that were used, but the sense which they were at the time designed to bear, and which was evident either from the context of the discourse, or from the manner of the speaker.

By subtle queries, invidious remarks, and treacherous insinuations, the slanderer infuses doubt into the mind of one, respecting the integrity or the conduct of another; and thus he often effects his purpose with more safety than he could by a more open and direct attack. Thus he gradually, but surely, undermines the reputation of his neighbour, or supplants those who seem to stand in the way of his own advancement.

As secret is more dangerous than open hostility, so the characters of men are often more irreparably injured by calumnious suggestions, than by unreserved and unqualified calumnies. Sometimes slander is covered in the garb of praise; but then the praise is never bestowed except where it is likely to prove injurious to the person, by the aversions which it occasions, or the jealousy which it inflames. We have all many faults, but the slanderer aggravates them by his description. Regardless of an adherence to truth, he distorts and magnifies whatever he relates. Where the habit of falsehood, as in the base calumniator, is joined with a malevolent disposition, venial defects are magnified into criminal atrocities; and a trivial speck, almost too small to be noticed, is spoken of as an incurable ulceration. The malevolence of the slanderer is never willing to balance the vices with the virtues, the defects with the perfections, of the human character; but he censures and condemns without moderation or indulgence. Men cannot insure the effect which they intend, the issue of their actions, or the success of their exertions. We may deserve, but we cannot command, success. Good endeavours and honest efforts are in our power, but the ultimate event is in the hands of God. But when things go wrong, when good endeavours are frustrated, and pernicious effects issue from good principles or meritorious attempts, which could neither have been prevented nor foreseen, then how apt are men to impute the unexpected effect to deliberate contrivance, and to slander the intention which they ought to praise! Thus, those who are ever ready to calumniate what merits praise, impute the good which follows any particular course of action to chance, and the evil to design. Feloves's Body of Theology, vol. ii. p. 324—329.

MITYLENE, Μιτυλήνη, signifies purity, cleansing, or press. Mitylene was a large and beautiful city of the island of Lesbo. It claimed the primacy of the other cities; and, at length, it has given its name to the island itself. It was celebrated for learning and letters, no less than for power. Strabo and Mela describe the island of Lesbos as being called Mitylene in their time; and if it had this name in the days of St. Luke, then perhaps that writer may mean the island rather than the city, when he says, 'We came to Mitylene.' (Acts xx. 14.) Taylor's Sacred Geography.

MIZ'RAIM, or MISRAIM, מִצְרַיִם, Misraim, signifies tribulations, or who is streightened or blocked up. Mizraim was the son of Ham, and father of Ludim, Ananim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, Pathrusim, and Casluhim. (Gen. x. 6—13.) Egypt is commonly called in Scripture the land of Mizraim; and it is still denominated by the Arabians and other nations Misr. The name Mizraim is also sometimes used for the land of Egypt, sometimes for him that first peopled it, and sometimes for the inhabitants themselves. The word Mizraim, which is in the dual number, may express both Egypts, the superior and inferior, or the two parts of this country, as divided by the Nile. The city of Cairo, the capital of Egypt, as well as Egypt itself, is to this day called Misr by the Arabians. But the natives call it Chemi, that is, the Land of Cham, or Ham, as it is also sometimes called by the Hebrews. (Psal. lxxviii. 12.; cv. 23.; cvi. 22.)

The city of Memphis, in Hebrew Moph or Noph, and which was long the capital of Egypt, had also the name of Misr. The Oriental geographers say, that from the time of the conquests of Alexander, it had the name of Bablion or Babylon, in memory of the ancient Babylon of Chaldæa. But the cities of Memphis, Babylon, and Cairo, though not far from one another, and built from the ruins of each other, are not strictly in the same place. Cairo is east of the Nile, and old Memphis west.

MOAB, מואב, signifies of his father. Instead of Moab, the ancients pronounced Meab, the waters of the father, the son of the father; waters representing generation.

Moab was the son of Lot, and of his eldest daughter. (Gen. xix. 31, &c.) He was born about the same time as Isaac, in the year of the world 2108. He was father of the Moabites, whose habitation was beyond Jordan and the Dead Sea, on both sides the river Arnon. Their capital city was situated on that river; and was called Ar or Areopolis, or Ariol of Moab, or Rabbah Moab, that is, the capital of Moab, or Kir-haresh, that is, a city with brick walls. This country was originally possessed by a race of giants called Emim. (Deut. ii. 11, 12.) The Moabites conquered them, and afterwards the Amorites took a part from the Moabites. (Judg. xi. 13.) Moses conquered that part which belonged to the Amorites, and gave it to the tribe of Reuben. The Moabites were spared by Moses, for God had restricted him. (Deut. ii. 9.) But there always was a great antipathy between the Moabites and the Israelites, which occasioned many wars between them. Balaam seduced the Hebrews to idolatry and uncleanness, by means of the daughters of Moab, (Numb. xxv. 1, 2.) and Balak, king of this people, endeavoured to prevail on Balaam to curse Israel. God ordained, that the Moabites should not enter into the congregation of his people, because they had the inhumanity to refuse the Israelites a passage through their country, nor would supply them with bread and water in their necessity.

Eglon, king of the Moabites, was one of the first that oppressed Israel after the death of Joshua. Ehud killed Eglon, and Israel expelled the Moabites. (Judg. iii. 12, &c.) Hanun, king of the Ammonites, having insulted David's ambassadors, David made war against him, and subdued Moab and Ammon: under which subjection they continued till the separation of the ten tribes. The Ammonites and the Moabites continued in subjection to the kings of Israel to the death of Ahab.

Presently after the death of Ahab, the Moabites began to revolt. (2 Kings iii. 4, 5.) Mesha, king of Moab, refused the tribute of an hundred thousand lambs, and as many rams, which till then had been customarily paid, either yearly, or at the beginning of every reign; which of these two is not clearly expressed in Scripture. The reign of Ahaziah was too short to make war with them; but Jehoram, son of Ahab, and brother to Ahaziah, having ascended the throne, thought of reducing them to obedience. He invited Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, who with the king of Edom, then his vassal, entered Moab, where they were near perishing with thirst, but were miraculously relieved. (2 Kings iii. 16, &c.)

It is not easy to perceive what were the circumstances of the Moabites from this time; but Isaiah, at the beginning of the reign of king Hezekiah, threatens them with a calamity, which was to happen three years after his prediction, and which probably referred to the war that Shalmaneser king of Assyria made with the ten tribes, and the other people beyond Jordan.

Amos (i. 13, &c.) also foretold great miseries to them, which, probably, they suffered under Uzziah and Jotham, kings of Judah, or under Shalmaneser, (2 Chron. xxvi. 7, 8.; xxvii. 5.) or lastly, the war of Nebuchadnezzar, five years after the destruction of Jerusalem: we believe this prince carried them captive beyond the Euphrates, as the prophets had threatened, (Jerem. ix. 26.; xii. 14, 15.; xxv. 11, 12.; xlviii. 47.; xlix. 3. 6. 39.; 16.) and that Cyrus sent them home again, as he did the rest of the captives. After their return from captivity, they multiplied, and fortified themselves, as the Jews and other neighbouring people did; still in subjection to the kings of Persia, afterwards conquered by Alexander the Great, and in obedience to the kings of Syria and Egypt successively, and finally to the Romans. There is a probability also, that, in the later times of the Jewish republic, they obeyed the Asmonean kings, and afterwards Herod the Great.

The principal deities of the Moabites were Chemosh and Baal-peor. The Scripture speaks of Nebo, of Baal-meon, and of Baal-dibon, as gods of the Moabites: but it is likely these are rather names of places where Chemosh and Peor were worshipped; and that Baal-dibon, Baal-meon, and Nebo, are no other than Chemosh adored at Dibon, or at Meon, or on Mount Nebo.

MODERATION imports such proper government of our passions and pleasures, as shall prevent us from running into extremes of any kind, and shall produce a calm and temperate frame of mind. Moderation ought to take place in our wishes, pursuits, expectations, pleasures, and passions.

1. We should be moderate in our wishes. The active mind of man is seldom or never satisfied with its present condition, how prosperous soever. Originally formed for a wider range of objects, for a higher sphere of enjoyments, it finds itself, in every situation of fortune, straitened and confined. Sensible of deficiency in its state, it is ever sending forth the fond desire, the aspiring wish, after something beyond what is enjoyed at present. Assuredly, there is nothing unlawful in our wishing to be freed from whatever is disagreeable, and to obtain a fuller enjoyment of the comforts of life. But when these wishes are not tempered by reason, they are in danger of precipitating us into extravagance and folly. If we suffer our fancy to create to itself worlds of ideal happiness; if we feed our imagination with plans of opulence and splendour far beyond our rank; if we fix our wishes on certain stages of high advancement, or certain degrees of uncommon reputation or distinction, as the sole stations of felicity; the assured consequence will be, that we shall become unhappy in our present state, unfit for acting the part and discharging the duties that belong to it; we shall discompose the peace and order of our minds, and foment many hurtful passions. Here, then, let moderation begin its reign, by bringing within reasonable bounds the wishes that we form. As soon as they become extravagant, let us check them by proper reflections on the fallacious nature of those objects which the world hangs out to allure desire.

2. We should be moderate in our pursuits. When the active pursuits in which we engage rise beyond moderation, they fill the world with great disorders, often with flagrant crimes. Yet, all ambition is not to be condemned; nor ought high pursuits, on every occasion, to be checked. Some men are formed by nature, for rising into conspicuous stations of life. In following the impulse of their minds, and properly exerting the talents with which God has blessed them, there is room for ambition to act in a laudable sphere, and to become the instrument of much public good. But this may safely be pronounced, that the bulk of men are ready to over-rate their own abilities, and to imagine themselves equal to higher things than they were ever designed for by nature. We should, therefore, be sober in fixing our aims, and planning our destined pursuits. We should beware of being led aside from the plain path of sound and moderate conduct, by those false lights which self-flattery is always ready to hang out. By aiming at a mark too high, we may fall short of what it was in our power to have reached. Instead of attaining to eminence, we may not only expose ourselves to derision, but bring upon our heads manifold disasters.

3. We should be moderate in our expectations. When our state is flourishing, and the course of events proceeds according to our wish, we ought not to suffer our minds to be vainly lifted up. We ought not to flatter ourselves with high prospects of the increasing favours of the world, and the continuing applause of men. By want of moderation in our hopes, we not only increase dejection when disappointment comes, but we accelerate disappointment; we bring forward, with greater speed, disagreeable changes in our state. For the natural consequence of presumptuous expectation, is rashness in conduct. He, who indulges confident security, of course neglects due precautions against the dangers that threaten him; and his fall will be foreseen and predicted. He not only exposes himself unguarded to dangers; but he multiplies them against himself. By presumption and vanity, he either provokes enmity or incurs contempt. A temperate spirit, and moderate expectations, are the best safeguard of the mind in this uncertain and changing state. They enable us to pass through the world with most comfort. When we rise in the world, they contribute to our elevation; and if we fall, they render our fall the lighter.

4. We should be moderate in our pleasures. It is an invariable law of our present condition, that every pleasure which is pursued to excess converts itself into poison. What was intended for the cordial and refreshment of human life, through want of moderation, we turn to its bane. No sooner do we pass the line which temperance has drawn, than pernicious effects succeed. Could the monuments of death be laid open to our view, they would read a lecture in favour of moderation, much more powerful than any that the most eloquent preacher can give. We should behold the graves peopled with the victims of intemperance; we should behold those chambers of darkness hung round, on every side, with the trophies of luxury, drunkenness, and sensuality. So numerous should we find those martyrs of iniquity, that it may safely be asserted, where war or pestilence has slain its thousands, intemperate pleasure has slain its ten thousands.

5. We should be moderate in all our passions. This exercise of moderation is the more requisite, because every passion in human nature has of itself a tendency to run into excess. All passion implies a violent emotion of mind. Of course it is apt to derange the regular course of our ideas, and to produce confusion within. Of some passions, such as anger and resentment, the excess is so obviously dangerous, as loudly to call for moderation. He who gives himself up to the impetuosity of such passions, without restraint, is universally condemned. Of the insidious growth of passion, therefore, we have great reason to beware. Let us be persuaded, that moments of passion are always moments of delusion; that nothing truly is what it then seems to be; that all the opinions which we then form are erroneous; and that all the judgments which we then pass are extravagant. Let moderation accustom us to wait till the fumes of passion be spent; till the mist which it has raised begin to be dissipated. On no occasion let us imagine that strength of mind is shown by violence of passion. It is the strength of one who is in the delirium of a fever, or under the disease of madness. True strength of mind is shown in governing and resisting passion, and acting, on the most trying occasions, according to the dictates of conscience and right reason. Blair's Sermons, vol. iii. serm. xii.

MOLINISTS, a sect in the Romish church, who follow the doctrine and sentiments of the Jesuit Molina, relating to sufficient and efficacious grace. In the year 1588, he published a book to show that the operations of divine grace are entirely consistent with the freedom of human will; and he introduced a new kind of hypothesis to remove the difficulties attending the doctrines of predestination and liberty, and to reconcile the jarring opinions of Augustinians, Thomists, Semi-Pelagians, and other contentious divines. He affirmed that the decree of predestination to eternal glory was founded on a previous knowledge and consideration of the merits of the elect; that the grace, from whose operation these merits are derived, is not efficacious by its own intrinsic power only, but also by the consent of our own will, and because it is administered in those circumstances in which the Deity, by that branch of his knowledge which is called scientia media, foresees that it will be efficacious. The kind of prescience, denominated in the schools scientia media, is that foreknowledge of future contingents that arises from an acquaintance with the nature and faculties of rational beings, of the circumstances in which they shall be placed, of the objects that shall be presented to them, and of the influence which these circumstances and objects must have on their actions. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 475, 476.

MO'LOCH, מוֹלֵךְ, signifies king. Moloch, Molech, Milcom, or Melchom, was a god of the Ammonites. The word Moloch, signifies king, and Melchom, signifies their king. Moses in several places forbids the Israelites, under the penalty of death, to dedicate their children to Moloch, by making them pass through the fire, in honour of that god. (Lev. xviii. 21.; xx. 2, 3, 4, 5.) God himself threatens to pour out his wrath against such a man. There is great probability that the Hebrews were addicted to the worship of this deity, even before their coming out of Egypt, since Amos, (v. 26.) and after him St. Stephen, (Acts vii. 43.) reproaches them with having carried in the wilderness the tabernacle of their god Moloch. Solomon built a temple to Moloch, upon the Mount of Olives, (1 Kings xi. 7.); and Manasseh, a long time after, imitated his impiety, making his son pass through the fire in honour of Moloch. (2 Kings xxi. 3, 4.) It was chiefly in the valley of Tophet and Hinnom, east of Jerusalem, that such idolatrous worship was paid. (Jerem. xix. 5, 6, &c.)

Some are of opinion that they contented themselves with making their children leap over a fire sacred to Moloch; by this they consecrated them to some false deity; and, by this lustration, they purified them; this being an usual ceremony among the heathens on other occasions. Some believe that they made them pass through two fires opposite each other, for the same purpose. Others maintain that they rarely burnt their children as sacrifices to Moloch, (Psalm cvi. 37. Isaiah lvii. 5. Ezek. xvi. 20, 21.; xxiii. 37, 39.); it is said, (2 Kings xvii. 31.) that the inhabitants of Sepharvaim burnt their children in the fire to Anammelech and Adrammelech, their gods. It is, however, supposed that the Scripture expression, "causing the children to pass through the fire," may signify carrying them over the fire, as Sonnerat mentions to have been customary in India. By this means they were not destroyed, nor injured, except by being profaned. Mr. Bellamy observes, that the custom of passing the children through fire to Moloch, was similar to that of passing children through water at this day in baptism, as a sign that they are received into the church. The Ammonites being worshippers of the solar fire represented by this idol, this passing them before the fire which was burning at his altar, was an outward sign that these children were considered as belonging to that religion. It may, however, be doubted, whether the expression "burned," which occurs in some parts of Scripture, should be taken in a milder sense than that of slaying by fire.

When David conquered the Ammonites, (1 Chron. xx. 2.) he took the crown of their god Milcom, which weighed a talent of gold, and made a crown of it for himself. The great weight of this crown renders it probable, that David did not wear it upon his head, but caused it to be hung upon his throne, over his head. See CROWN.

Some believe that Moloch was the same as Saturn, to whom it is well known that human sacrifices were offered. Some think he was Mercury, some Venus, some Mars or Mithra; but the most probable opinion is, that Moloch signified the sun, or the king of heaven. Calmel's Dict.; Fragments annexed to Calmel's Dict. No. li. p. 99; Bellamy's History of all Religions, p. 32.

MONASTERY, a convent or house built for the reception of religious orders; whether it be abbey, priory, nunnery, or the like. Monastery is only properly applied to the houses of monks, mendicant friars, and nuns; the rest are more properly called religious houses. The houses belonging to the several religious orders which obtained in England and Wales, were cathedrals, colleges, abbeys, priories, preceptories, commanderies, hospitals, friaries, hermitages, chantries, and free chapels. These were under the direction and management of various officers. When William the Conqueror came over into England, he found about a third part of the lands in the possession of the clergy. Upwards of three thousand one hundred and eighty religious houses were suppressed by Henry VIII. and his predecessors. It is computed that fifty thousand persons were contained in these several religious houses. The sum total of the clear yearly revenue of the several religious houses, at the time of their dissolution, of which we have any accounts, seems to have been, 140,785*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* As the value of money is now seven or eight times what it was in the days of Henry VIII., we cannot reckon the whole at less than a million sterling a year. Besides this, there were many other religious foundations dissolved, of which we have no account. The plate and goods of different kinds, which came into the hands of the king at the same time, were of immense value.

As to the merits of these institutions, authors are much divided. While some have considered them as beneficial to learning, piety, and benevolence, others have thought them very injurious. Mr. Gilpin, speaking of Glastonbury Abbey, observes, 'Its fraternity is said to have consisted of five hundred established monks, besides nearly as many retainers on the abbey. Above four hundred children were not only educated in it, but entirely maintained. Strangers from all parts of Europe were liberally received, classed according to their sex and nation, and might consider the hospitable roof under which they lodged as their own. Five hundred travellers, with their horses, have been lodged at once within its walls; while the poor, from every side of the country, waited the ringing of the alms-bell; when they flocked in crowds, young and old, to the gate of the monastery, where they received, every morning, a plentiful provision for themselves and their families:—all this appears great and noble. On the other hand, when we consider five hundred persons bred up in indolence, and lost to the commonwealth; when we consider that these houses were the great nurseries of superstition, bigotry, and ignorance; the stewards of sloth, stupidity, and perhaps intemperance; when we consider that the education received in them had not the least tincture of useful learning, good manners, or true religion, but tended rather to vilify and disgrace the human mind; when we consider that the pilgrims and strangers who resorted thither were idle vagabonds, who got nothing abroad that was equivalent to the occupations they left at home; and when we consider, lastly, that indiscriminate alms-giving is not real charity, but an avocation from labour and industry, checking every idea of exertion, and filling the mind with abject notions, we are led to acquiesce in the fate of these foundations, and view their ruins, not only with a picturesque eye, but with moral and religious satisfaction.' MONEY. The Scripture often speaks of gold, silver, brass, or certain sums of money, of purchases made with money, or of current money, of money of a certain weight; but we do not observe coined or stamped money till late: which has induced a belief, that the ancient Hebrews took gold and silver only by weight. They considered only the purity of the metal, and not the stamp.

The most ancient manner of commerce was by way of barter, or exchanging one sort of merchandise for another. One man gave what he could spare to another, who gave him in return what he also did not want. Afterwards, the more precious metals were used in traffic, as things whose values are more generally known and stated. Lastly, they contrived to give this metal a certain mark, a certain weight, and a certain degree of alloy, to fix its value, and to save buyers and sellers the trouble of weighing and examining the metal.

Abraham weighs out four hundred shekels of silver to purchase Sarah's tomb, (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16.); and the Scripture observes, that he paid this in current money to the merchant. Joseph was sold by his brethren to the Midianites for twenty pieces of silver. (Gen. xxxvii. 28.) The brethren of Joseph bring back with them into Egypt the money they found in their sacks, in the same weight as they had given. (Gen. xliii. 21.) Isaiah describes the wicked weighing silver, in a balance, to make an idol of it, (Isaiah xlv. 6.); and Jeremiah (xxxii. 10.) weighs seventeen pieces of silver in a pair of scales, to pay for a field he had bought. In these and many other passages, there are only these three things mentioned: 1. The metal is gold or silver, and never copper, which was not used in traffic as money. 2. The weight, a talent, a shekel, a gerah or obolus, of the weight of the sanctuary, and of the king's weight. 3. The alloy, of pure or fine gold and silver, and of good alloy, as received by the merchant. It is no where spoken of the impression or of the coinage; but it is said, they weighed the silver or other commodities, by the shekel and the talent. This shekel, therefore, and this talent, were not fixed and determined pieces of money, but weights that were applied to all things used in commerce.

It is generally thought that Darius, son of Hystaspes, first began to coin gold; yet the inference that the money which Abraham paid for the sepulchre of Machpelah, was not coined because it was weighed, does not appear to be quite conclusive. Ezekiel (xlv. 12.) reduces the gerah and maneh or mina, which were originally foreign money, and probably Persian, to the weight of that of the Hebrews. Under the dominion of the Persians, the Hebrews were scarcely at liberty to coin money of their own, being under the obedience of these princes, and very low in their own country. They were still less able under the Chaldeans during the Babylonish captivity: nor did they afterwards under the Grecians, to whom they were subject till the time of Maccabeus, to whom Antiochus Sidetes granted the privilege of coining money in Judea. (1 Mac. xv. 6.) This is the first Hebrew money, properly so called, of which we know. There were shekels and demi-shekels of silver.

MONK, anciently denoted a person who retired from the world to give himself up entirely to God, and to live in solitude and abstinence. The word is derived from the Latin monachus, and that from the Greek μόναχος, 'solitary.'

Amongst the innumerable corruptions of Christianity which have prevailed in the Catholic church, there is none that makes a more conspicuous figure than the institution of monachism or monkery; and, if traced to its origin, it will be found strikingly to exemplify the truth of the maxim, that, as some of the largest and loftiest trees spring from very small seeds, so the most extensive and wonderful effects sometimes arise from very inconsiderable causes. In times of persecution, during the first ages of the church, whilst 'the heathen raged, and the rulers took counsel together against the Lord, and against his anointed,' many pious Christians, male and female, married and unmarried, justly accounting that no human felicity ought to come in competition with their fidelity to Christ, and diffident of their own ability to persevere in resisting the temptations with which they were incessantly harassed by their persecutors, took the resolution to abandon their professions, and worldly prospects, and, whilst the storm lasted, to retire to unfrequented places, far from the haunts of men, the married with or without their wives, as agreed between them, that they might enjoy in quietness their faith and hope, and, exempt from the temptations to apostacy, employ themselves principally in the worship and service of their Maker. The cause was reasonable, and the motive praiseworthy; but the reasonableness arose solely from the circumstances. When the latter were changed, the former vanished, and the motive could no longer be the same. When there was not the same danger in society, there was not the same occasion to seek security in solitude. Accordingly, when persecution ceased, and the profession of Christianity was rendered perfectly safe, many returned without blame from their retirement, and resumed their stations in society. Some, indeed, familiarized by time to a solitary life, at length preferred, through habit, what they had originally adopted through necessity. They did not, however, waste their time in idleness; they supported themselves by their labour, and gave the surplus in charity. But they never thought of flattering themselves by vows or engagements, because, by so doing, they must have exposed their souls to new temptations, and perhaps greater dangers. It was, therefore, a very different thing from that system of monkery which afterwards became so prevalent, though, in all probability, it suggested the idea of it, and may be considered as the first step towards it.

Egypt, the fruitful parent of superstition, afforded the first example, strictly speaking, of the monastic life. Anthony, an illiterate youth of that country, in the times of Athanasius, distributed his patrimony, deserted his family and house, and took up his residence among the tombs, and in a ruined tower, and, after a long and painful noviciate, at length advanced three days' journey into the desert, to the eastward of the Nile, where discovering a lonely spot which possessed the advantages of shade and water, he fixed his last abode. His example and his lessons infected others, whose curiosity pursued him to the desert; and before he quitted life, which was prolonged to the term of one hundred and five years, he beheld a numerous progeny imitating his original. The prolific colonies of monks multiplied with rapid increase on the sands of Libya, upon the rocks of Thebais, and the cities of the Nile. Even to the present day the traveller may explore the ruins of fifty monasteries, which were planted to the south of Alexandria, by the disciples of Anthony. Inflamed by the example of Anthony, a Syrian youth, whose name was Hilarion, fixed his dreary abode on a sandy beach, between the sea and a morass, about seven miles from Gaza. The austere penance in which he persisted forty-eight years, diffused a similar enthusiasm, and innumerable monasteries were soon distributed over all Palestine. In the west, Martin of Tours, 'a soldier, a hermit, a bishop, and a saint,' established the monasteries of Gaul; and the progress of monkery is said not to have been less rapid, or less universal, than that of Christianity itself. Every province, and, at last, every city of the empire, was filled with their increasing multitudes. The disciples of Anthony spread themselves beyond the tropic, over the Christian empire of Ethiopia. The monastery of Bangor, in Flintshire, a few miles south of Wrexham, contained above two thousand monks, and from thence a numerous colony was dispersed amongst the barbarians of Ireland; and Iona, one of the western isles of Scotland, which was planted by the Irish monks, diffused over the northern regions a ray of science and superstition.

These unhappy exiles from social life were impelled by the dark genius of superstition to persuade themselves that every proselyte who entered the gate of a monastery trod the steep and thorny path of eternal happiness. The popular monks, whose reputation was connected with the fame and success of the order, assiduously laboured to multiply the number of their fellow captives. They insinuated themselves into noble and opulent families, and the specious arts of flattery and seduction were employed to secure those proselytes who might bestow wealth or dignity on the monastic profession. The lives of the monks were consumed in penance and solitude; undisturbed by various occupations which fill the time, and exercise the faculties, of reasonable, active, and social beings. They passed their lives, without personal attachments, among a crowd which had been formed by accident, and were detained in the same prison by force or prejudice. Their days were professedly employed in vocal or mental prayer; they assembled in the evening, and were awakened in the night for the public worship of the monastery; and to such a pitch was absurdity at length carried, that one class of them came ultimately to sink under the painful weight of crosses and chains, and their emaciated limbs were confined by collars, bracelets, gauntlets, and greaves of massy iron.

The ethics of monks is a mere caricature of virtue, in which every feature is exaggerated, distorted, or out of place; and, as hath often happened in other matters, though the likeness is preserved, what is beautiful in the original, is hideous in the copy. The doctrines of Christianity are divinely adapted to the state of man in this world, considered as a fallen and corrupted being. They exhibit a remedy for his moral depravity in the grand and interesting truths which the Gospel proclaims as the objects of his faith, the ground of his hope, and the motives of his love and joy. But he is called to the exercise of a self-denial, the mortification of his fleshly appetites, disconformity to the course of this world, patience under sufferings of various kinds, and in the way of well-doing, to seek for glory, honour, and immortality, in the world to come. In the system of monkery all these Christian virtues are carried to the most ridiculous extreme. How grossly must men's notions of truth and rectitude be perverted, who can think that the all-wise Creator gave hands to any man to be kept in a position which unfitted them for being of use to himself or others; that he gave the faculty of speech, but not to be employed in communicating knowledge! Yet these things are the subject of panegyric even from the pen of Gregory Nazianzen, a person of unquestionable talents and virtue. 'To go into a convent,' said Dr. Johnson, 'for fear of being immoral, is as if a man should cut off his hands for fear he should steal.' To suffer with patience and fortitude, when called to it, for the cause of truth, is both virtuous and heroic; but the self-inflicted penances of the miserable hermit serve as a testimony of nothing so much as the idiocy or insanity of the sufferer; for with regard to God, they are derogatory from his perfections; they exhibit him as an object rather of terror than of love, as a tyrant rather than the parent of the universe. Jones's History of the Waldenses, pp. 228—233.

MONOTHELITES, a denomination in the seventh century. They received their name from μόνος, 'single,' and θέλημα, 'will;' because they allowed only of one will in Jesus Christ.

The orthodox belief, that Jesus Christ was possessed of the wills and operations peculiar both to his divinity and humanity, was first opposed by Theodore, Bishop of Pharon, who contended that the humanity was so united to the divinity, that, though it fully possessed its own faculties, yet its operation must be ascribed to the divinity. Cyrus, Bishop of Phasis, adopted the opinions of Theodore; and the sect of which they were the leaders were termed Monothelites, from their affirming that the two natures in Christ were so constituted, that he possessed only one will and one operation, which they termed Theandric. Protected and nurtured by imperial approbation, the Monothelites became a very considerable sect. The decisions of the sixth general council at Constantinople determined that their opinions were not consistent with the purity of the Christian faith. The Monothelites were formally condemned; and, though sometimes the objects of royal favour, yet they were in general contemned and depressed. Thus persecuted, they retired to the neighbourhood of Mount Libanus: but in the twelfth century they abjured their schismatical opinions, and were admitted into communion with the Romish church. Our concern for the difficulties they sustained after their condemnation cannot but be lessened by the consideration of the cruelties which in the day of their power they were tempted to commit against their orthodox brethren. The Abyssinian church appears still to retain the opinions of the Monothelites. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 397, 398; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. p. 36.

MONTANISTS, a denomination that arose in the second century, and derived their name from Montanus, their leader. Montanus, a native of Ardaba, in Mysia, affected to believe himself the Paraclete or Comforter, and that he was sent to perfect the moral doctrines of Christ. He made a distinction between the Comforter promised by Christ to his apostles, and the Holy Spirit which was shed upon them on the day of Pentecost, and considered the former as a Divine teacher, which character he himself assumed. He and his followers pretended to the gift of prophecy, and extraordinary illumination, and were distinguished by their extreme austerity. Not less averse to the arts which improve, than to the innocent enjoyments which embellish human life, Montanus anathematized all those sciences which have polished or entertained mankind. Not only the male, but even the female disciples of this heretic pretended to the gifts of inspiration; amongst whom two ladies of distinguished quality resigned their husbands, and every delightful domestic connexion, to preach in public according to the dictates of their prophetic spirit, which was generally exerted in denunciations of woe to the world, particularly to the Roman empire.

The following observations of Dr. Priestley respecting the Montanists must be received with some allowance, as a particular Providence forms an essential article of the Christian faith, and consequently the divine influence occasionally exerted upon the human mind. In the main, however, they are judicious and sensible. 'That persons of Montanus's turn of thinking should mistake the natural emotions of their own minds for divine impulses, is not at all extraordinary. This we see to have been the case with persons of all religions—Heathens, Mahometans, and Christians. We find even at this day how unwilling men of good sense in other respects are to give up all idea of supernatural assistance, or of invisible miracles, such as are incapable of any proper proof, especially upon extraordinary occasions. When they see men make great exertions either in doing or suffering, they are apt to imagine that they have the aid of more power than their own. They are apt to think so with respect to themselves. The early Christians had this idea with respect to the power of bearing torture in martyrdom; whereas the natural powers of man, and the principles of Christianity, will appear to those who consider the force of them, abundantly sufficient for all that we read of men having borne or done in those circumstances.' Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 99, 100.

MONTH. The ancient Hebrews had no particular names for their months. They said, the first, second, third, &c. In Exodus (xiii. 4.) Moses mentions the month Abib, or the month of the young ears of corn, or of the new fruits. This is probably the Egyptian name of the month, which the Hebrews afterwards called Nisan, and which was the first of the holy year. Every where else Moses marks out the months by their order of succession: and the same method is observed in the books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. Under Solomon we read of the month Ziph, which is the second month of the holy year, and which answers to that afterwards called Jiar. In the same chapter we read of the month Bul, which is the eighth of the holy year, and answers to Marschevan, or October. Lastly, in chapter viii. 2, of the same book, we read of the month Ethanim, or the month of the valiant, which answers to Tisri, the seventh of the holy year.

Critics are not agreed about the origin of these names of the months. Scaliger thought Solomon borrowed them from the Phœnicians, with whom he had much intercourse. Grotius believes they came from the Chaldæans, and F. Hardouin fetches them from the Egyptians. However this be, we see nothing of them, either before or after Solomon. But after the captivity of Babylon, they continued the names of the months as they had found them among the Chaldæans and Persians.

At first the Hebrews followed the same distribution of their year and months, as Egypt. Their year consisted of 365 days, and of twelve months, each of thirty days. This appears by the enumeration of the days of the year of the Deluge. (Gen. vii.) The twelfth month was to have thirty-five days; and they have no intercalary month, but at the end of one hundred and twenty years, when the beginning of the year following was out of its place thirty whole days.

After the coming out of Egypt, which happened in the month of March, God ordained that the holy year, that is the calendar of religious feasts and ceremonies, should begin at Nisan, the seventh month of the civil year, which the Hebrews have always continued to begin at the month Tisri, answering to our September. After the Babylonish captivity, the Jews, being but an handful of people in the midst of others surrounding them, complied with such customs and manners of dividing times and seasons, as were used by the people that ruled over them; first of the Chaldæans, afterwards of the Persians, and, lastly, of the Grecians. They took the names of the months from the Chaldæans and Persians, and perhaps their manner of dividing years and months. However, we cannot be sure of this, not exactly knowing the plan of the Chaldæan months. But we see plainly by Ecclesiasticus (xliii. 6.), by the Maccabees, by Josephus, and by Philo, that in their time they followed the custom of the Grecians: that is, that their months were lunar, and their years solar.

These lunar months were each of twenty-nine days and a half, or, rather, one was of thirty days, the following of twenty-nine, and so on alternately: that which had thirty days was called a full or complete month; that which had but twenty-nine days was called incomplete. The new moon was always the beginning of the month, and this day they called Neomenia, new moon day, or new month. They did not begin it from that point of time in which the moon is in conjunction with the sun, but from the time at which she becomes visible after that conjunction. And to determine this moment, it is said, they had people posted on elevated places, to inform the Sanhedrim as soon as possible. Proclamation was then made, 'The feast of the new moon, the feast of the new moon;' and the beginning of the month was proclaimed by sound of trumpet. For fear of any failing in the observance of that command which directed certain ceremonies at the beginning of each month, they continued the Neomenia two days; the first was called the day of the moon's appearance, the other of the moon's disappearance. So say the Rabbins: but there is great probability, that, if this was ever practised, it was only in provinces distant from Jerusalem. For in the temple, and in the capital city, there was always a fixed calendar, or at least a fixed decision for festival days, determined by the house of judgment.

We said that the months of the Jews answered to ours, Nisan to March and April, Jiar to April and May, &c.; for the lunar months cannot be reduced exactly to the solar ones. The vernal equinox falls between the twentieth and twenty-first of March, according to the course of the solar year; but in the lunar year the new moon will fall in the month of March, and the full moon in the month of April. So that the Hebrew months will commonly answer to two of our months, the end of one, and the beginning of the other.

Twelve lunar months making only three hundred and fifty-four days and six hours, the Jewish year was short of the Roman by twelve days. To recover the equinoctial points from which this difference of the solar and lunar year would separate the new moon of the first month, the Jews every three years intercalated a thirteenth month, which they called Ve-adar, the second Adar. By this means the lunar year equalled the solar; because in thirty-six solar months there would be thirty-seven lunar months. The Sanhedrim regulated this intercalation, and this thirteenth month was placed between Adar and Nisan; so that the passover was always celebrated the first full moon after the equinox.

MOON. Luna. The Lord created the sun and the moon on the fourth day of the world, to preside over day and night, and to distinguish times and seasons. (Gen. i. 15, 16.) As the sun presides over day; so the moon presides over night; the sun regulates the course of a year, the moon the course of a month; the sun is, as it were, king of the host of heaven, the moon is queen. Moses speaks of the moon as of a luminous body not much inferior to the sun; yet it is certain that the moon, when compared to the sun, is only a very small body. But the sacred author speaks in a popular manner. They call that a great light which appears great to us; not meaning to determine its absolute magnitude. The moon was appointed for the distinction of seasons, of festival days, and days of assembling. (Ps. civ. 19.)

We do not know whether the Hebrews understood the cause of lunar eclipses; but they always speak of them in terms which intimate that they considered them as wonders, and as effects of the power and wrath of God. When the prophets speak of the destruction of empires, they often say that the sun shall be covered with darkness; the moon withdraw her light; and the stars fall from heaven. (Isai. xiii. 10.; xxiv. 23. Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8. Joel ii. 10.; iii. 15.) But we cannot perceive that there is any direct mention of an eclipse.

Among the Orientals in general, and the Hebrews in particular, the worship of the moon was more extensive, and more famous, than that of the sun. (Deut. iv. 19.; xvii. 3.) Moses bids the Israelites take care, when they see the sun, the moon, the stars, and the host of heaven, not to pay them any superstitious worship, because they were only creatures appointed for the service of all nations that are under heaven. Job (xxxi. 26, 27.) also speaks of the same worship: 'If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart has been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand,' in token of adoration. The Hebrews worshipped the moon by the name of Meni, of Astarte, of the goddess of the groves, of the queen of heaven, &c. The Syrians adored her as Astarte, Urania, or Coelestis; the Arabians, as Alilat; the Egyptians, as Isis; the Greeks, as Diana, Venus, Juno, Hecate, Bellona, Minerva, &c.

MORALITY is the relation or proportion which actions bear to a given rule, and is generally used in reference to a good life. If this life be considered as preparatory to another, that other must be regarded as retrospective to this; and to what else can it be retrospective, but to the moral good or evil of our actions, or, in other words, to our conduct as beings accountable for our conduct? As the morality or immorality of our present conduct is usually found, even in this life, to have some degree of connexion with our happiness, we cannot but suppose that, in a future life, that connexion will be found still closer; and that the actions of men in a probationary state will regulate their appropriate portion of happiness or misery in a state of retribution. Thus we see that the light of nature, or the inferences of reason, reflecting on the different tendencies of good and evil, and the moral constitution of the world, concur to support the authoritative declarations of revealed religion, that God will, in a future life, render to every man according to his works.

Let us notice the effect of Christianity upon one who was long a hater of it, and yet became its illustrious defender; I mean the apostle Paul. What was his character before his conversion to Christianity? That of a furious bigot, an unrelenting persecutor of those whose religious opinions were different from his own; a man who 'breathed threatenings and slaughter' against others, whose only crime was sublime virtue; a man who delighted in sanguinary scenes, who held the clothes of those that stoned martyrs, gnashing his teeth for vexation all the time, that he was too young to be more actively engaged in the brutal scene; a man whose principal delight was in making 'havoc of the church,' disturbing domestic privacy, 'entering into houses, and haling men and women to prison;' who 'punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme, and, being exceedingly mad against them, persecuted them unto strange cities.' (Acts vii. 58.; viii. 1-3.; ix. 1.; xxvi. 10, 11. 19.) How different were his actions and his sentiments after he had been converted on his way to Damascus, and became 'obedient unto the heavenly vision!' Observe how pure, how elevated, how benevolent, how peculiarly fitted to the wants of universal society, are the ethics become of the man who had just before found his greatest pleasure and glory in persecuting and torturing his fellow-creatures! 'Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. Be kindly-affectioned one to another with brotherly love; in honour preferring one another; not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; distributing to the necessity of saints; given to hospitality. Bless them which persecute you; bless, and curse not. Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Mind not high things. Be not wise in your own conceits. Live peaceably with all men. Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath. If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.' (Rom. xii. 9-21.) Where, except in the Bible, or in books which inculcate the sentiments of the Bible, will you find such a group of admirable peace-inspiring precepts? Observe, again, how this apostle depicts the sublime importance of charity, or love. 'Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.' (1 Cor. xiii. 1—3.) Surely this was not always the language of the fanatical persecutor Saul! Whence then did he derive these elevated sentiments, this preference of universal benevolence to the most splendid and miraculous endowments? Are these the notions of a vile impostor, or of a poor deluded enthusiast, or of one whom 'much learning has made mad'? No: they are the genuine productions of the religion of Jesus, invariably manifested in a greater or less degree wherever that religion is efficacious; and proving clearly that that religion proceeds from Him who wills the harmony and the happiness of the physical and rational world. Gregory's Letters on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion, vol. i. pp. 251—254.

MORAVIANS, or UNITED BRETHREN.
Names.—The name of Moravians, or Moravian Brethren, was in England given to the members of a foreign Protestant church, calling itself the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren. This church formerly consisted of three branches—the Bohemian, Moravian, and Polish. After its renovation, in the year 1722, some of its members came to England in 1728, who, being of the Moravian branch, became known by that appellation; and all those who joined them, and adopted their doctrines and discipline, have ever since been called Moravians. Strictly speaking, however, that name is not applicable to them, nor generally admitted, either by themselves, or in any public documents, in which they are called by their proper names, the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren.

The few remaining members of the ancient church of the United Brethren in Bohemia, Moravia, and Poland, being much persecuted by the Popish clergy, many of them left all their possessions, and fled with their families into Silesia and Saxony. In Saxony they found protection from a Saxon nobleman, Nicholas Lewis, Count of Zinzendorf, who gave them some waste land on one of his estates, on which, in 1722, they built a village at the foot of a hill, called the Hut-Berg, or Watch-hill. This occasioned them to call their settlement Herrnhut, the watch of the Lord. Hence their enemies designated them in derision by the name of Herrnhuters, which is altogether improper, but by which they are known in some countries abroad.

Rise, Progress, and History.—By their own account, this community derive their origin from the ancient Bohemian and Moravian Brethren, who existed as a distinct people ever since the year 1457, when, separating from those who took up arms in defence of their protestations against Popish errors, they formed a plan for church fellowship and discipline, agreeable to their insight into the Scriptures, and called themselves at first, Fratres Legis Christi, or Brethren after the Law of Christ, and afterwards, on being joined by others of the same persuasion in other places, Unitas Fratrum, or Fratres Unitatis. By degrees they established congregations in various places, and spread themselves into Moravia and other neighbouring states. Being anxious to preserve among themselves regular episcopal ordination, and, at a synod held at Lhota in 1467, taking into consideration the scarcity of ministers regularly ordained among them, they chose three of their priests ordained by Calixtine bishops, and sent them to Stephen, Bishop of the Waldenses, then residing in Austria, by whom they were consecrated bishops; co-bishops, and con-seniores, being appointed from the rest of their presbyters. In 1468, a great persecution arose against them, and many were put to death. In 1481, they were banished from Moravia, when many of them fled as far as Mount Caucasus, and established themselves there, till driven away by subsequent troubles.

In the mean time, disputes respecting points of doctrine, the enmity of the Papists, and other causes, raised continual disturbances and great persecutions at various periods, till the reformation by Luther, when they opened a correspondence with that eminent reformer and his associates, and entered into several negociations, both with him and Calvin, concerning the extension of the Protestant cause. But their strict adherence to the discipline of their own church, founded, in their view, on that of the primitive churches, and the acknowledged impossibility of its application among the mixed multitude, of which the Lutheran and Calvinist churches consisted, occasioned a cessation of co-operation; and, in the sequel, the brethren were again left to the mercy of their persecutors, by whom their churches were destroyed, and their ministers banished, till the year 1575, when they obtained an edict from the Emperor of Germany, for the public exercise of their religion. This toleration was renewed in 1609, and liberty granted them to erect new churches. But a civil war, which broke out in Bohemia in 1612, and a violent persecution which followed it in 1621, again occasioned the dispersion of their ministers, and brought great distress upon the brethren in general. Some fled into England, others to Saxony and Brandenburg; whilst many, overcome by the severity of the persecution, conformed to the rites of the church of Rome.

About the year 1640, by incessant persecution, and the most oppressive measures, this ancient church was brought to so low an ebb, that it appeared nearly extinct. The persecutions which took place at the beginning of the eighteenth century were the occasion that many of the scattered descendants of the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren at length resolved to quit their native land, and seek liberty of conscience in foreign countries. Some emigrated into Silesia, and others into Upper Lusatia, a province of Saxony, adjoining to Bohemia. The latter, as before observed, found a protector in Nicholas count Zinzendorff, a pious, zealous man, and a Lutheran by education. He hoped that the religious state of the Lutherans in his neighbourhood would be greatly improved by the conversation and example of these devout emigrants; and he, therefore, sought to prevail upon the latter to join the Lutheran church altogether. To this the brethren objected, being unwilling to give up their ancient discipline, and would rather proceed to seek an asylum in another place; when the count, struck with their stedfast adherence to the tenets of their forefathers, began more maturely to examine their pretensions; and, being convinced of the justness of them, he procured for the brethren the renovation of their ancient constitution, and ever after proved a most zealous promoter of their cause. He is, therefore, very justly esteemed by them as the chief instrument in the hand of God in restoring the sinking church, and, in general, gratefully remembered for his disinterested and indefatigable labours in promoting the interests of religion, both at home and abroad. In 1735, having been examined and received into the clerical order, by the theological faculty at Tubingen, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, he was consecrated a bishop of the brethren's church. Dr. Potter, then archbishop of Canterbury, congratulated him on this event, and promised his assistance to a church of confessors, of whom he wrote in terms of the highest respect, for their having maintained the pure and primitive faith and discipline, in the midst of the most tedious and cruel persecutions. His Grace, who was well versed in the principles of church government, admitted the Moravian episcopal succession, and, in conformity with his sentiments, the Parliament of Great Britain, after mature investigation, acknowledged the Unitas Fratrum to be an ancient Protestant episcopal church, and passed an act in their favour in 1749.

After the establishment of a regular congregation of the United Brethren at Herrnhut, multitudes of pious persons from various parts flocked to it, many of whom had private opinions in religious matters, to which they were strongly attached. This occasioned great disputes, which even threatened the destruction of the society; but, by the indefatigable exertions of count Zinzendorff, these disputes were allayed, and the statutes being drawn up, and agreed to in 1727, for better regulation, brotherly love and union were re-established, and no schism whatever, in point of doctrine, has, since that period, disturbed the peace of the church.

Distinguishing Tenets.—The doctrine of the United Brethren does not differ in essentials from that of other Protestant churches. It has, however, been much misrepresented by various authors. Though they themselves admit that they were joined by some persons who had previously imbibed extravagant notions, and who propagated these notions with zeal among their new friends, in a phraseology unscriptural and extremely reprehensible, yet opinions and practices have been attributed to them of an exceptionable nature, which they totally disavow. Much also of the extravagance and absurdity which has been laid to the charge of count Zinzendorff, is not to be attributed to him, but to those persons who, taking down in short hand his extempore sermons, and other discourses, in which he made use of very bold expressions, printed and published them without his knowledge and consent. The synods of the Brethren, however, have protested against and cancelled several collections of hymns and other writings, which contained improper and unscriptural expressions, though at a certain period suffered to be published without sufficient revision; but their resolutions and apologies are of course less known to the public, than the invectives of their enemies.

Though the Brethren acknowledge no other standard of truth than the sacred Scriptures, they in general profess to adhere to the Augsburg confession of Faith. Both in their summary of Christian doctrine (which is used for the instruction of their children,) and in their general instructions and sermons they teach the doctrine of the Trinity; and in their prayers, hymns, and litanies, address the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in the same manner as is done in other Christian churches. Yet they chiefly direct their hearers to Jesus Christ, as the appointed channel of the Deity, in whom God is known and made manifest to man. They dwell on what he has done and suffered, and on the glorious descriptions given of him as an Almighty Saviour. They recommend love to him, as the constraining principle of the Christian's conduct; and their general manner is more by beseeching men to be reconciled to God, than by alarming them by the terrors of the law, and the threatenings against the impenitent, which they, however, do not fail occasionally to set before their hearers.

They avoid, as much as possible, every thing that would lead to controversy; and though they strongly insist upon salvation by grace alone through faith, yet they will not enter into any explanation, or give any decided opinion, concerning particular election. They have, therefore, been considered by high Calvinists as leaning to Arminianism, and by others, as Calvinists; but they themselves decline the adoption of either name. They profess to believe that the kingdom of Christ is not confined to any party, community, or church; and they consider themselves, though closely united in one body, or visible church, as spiritually joined in the bond of Christian love to all who are taught of God, and belong to the universal church of Christ, however much they may differ in forms, which they deem non-essentials.

Worship, Government, and Discipline.—

The worship of the Moravians is chiefly directed to God, in the person of our Lord Jesus Christ; though in doctrine they are strict Trinitarians. All the great festivals celebrated in other Protestant churches are attended to by them with due solemnity; and, during the whole of the Passion-week, they have daily services for the contemplation of our Lord's last discourses and sufferings. On Maunday Thursday they celebrate the Lord's Supper, and also on every fourth Sunday throughout the year. They have prescribed forms of prayer for baptisms, both of children and adults, and for burials; a litany which is read every Sunday morning, and one for early service on Easter morning, besides others which they call liturgies, and which are chiefly sung and chaunted.

Though all profane songs and dramatic music are prohibited throughout their church by the synods, yet they value and carefully cultivate music, both vocal and instrumental, as a science; and, where they have the means, they use it in their religious worship, with peculiar effect. Some of their services consist entirely in singing, (the whole congregation joining,) when a succession of verses forms a connected contemplation of some Scripture subject. Two texts of Scripture are appointed for every day in the year. Their ordination services, their manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper, and other church transactions, peculiar to themselves, are very solemn and impressive. Their chapels are without pews, but have moveable benches. Plainness, neatness, and convenience, are their chief study in their construction. Persecutions originally, and afterward inclination, caused the Moravian Brethren to have a predilection for forming settlements, where they may live without disturbance, and in which their children and young people are not exposed to the allurements of vice, nor obliged to see and hear the conduct and language of the profane and dissolute. In these settlements they have separate houses for single men, single women, and widows. In these houses, all persons who are able, and have not an independent support, labour in their own occupation, and contribute a stipulated sum for board and lodging. Community of goods does not, nor ever did, exist among them, though it has been often reported, and very generally believed. Even the contributions towards their charitable establishments and missions are perfectly voluntary.

Their schools are numerous, and conducted upon a plan which has recommended them to great numbers of persons not belonging to the community, as the best seminaries for moral education.

Their church is episcopal; but, though they consider episcopal ordination as necessary to qualify the servants of the church for their respective functions, they allow to their bishops no elevation of rank, or pre-eminent authority. The Moravian church, from its first establishment, has been governed by Synods, consisting of deputies from all the congregations, and by other subordinate bodies, which they call Conferences. According to their regulations, episcopal ordination, of itself, does not confer any power to preside over one or more congregations; and a bishop can discharge no office except by the appointment of a Synod, or of its delegate, the elders' conference of the unity. Presbyters among them can perform every function of the bishop, except ordination. Deacons are assistants to Presbyters, much in the same way as in the church of England. Deaconesses are retained, for the purpose of privately admonishing their own sex, and visiting them in their sickness; but they are not permitted to teach in public, and far less to administer the sacraments. They have also Seniores Civiles, or lay elders, in contradistinction to spiritual elders or bishops, who are appointed to watch over the constitution and discipline of the unity of the brethren, &c. The Synods are generally held once in seven years; and, besides all the bishops, and the deputies sent by each congregation, those women who have appointments, as above described, if on the spot, are also admitted as hearers, and may be called upon to give their advice in what relates to the ministerial labour among their own sex; but they have no decisive vote in the Synod. The votes of all the other members are equal. In questions of importance, or of which the consequence cannot be foreseen, neither the majority of votes, nor the unanimous consent of all present, can decide: but recourse is had to the lot, which, however, is never made use of except after mature deliberation and prayer; nor is any thing submitted to its decision which does not, after being thoroughly weighed, appear to the assembly eligible in itself.

The Synod takes into consideration the inward and outward state of the unity, and the concerns of the congregations and missions, and takes cognizance of errors in doctrine, or deviations in practice, &c. Towards the conclusion of every Synod, a kind of executive board is chosen, which is called the Elders' Conference of the Unity. At present it consists of thirteen elders, and is divided into four committees, or departments. 1. The Missions' department, which superintends all the concerns of the mission into heathen countries. 2. The Helpers' department, which watches over the purity of doctrine, and the moral conduct of the different congregations. 3. The Servants' department, to which the economical concerns of the unity are committed. 4. The Overseers' department, of which the business is to see that the constitution and discipline of the brethren be every where maintained. Each department meets, as a committee, to consider the particular subjects committed to it; but no resolution has the least force till it be laid before the whole assembly of the Elders' Conference of the Unity, and have the approbation of that body, whose powers are very extensive.

Besides this general Conference of Elders, which superintends the affairs of the whole unity, there is a conference of elders belonging to each congregation, which directs its affairs, and to which all the members of the congregation are subject. This body, which is called the 'Elders' Conference of the Congregation,' consists, 1. of the Minister, as president, to whom the ordinary care of the congregation is committed, except when it is very numerous, and then the general inspection of it is entrusted to a separate person, called 'Congregation Helper;' 2. of the Warden, whose office it is to superintend, with the aid of his council, all outward concerns of the congregation, and to assist every individual with his advice; 3. of a Married Pair, who care particularly for the spiritual welfare of the married people; 4. of a Single Clergyman, to whose care the single men and boys are more particularly committed; and 5. of those women who assist in caring for the spiritual and temporal welfare of their own sex, and who, in this conference, have equal votes with the men. The Elders' Conference of each Congregation is answerable for its proceedings to the Elders' Conference of the Unity; and visitations from the latter to the former are held from time to time, that the affairs of each congregation, and the conduct of its immediate governors, may be intimately known to the supreme executive government of the whole church. In every country they have superintendents of their congregations in it, whom they called Provincials. These are generally bishops, but a priest is likewise eligible to that office.

In marriage they may form a connexion with those only who are of their own communion. The brother who marries a person not of their congregation, is considered as having quitted their church fellowship. There is, however, no objection to a sister's marrying a person of approved piety in another communion; and some, by express licence, are permitted still to join in their church ordinances, as before. A brother may make his own choice of a partner in the society, and both parties may reject the proposals made to them; but as all intercourse between the different sexes is less frequent among them than elsewhere, and few opportunities of forming particular attachments are found, they usually rather refer the choice to their friends and intimates, than decide for themselves. As the lot must be cast to sanction their union, each receives his partner as a divine appointment; and, however strange this method may appear, there are perhaps no where fewer unhappy marriages to be found than among the brethren. In their settlements, at all hours, whether day or night, some persons of both, sexes are appointed by rotation to pray for the society.

Missions. What chiefly characterizes the Moravians, and holds them up to the attention and admiration, and for the example of all others, is their missionary zeal. In this they are superior to every other body of Christians whatever. Their missionaries are all of them volunteers; for it is an inviolable maxim with them to persuade no man to engage in missions. They are all of one mind as to the doctrines they teach, and seldom make an attempt where there are not several of them in the mission. Their zeal is calm, steady, and persevering. They would reform the world, but are careful how they quarrel with it. They carry their point by address, and the insinuations of modesty and mildness which commend them to all men, and give offence to none. The habits of silence, quietness, and decent reserve, mark their character. 'When brethren or sisters find themselves disposed to serve God among the heathen, they communicate their wishes and views to the committee appointed by the synods of the brethren to superintend the missions, in a confidential letter. If, on particular inquiry into their circumstances and connexions, no objection is found, they are considered as candidates. As to mental qualifications, much erudition is not required by the brethren. To be well versed in the sacred Scriptures, and to have an experimental knowledge of the truths they contain, is judged indispensably necessary.

It has been found, by experience, that a good understanding, joined to a friendly disposition, and, above all, a heart filled with the love of God, are the best and the only essential qualifications of a missionary. Nor are, in general, the habits of a student so well calculated to form his body for a laborious life as those of a mechanic. Yet men of learning are not excluded, and their gifts have been made useful in various ways. When vacancies occur, or new missions are to be begun, the list of candidates is examined, and those who appear suitable are called upon, and accept or decline the call as they find themselves disposed.'

The number of missionaries, male and female, employed in their missions in various parts of the world, towards the close of the year 1802, was as follows: Danish West India Islands, in six settlements, 32; Greenland, in three settlements, 16; Antigua, in three settlements, 17; St. Kitts, 4; Jamaica, in three settlements, 8; Barbadoes, 2; Tobago, 2; South America, in four settlements, 24; Labrador, three settlements, 25; Indians in North America, three settlements, 19; Hottentots at the Cape of Good Hope, 10; near Tranquebar, in the East Indies, 2; in all 161. The most flourishing missions at present are those in Greenland, Antigua, St. Kitts, the Danish West India Islands, the Cape of Good Hope, among the negroes in South America, and the Esquimaux on the coast of Labrador. The mission in Antigua first began in 1757, and during the ten years preceding 1802, the number baptized in that island by the brethren, was 5424. In August, 1803, the number of negroes belonging to the brethren's church there, was upwards of 10,000; and as great a number belonged to it in the Danish islands, St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. Jan. In St. Kitts their congregation numbers about 2000. The settlement of Bavians-Kloof, at the Cape of Good Hope, begun in 1736, was soon after suspended till 1792; and the society under the five married missionaries there, consists now of about 1000 Hottentots, nearly 600 of whom are baptized. A society for the furtherance of the Gospel among the heathens was instituted by the brethren in London, as early as the year 1741, for the more effectual co-operation with, and assistance of, the said missions' department, in the elders' conference of the unity, in caring for those missionaries who might pass through London to their several posts. The society was, after some interruption in their meetings, renewed in 1766, and took the whole charge of the mission on the coast of Labrador upon themselves, besides continuing to assist the other missions as much as lay in their power, especially those in the British dominions. In Amsterdam, a similar society was established by the brethren in 1746, and revived in 1793, at Zeist, near Utrecht. This society took particular charge of the mission at the Cape of Good Hope; but the subsequent troubles in Holland rendered them unable to lend much assistance during that period. The brethren in North America established a society for propagating the Gospel among the heathens, in the year 1787, which was incorporated by the state of Pennsylvania, and has been very active in assisting the missions among the American Indians. These three societies render all the assistance in their power to support the great and accumulated burthens of the above-mentioned missions' department, and God has blessed their exertions; but they have no power to begin new missions, or to send out missionaries, which, by the synods of the brethren's church, is vested solely in the elders' conference of the unity.

Countries where found.—The Moravians are in considerable numbers in some parts of Germany, Holland, England, Ireland, and America. They have also a small society at Ayr, in Scotland. There is a regular settlement of the brethren at Fulneck, near Leeds, Yorkshire; another at Fairfield, near Manchester; and a small one at Okbrook, near Derby, which excite the curiosity of the traveller. In 1749 an act of parliament was passed in their favour, to relieve them from taking oaths, about which some had conscientious scruples; yet they made declarations 'in the presence of God,' considering God as 'a witness,' which amounts to nearly the same thing. The public has yet felt no inconvenience, but rather benefit, from their existence or toleration in this country, as they are, in general, a sober, industrious, inoffensive, and loyal people.

Their principal settlement in America is Bethlehem, in Pennsylvania, which was begun in 1741. Mr. Weld, in his 'Travels through the United States,' gives an account of the Moravians in that country, honourable to their virtue and piety, and expressive of the good they have done. 'The Moravian missionaries,' he says, 'have wrought a greater change on the minds of the Indians than any others.' After describing this settlement at Bethlehem, he observes, that 'wherever the society has extended itself in America, the most happy consequences have resulted from it; good order and regularity have been conspicuous in the behaviour of the people of the neighbourhood, and arts and manufactures have been introduced into the country.' Crawtz's History of the Unitas Fratrum; Adam's Religious World, vol. iii. pp. 289–312.

MORDECAI, מרדכי, signifies contrition, or, bitter bruising; or, myrrh bruised; or, who teaches to bruise; otherwise, very pure myrrh, according to the Hebrew and Syriac. This name is not Hebrew but Chaldee, composed of Merodach, or Mordak, a deity of the Babylonians.

Mordecai was the son of Jair, of the race of Saul, and a chief of the tribe of Benjamin. He was carried captive to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with Jehoiachin (or Jeconiah) king of Judah, in the year of the world 3405. (Esther ii. 5, 6.) He settled at Shushan, and there lived to the first year of Cyrus, when it is thought he returned to Jerusalem, with several other captives; but he afterwards returned to Shushan. There is great probability that Mordecai was very young when taken into captivity.

Mordecai had a niece called Edessa, or Esther, the daughter of his brother, whom he had adopted and brought up as his own daughter, after the death of his brother. Esther became the spouse of King Ahasuerus. Mordecai was very assiduous at the palace gate to learn news of the queen. During his attendance there he discovered the conspiracy of two eunuchs to kill the king. This service was registered, but not rewarded. The king Ahasuerus raising Haman to be his favourite, Mordecai refused to honour him. Haman resented this indignity by endeavouring to exterminate the whole Jewish people, for which purpose he obtained a decree from the king. Mordecai acquainted Esther with this decree, and urged her to prevail with the king to revoke it. In the mean time, the king, not being able to sleep one night, caused the annals of the preceding years to be read to him. In them was read the conspiracy of the two eunuchs against the king, discovered by Mordecai. The king asked, if this man had been rewarded? Being told he had not, he asked who was in the anti-chamber? He was answered Haman; who was then coming to the king, to solicit that Mordecai might be hanged on a gallows he had provided for him. Ahasuerus asked him, what should be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour? Haman, believing himself whom the king intended by this description, answered, Let him be clothed in a royal habit, be set upon the king's horse, have a royal diadem on his head; and be it proclaimed before him in the public places of the city, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour. The king replied, Haste then, and do thus to Mordecai. Haman, therefore, was obliged to do this.

Esther, having prepared herself by fasting, and prayer, presented herself before the king, in hopes of averting that danger from her people, to which Haman had exposed them. She discovered to him the wicked design of Haman, that Mordecai was her uncle, that she was a Jewess by birth, and that her people were condemned to the slaughter. Ahasuerus moderated his decree against the Jews, condemned Haman to be hanged on the gallows he had set up for Mordecai, gave his goods to the queen, and raised Mordecai to the honours that Haman had enjoyed. Many are of opinion, that Mordecai was author of the book of Esther. See ESTHER.

MOSES, מֹשֶׁה, signifies taken out of the water. Moses, son of Amram and Jochebed, was born in Egypt, in the year of the world 2433. His father and mother were of the tribe of Levi. He had a brother called Aaron, and a sister named Miriam; Aaron was three years older than Moses, and Miriam might be seven or eight years older than Aaron. Some time before the birth of Moses, the king of Egypt decreed that all the male children of the Hebrews should be put to death as soon as born. The parents of Moses could not obey this severe law; they concealed the child in their house three months. But, despairing of hiding him any longer, they resolved on exposing him to the wide world, committing his preservation to Providence. They put him into a kind of little vessel made of rushes, and laid him on the banks of the Nile. His sister Miriam stood to watch at a distance. The daughter of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, happening to come that way, to bathe in the river, perceived the basket; and ordering it to be fetched to her, she opened it.

Miriam, the sister of little Moses, asked her if she would please to have her fetch an Hebrew nurse? She went and brought Jochebed, her own and Moses's mother. The princess named the infant Moses, which in the Egyptian language signifies 'one saved out of the water,' and adopted him as her own son. Whilst Moses was instructed 'in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,' and bred up in the midst of a luxurious court, he acquired at home the knowledge of the promised redemption of Israel. By faith in the redeemer Christ, he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, preferring affliction with the people of God, to the enjoyment of sinful pleasures for a season, and esteeming the reproach of Christ (or persecution for Christ's sake) greater wealth than the treasures of Egypt; for he had respect to the future recompence of reward, (Exod. ii. 1—10. Acts vii. 20—22. Heb. xi. 23—26.) or looked forward to a future state.

When Moses was forty years old, he visited his brethren, and beheld the hardships they suffered from the Egyptian task-masters. (Exod. ii. 11, 12, &c. Acts vii. 23.) Seeing an Egyptian oppressing an Hebrew, he vindicated his cause, slew the Egyptian, and hid his body in the sand. The next day he found two Hebrews at variance, and being willing to reconcile them, he asked the offender, why he struck his brother? He was answered with another question, Who made you a ruler and judge over us? Will you kill me as you did the Egyptian yesterday? Moses, hearing this, was afraid, and wondered how it was discovered. Pharaoh, being informed of it, sought for Moses to put him to death. He fled, however, into the country of Midian, beyond the Red Sea, in Arabia Petræa, towards Mount Sinai; where he sat down near a well. Whilst he was sitting there, the seven daughters of Jethro, priest of Midian, came thither, according to custom, to draw water for their flocks; but shepherds coming with the same intention, drove them away. Moses assisted the damsels, drove off the shepherds, and himself watered Jethro's flocks.

Moses living for some time with Jethro, Jethro gave him his daughter Zipporah in marriage, who bore Moses two sons, Gershom and Eleazar. After this, the king of Egypt died; and the children of Israel, groaning under the weight of oppressions, sent their cries to Heaven, and the Lord heard them.

Moses was employed in feeding the sheep of Jethro his father-in-law; and one day came to the mountain of Horeb, where he observed a bush that burned without being consumed. Moses, astonished at this sight, says within himself, I must go and examine how it is that this bush is not consumed. The Lord seeing him advance, spake to him out of the bush, saying, Moses, approach no nearer, but put off your shoes, for the place on which you stand is holy ground. Then he commissioned him, notwithstanding the reluctance and hesitation of Moses, to deliver his people Israel, foretelling the obstinacy of Pharaoh, the intervention of miracles, &c.

Moses still entreating to be excused, the Lord commanded him to throw his rod on the ground, which was immediately changed into a serpent. God bade him take it up; it became a rod again. Then he bade him put his hand into his bosom, and when he drew it out, it was all over leprous. He bid him put it in again, and it returned to its former health. These two miracles, says he, you shall perform before Israel. If after this they shall not believe you, take water out of the Nile, and pour it on the land; it shall be changed into blood. But Moses not yet entirely acquiescing, the Lord referred him to his brother Aaron as a man of ready utterance.

Moses returning to Jethro, told him he must go and see his brethren in Egypt; he took his wife and children with him, and set forward. But when he was arrived at an inn, the angel of the Lord sought to kill his son, the occasion of which was, as some think, because he was not circumcised. Zipporah, therefore, took a sharp stone, and cutting off the foreskin of her son, cast it at his feet (according to our English translation,) and said, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me. The Hebrew text of Exodus iv. 24, 25, 26, is very obscure. Some paraphrase the words as follows: 'And it came to pass by the way in the inn [when Moses was on his journey to Egypt], that Jehovah met him, and sought [threatened] to kill him [Gershom]. Then Zipporah took a sharp stone, and cut away the foreskin of her son, and caused it to touch his feet, [Jehovah's, who probably appeared in a bodily shape; the Septuagint call him the angel of the Lord,] and said unto him, A spouse by blood art thou unto me. Then he [Jehovah] ceased from him [Gershom]. Then she said, A spouse by blood art thou unto me, because of this circumcision; that is, I who am alien, have entered as fully into covenant with thee, by doing this act, as my son has, on whom this act has been performed. The meaning of the whole passage seems to be this: It would seem that God had ordered Moses to circumcise his sons, but that he had not circumcised one of them, whether Gershom or Eleazar does not appear. As he had neglected to do this, Jehovah was about to slay the child, because not in covenant with him by circumcision; and thus he intended to have punished the disobedience of the father by the natural death of his son. Zipporah, getting acquainted with the nature of the case, and the danger to which her first-born was exposed, took a sharp stone, and cut off the foreskin of her son. By this act the displeasure of the Lord was turned aside, and Zipporah considered herself as now allied to God because of this circumcision. After this, Moses and Zipporah separated from each other; and she returned to her father Jethro, and took her sons with her.

Being returned to Egypt, Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh, and told him that the God of the Hebrews ordered them to go three days' journey into the desert of Arabia, to offer sacrifices to him. Pharaoh refused, and gave orders that the children of Israel should no longer be allowed straw, as before, for making bricks. The people on this made their complaint to Moses, and he to the Lord, who told him, You shall see the plagues which shall smite the Egyptians. Moses and Aaron coming to Pharaoh, with the orders of the Lord, Aaron threw down his rod, which immediately was changed into a serpent. Pharaoh then sent for his magicians, who by enchantments changed also their rods into serpents; but Moses's rod now changed into a serpent, and devoured those of the magicians.

After this, the Lord smote Egypt with ten different sorts of plagues. According to Archbishop Usher, these ten plagues took place in the course of one month, and in the following order; 1. the plague of blood, Moses changing the waters of the Nile into blood, on the 18th day of the sixth month, afterwards called Adar; 2. the plague of frogs, about the twenty-fifth of the sixth month; 3. the plague of lice, on the twenty-seventh of the sixth month; 4. the plague of flies, on the twenty-ninth of the sixth month; 5. the grievous murrain, on the second day of the seventh month, afterwards called Nisan; 6. the plague of boils and blains, on the third day of the seventh month; 7. the grievous hail, on the fifth day of the seventh month; 8. the plague of locusts, on the eighth day of the seventh month; 9. the thick darkness, on the tenth day of the seventh month; 10. the slaying of the first-born, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month. It is, however, observable, that most of these dates are destitute of proof.

The fourteenth day of Abib, or Nisan, at evening, the Hebrews killed the lamb of the passover, or of the passage of the Lord, and with the blood they sprinkled the two posts and upper parts of their doors; that the destroying angel, passing over their houses, might not enter to kill their first-born. About the middle of the night, the Lord smote all the first-born of the Egyptians, from the first-born of Pharaoh, to the first-born of the meanest of his slaves; and there was a great outcry throughout Egypt. Pharaoh sent in haste to call Moses and Aaron, and bade them go quickly and sacrifice to their God, with their wives, children, cattle, and all that they had; and when they went, to pray for him also. The Egyptians also urged them to be gone.

Moses took with him the bones of the patriarch Joseph, who had laid this injunction on the Israelites before his death. (Exod. xiii. 10. Gen. l. 25.) The Hebrews, departing from Rameses, came first to Succoth, and thence to Etham. From Etham they turned towards Pi-hahiroth, which is between the sea and Migdol, over against Baal-zephon. No sooner were they arrived there, than Pharaoh advanced with a powerful army, thinking to force them back into Egypt. But the Lord put between the camp of Israel and that of the Egyptians a miraculous cloud, which was luminous on the side towards the Israelites, and dark towards the Egyptians. The Egyptians, perceiving that the Hebrews had fled through the separated waters of the Red Sea, pursued them; but the Lord, by a wind, brought back the waters, so that the whole army of the Egyptians was drowned. Then Moses and the Israelites sang a song of thanksgiving to the Lord. Hence, they went on toward Sinai. At Marah they found water, but very bitter. Moses crying to the Lord, he showed him a certain kind of wood, which, being thrown into the water, took away the bitterness, and made it potable.

On the fifteenth day of the second month, after they came out of Egypt, the Hebrews came into the wilderness of Sin or Zin, between Elim and Sinai. Here the multitude, tired with the length of their journey, began to murmur against Moses, saying, Would to God we had died in Egypt, where we sat at the flesh-pots; and where we ate bread in abundance! The Lord spake to Moses, and promised to rain food from heaven. Of this Moses informed the people. That very evening the camp of Israel was covered with quails, brought thither by the wind; and the next morning they saw all around the camp a kind of hoar-frost, like little grains, of the colour of bdellium, and of the shape of coriander-seeds: this was the manna. See MANNA. Moses commanded Aaron to fill an ear with manna, and lay it before the Lord, to remain as a monument to future generations.

From the desert of Sin, the Hebrews proceeded to Alush, and to Rephidim, where the people, in want of water, murmured against Moses. But the Lord, by the ministry of Moses, drew them water out of the rock of Horeb. At this time the Amalekites attacking Israel, Moses sent Joshua against them; he himself, at the same time, with Aaron and Hur, was upon an eminence, whence he could see the engagement. While Moses held up his hands toward heaven, Joshua had the advantage over the enemy; but no sooner did he hold them down when weary, than the Amalekites prevailed. Wherefore Aaron and Hur put stones under him, that he might sit down, while each of them supported his arms, that he might not be tired. So the Amalekites were entirely defeated. The Lord said to Moses, Write an account of this action in a book, and instruct Joshua in it; for I will utterly destroy the memory of Amalek from under heaven.

The third day of the third month from their coming out of Egypt, they arrived at the foot of Mount Sinai, where they continued one whole year. God had told Moses, that here they should offer sacrifices to him after they came forth out of Egypt; and here Moses was the mediator of a covenant between God and this people. See DECALOGUE.

Then coming down from the mountain, Moses declared to the people the laws he had received, and the articles of the covenant the Lord would make with them. The people answered, that they would perform whatever the Lord should enjoin them. Moses erected an altar of unhewn stone at the foot of the mountain, and twelve monuments, or twelve other altars, in the name of the twelve tribes of Israel. He offered sacrifices and peace-offerings; and, taking the blood of the victims, he poured half upon the altar, and the other half into cups; and having read to the people the ordinances which he had received from the Lord, and which he had written in a book, he sprinkled all the people with the blood that was in the cups. Thus was concluded this solemn and celebrated covenant between the Lord and the children of Israel.

Then the Lord ordered Moses to come up again into the mountain, and bring with him Joshua his servant, that he might instruct him in all the particulars of those laws and regulations, which he would have observed by the priests and people, in the public exercise of religion ; all the parts of which he distinctly appointed him. After this, God informed him that the people whom he had brought out of Egypt had soon forgotten all their promises and engagements ; for at that very time they had made a molten image, and were worshipping a golden calf. He added, that he had an intention utterly to exterminate this headstrong and untractable people, and would make Moses the father and chief of a great nation. Moses, however, interceded for the people.

Descending from the mount, Joshua heard the shouts and rejoicings of the people. He said to Moses, that he heard a noise in the camp, as if of an engagement with an enemy. But Moses told him, that it was not the sound of an alarm, but cries of joy. When they approached the camp, they saw the golden calf, and the people singing and dancing about it : Moses, through indignation, threw down the tables of stone he held in his hands, and broke them. Taking the calf they had made, he reduced it to powder, and scattered the powder into the water, and so made all the congregation drink of it. See CALF. Moses severely rebuked Aaron : Aaron excused himself as well as he could : and Moses, standing at the entrance of the camp, proclaimed, Whoever is for the Lord, let him join himself to me. All the children of Levi assembling about him, he said, Thus saith the Lord, let every one of you take his sword, and let him go from gate to gate across the camp, and slay even to his brother, his friend, or his kinsman. That day there were slain about three thousand people.

The next day Moses remonstrated with the people on the heinousness of their sin, and told them he would go up again to the mountain, and endeavour to obtain forgiveness for them. He went up, and entreated the Lord to pardon them ; or, otherwise, he begged that he himself might be blotted out of the book of the Lord. The Lord answered, that only he who offended should be blotted out of his book ; but that he would chastise the criminals in the day of his vengeance : and that as to himself, he would not go along with them, but would send his angel before them.—Farther, to show the displeasure of the Lord, Moses carried the tabernacle out of the camp, where the Lord had been used to give his orders. But Moses not desisting to pray the Lord to continue his conduct of his people to the Land of Promise, he at length promised not to forsake them. Moses desired another favour from the Lord, which was, that he might see his glory. The Lord answered him, that he could not see his face, for no man could support that sight ; but that he would pass before the opening of the rock, where Moses might hear his name, and see his hinder parts (train) as he passed along.

Afterwards, Moses went up into the mountain, and carried new tables of stone. There God gave him the Decalogue anew, and several other commandments : after forty days and forty nights he came down, bringing the two tables of testimony with him. He was not aware that his face emitted rays of light, which remained upon it after his communication with the Lord : so that Moses, while he spake to Aaron and Israel, put a veil over his face.

Then he caused proclamation to be made, that whoever had any valuable metals, or precious stones, thread, wool, furs, or fine wood fit for the tabernacle, might offer them to the Lord. The Israelites, inflamed by a holy zeal, brought with great alacrity more than was necessary.

The Lord commanded also, that each Israelite should contribute half a shekel, about thirteen pence half-penny of our money. That this contribution might be regularly raised, he took an account of the people, from twenty years old and upwards ; and there were found 603,550, each of whom paying a bekah or half shekel, the sum amounted to 100 talents of silver, about 34,219*l.*, and 1775 shekels, about 202*l.* 9*s.* Six whole months they worked at the tabernacle, that is, from the sixth month of the holy year, after their coming out of Egypt, in the year of the world 2513, to the first day of the first month of the following year, 2514. On the first day of Nisan, April 21, according to Usher, the tabernacle of the covenant was set up, and filled with the glory of the Lord. The fourteenth of Nisan the Israelites celebrated the second passover from their coming out of Egypt ; and about this time Moses published the laws contained in the first seven chapters of Leviticus ; he consecrated Aaron and his sons, and dedicated the tabernacle, and all its vessels.

The first day of the second month of this year, Moses took a second account of the people, in which the Levites were reckoned apart, and appointed to the service of the tabernacle. Moses regulated their functions, and the offices of each, and the order of every tribe in their marches and encampments, to prevent confusion. The princes of the tribes made their offerings to the tabernacle, each according to his rank, and upon his day, during the twelve days of the dedication and consecration of this holy place. Lastly, about this time Moses made several ordinances, relating to the purity to be observed in holy things, the uncleannesses to be avoided, and the manner of approaching the tabernacle.

About the end of the year, Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, brought him his wife Zipporah, and his two sons, Gershom and Eleazer. Moses received him with all respect, and by his persuasion commissioned judges to assist in accommodating differences, and causes of lesser consequence. Soon after, the pillar of clouds rising, the Israelites decamped from Sinai, to go towards Paran. On account of the arrival of Zipporah in the camp, Aaron, and Miriam his sister, spoke against Moses, because his wife was an Ethiopian: the particulars of this dispute we do not know; but the Scripture tells us, that the Lord interposed in behalf of Moses, who was the meekest man on earth. See AARON and MIRIAM.

It is not easy to determine whether the sedition of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, happened after the arrival of the Hebrews at Kadesh-barnea, or before; but the general opinion is, that it took place after their arrival there. Korah was of the tribe of Levi, as well as Moses and Aaron; Dathan, Abiram, and On, were of Reuben. Being disgusted at Moses and Aaron, they raised a mutiny against them, supported by two hundred and fifty others of the chief of the people. They said, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy every one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord? Moses fell upon his face, and told them, Let every one of you take his censer, and present himself to-morrow before the Lord; and the Lord will then cause it to be known whom he hath chosen. Moses in the mean time having sent for Dathan and Abiram, they informed him they would not come to him. Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? We will not come up. The day following, Moses having assembled all the people at the door of the tabernacle, the glory of the Lord appeared; and in the issue the revolvers were swallowed up by the earth. Yet the very next day the people began again to murmur against Moses and Aaron on the same occasion, saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord. The Lord caused a sudden fire or plague to go forth in the camp; but Aaron with his censer, placing himself between the living and the dead, offered his incense, and intreated the Lord; upon which the plague ceased.

From the encampment called the Graves of Lust, the people went to Hazeroth, and thence to Kadesh-barnea, where they continued for some time. Thence Moses sent twelve chosen men to take a view of the land of Canaan. These men were forty days on their search, and at their return they brought back some of the fruits of the country, of an extraordinary size and fairness. They very much commended the land for its beauty and fertility; but they added, that the inhabitants were of gigantic stature, and had many strong and populous cities, so that there were but little hopes that this country could be conquered by them. This report put all the camp into a mutiny. Nothing would satisfy them, but they would return into Egypt. Then the Lord in his anger threatened to destroy all the people; but Moses interposed by his prayers. However, sentence was passed against these murmurers, that all from the age of twenty years and upwards should die in the desert. The ten spies were punished by a sudden death. Only Joshua and Caleb were preserved; and God declared that they alone of the whole multitude should enter into the Land of Promise.

Being come to Kadesh, Miriam, the sister of Moses, died there. In this encampment the people murmured for want of water, with which Moses and Aaron supplied them, by causing it to gush out of a rock. But as they showed some distrust in the Lord, he condemned them to die in the wilderness, without entering the Land of Promise. This made them give this encampment the name of Meribah, or the waters of strife.

They went then to Mount Hor, where Aaron died. From hence they went to Zalmonah, where it is thought Moses erected the brazen serpent, to heal those who had been bitten by the fiery serpents in the camp. (Numb. xxi. 6.) Being come to Mount Pisgah in the desert of Kedemoth, they dispatched ambassadors to Sihon, king of the Amorites, to demand a passage through his country; which being refused, Moses gave him battle, overcame him, and took all his territories. Some time after, Og, king of Bashan, marched against Moses, and fought with him; but Moses conquered him, and made himself master of his country.

After this, Moses encamped in the plains of Moab, at Shittim, where the Israelites continued till they passed over Jordan, under Joshua. While they abode in this encampment, Balak, king of Moab, invited Balaam to come and curse Israel. But Balaam having rather blessed than cursed them, he sent the daughters of Moab into the camp, to tempt the Israelites to idolatry and fornication. This wicked counsel had the desired effect; but Moses put to death all those who had given themselves to the worship of Baal-peor, to the amount of 23,000, besides a thousand others executed by the judges.

After this the Lord commanded Moses to make war against the Midianites, who had sent their daughters along with those of Moab, to debauch Israel. Phinehas was appointed captain of this expedition, for which Moses gave him twelve thousand chosen men. He routed the Midianites.

The tribes of Reuben, Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, having asked of Moses for their inheritance the country they had conquered from the Amorites, Moses consented, on condition that they would go along with their brethren over Jordan, to assist them in the conquest of the country possessed by the Canaanites.

The first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the coming out of Egypt, Moses being in the fields of Moab, and knowing that he was not to pass over Jordan, and that his last hour was not far off, made a long discourse to the people, and recapitulated all he had done, and all that had happened from the coming out of Egypt. He set before them the happiness that would attend their constancy and fidelity, and the calamities which would punish their prevarication. He put into the hands of the priests and elders a copy of the law, with an injunction to have it read solemnly every seventh year in a general assembly of the nation. He composed an excellent canticle or poem, in which he exclaims against their future infidelities, and threatens them with all the evils that in after ages came upon them. Lastly, a little before his death, he gave to each of the tribes a particular blessing, in which he mingles several prophecies and predictions.

The Lord commanded Moses at the beginning of the twelfth month to ascend Mount Nebo, where he gave him a view of the country both on this side and beyond Jordan; saying to him, 'This is the land which I swear unto Abraham, and unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed: I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither. So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day. And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days.' It is added, 'There arose not a prophet since like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, and in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel.'

The Scripture is full of the praises of this great man. Jesus, son of Sirach, author of Ecclesiasticus, applauds him. (Ecclus. xlv. 1, 2, 3.)

Moses is the most ancient writer, of whom there remains any authentic works. He has left us the Pentateuch, or the five books of the Old Testament, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Probably these books were not originally separate works, as we find them now. Moses composed only one single work, of which the law was, as it were, the body, and Genesis was the preface. Afterwards, they were divided for convenience in reading. These books are acknowledged as authentic and inspired, by general consent both of Jews and Christians. Some difficulties have been started about the author of these books, because some passages have been observed in them that seem not to agree to Moses. Indeed it must be owned that some small additions have been made. These additions, however, make no alterations in the sense, but are by way of illustration only. Besides the Pentateuch, the Jews ascribe to Moses eleven Psalms, from Psalm xc. to c.; but there is no sufficient proof that these Psalms had Moses for their author. The title of the ninetieth Psalm, A prayer of Moses the man of God, which they pretend must be applied also to the ten following Psalms, is not sufficient. The greater part of the titles of the Psalms are not original, nor indeed very ancient; and some of them are wrong placed. Besides, in these Psalms we find the names of persons, and other marks, that by no means can agree with Moses. Some ancients thought that Moses was the author of the book of Job. Origen on Job pretends that he translated it out of Syriac into Hebrew. But this opinion is rejected both by Jews and Christians; and if this book had truly belonged to Moses, would the Jews have separated it from the Pentateuch?

As to the death and burial of Moses, many difficulties have been raised. The Scripture tells us expressly, that Moses died, according to the word of the Lord. (Deut. ult. 5, 6.) But as the Hebrew words literally import upon the mouth of the Lord, the Rabbins have imagined, that the Lord took away his soul by a kiss. Some have maintained that he did not die; and others have pretended that he was transported into heaven.

MOURNING. The Hebrews, at the death of their friends and relations, gave all possible demonstrations of grief and mourning. They wept, tore their clothes, smote their breasts, fasted, and lay upon the ground, went bare-footed, pulled off their hair and beards, or cut them, and made incisions on their breasts, or tore them with their nails. (Levit. xix. 28.; xxi. 5.; Jer. xvi. 6.) The time of mourning was commonly seven days; but this was lengthened or shortened according to circumstances. The Rabbins admit of several degrees in their grief and mourning. For the first three days it was allowed to give up themselves to tears, and to the most sensible grief; which in the seven days following was more moderate. But if the time of mourning was extended to a whole month, it was managed with moderation. The mournings for Saul, Judith, and Herod the Great, continued only seven days. Those for Moses and Aaron were prolonged to thirty days. Josephus says, that a thirty days' mourning ought to be sufficient for any wise man, in the loss of his nearest relation, or his dearest friend.

During the whole time of their mourning, the near relations of the deceased, as of father, mother, husband, brother, sister, or children, continued sitting in their houses, and ate on the ground. The food they took was thought unclean, and even themselves were judged impure. 'Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted,' says Hosea, (ix. 4.) Their faces were covered, and in that time they could not apply themselves to any labour, nor read the book of the law, nor say their usual prayers. They did not dress themselves, nor make their beds, nor uncover their heads, nor shave themselves, nor cut their nails, nor go into the bath, nor salute any one.

MURDER. Murder among the Hebrews was always punished with death, but involuntary homicide only by banishment. Cities of refuge were appointed for involuntary manslaughter, whither the slayer might retire, and continue in safety, till the death of the high-priest. (Numb. xxxv. 28.) Then the offender was at liberty to return to his own house, if he pleased. A murderer was put to death without remission, and the kinsman of the murdered person might kill him with impunity. Money could not redeem his life; he was dragged away from the altar, if he had there taken refuge.

When a dead body was found in the fields of a person slain by a murderer unknown, Moses commanded that the elders and judges of the neighbouring places should resort to the spot. (Deut. xxi. 1—8.) The elders of the city nearest to it were to take an heifer, which had never yet bore the yoke, and were to lead it into some rude and uncultivated place, which had not been ploughed or sowed, where they were to cut its throat. The priests of the Lord, with the elders and magistrates of the city, were to come near the dead body, and, washing their hands over the heifer that had been slain, were to say: 'Our hands have not shed this blood, nor have our eyes seen it shed. Lord, be favourable to thy people Israel, and impute not to us this blood, which has been shed in the midst of our country.' This ceremony may inform us, what idea they had of the heinousness of murder, and how much horror they conceived at this crime; their fear that God might avenge it on the whole country; and the pollution that the country was supposed to contract, by the blood spilt in it, unless it were expiated, or avenged on him who had occasioned it, if he could be discovered.

Sir John Shore mentions a custom among the Brahmins of India, of sitting at a person's door, with some implement of suicide in their hands, and threatening to destroy themselves, unless something which they demanded should be granted to them. This, when their demand is not excessive, is usually complied with, through fear of their self-murder, and of their embittered spirits afterwards haunting and pursuing to death the person who should refuse the demand. Of this we seem to have an instance in the Old Testament: the king of Moab made a desperate attempt, and risked his own person, to attack the king of Edom, then united with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah; but failing in his attempt, 'he took his eldest son that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering [ascension-offering] upon the wall. And there was a great indignation against Israel: and they departed from him, and returned to their own land.' (2 Kings iii. 27.) It is probable, that the anger against Israel arose not only from Moab, thus deprived of her prince, but also from Edom, who sympathized with the distressed king, respected this custom, and was indignant that Israel should consider it as impious and superstitious. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. clvi. pp. 144, 145.

MUSIC. The ancient Hebrews had a strong inclination to music and musical instruments. They used it in their religious services, in their public and private rejoicings, at their feasts, and even in their mournings. We have in Scripture songs or canticles of joy, of thanksgiving, of praise, of mourning; epithalamiums, or songs composed on occasion of marriages.

Music is very ancient. Moses says of Jubal, who lived before the Deluge, that he was the father of those who played on the kinnor and the hugab. (Gen. iv. 21.) Now kinnor manifestly signifies the harp, and hugab the ancient organ, that is, a kind of flute composed of several pipes of different sizes, joined together. Laban complains that his son-in-law Jacob had left him, without bidding him farewell, and without giving him an opportunity of sending him away with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp. Moses having passed over the Red Sea, composed a song, and sang it with the Israelite men, while Miriam, his sister, sang it with dancing, and playing on instruments, at the head of the women. This legislator caused silver trumpets to be made to be sounded upon solemn sacrifices, and on religious festivals. David, who had a great taste for music, seeing that the Levites were numerous, and not employed, as formerly, in carrying the boards, veils, and vessels of the tabernacle, its abode being fixed at Jerusalem, appointed a great part of them to sing and play on instruments in the temple.

Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, were chiefs of the music of the tabernacle, under David, and of the temple, under Solomon. Asaph had four sons, Jeduthun six, and Heman fourteen. These twenty-four Levites, sons of the three great masters of the temple music, were at the head of twenty-four bands of musicians, which served in the temple by turns. Their number there was always great, but especially at the great solemnities. They were ranged in order about the altar of burnt sacrifices. Those of the family of Kohath were in the middle, those of Merari at the left, and those of Gershon at the right hand. As the whole business of their lives was to learn and practise music, it must be supposed that they understood it well; whether it were vocal or instrumental music. The Lord had abundantly provided for their maintenance, and nothing could hinder them from being perfect in their art.

The kings also had their particular music. Asaph was chief master of music to king David. Barzillai said to David, Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women? Even in the temple, and in the ceremonies of religion, female musicians were admitted as well as male, who generally were the daughters of the Levites. Heman had fourteen sons and three daughters, who understood music. The ninth Psalm is addressed to Benaiah, chief of the band of young women who sang in the temple. Ezra, in his enumeration of those whom he brought back with him from the captivity, reckons up two hundred singing men and singing women. The Chaldee paraphrast on chap. ii. 8. of Ecclesiastes, where Solomon says that he gat singing men and singing women, understands it of singing women of the temple. In 1 Chron. xv. 20. it is said, in the Hebrew, that Zechariah, Aziel, and Shemiramoth, presided over the seventh band of music, which was that of the young women.

Dr. Burney remarks, that 'neither the ancient Jews, nor the modern, have ever had characters peculiar to music; neither the Egyptians nor Phœnicians, nor the Persians, nor Chinese, so that the melodies used in their religious ceremonies have at all times been traditional, and at the mercy of the singers. The Canonico Cavalca is, however, of opinion, that the points of the Hebrew language were at first musical characters; and this conjecture has been confirmed to me by a learned Jew, whom I have consulted on that subject, who says, that the points still serve two purposes; in reading the prophets they merely mark accentuation, in singing them they regulate the melody, not only as to long and short, but high and low notes.' This is a common opinion among the Jews, and is perhaps not entirely without foundation. Burney's History of Music, vol. i. p. 251. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. ccxxxiii. p. 132.

MYSTERY. This word is derived from the Greek mysterion, which in that language properly signifies a secret. Some think it to refer to the old English term maisteries, masteries, as the maisterie of the Merchant Tailors, of the Cordonniers [Cordwainers] and of other arts and trades. The term is still used in the city of London. 'The art and mystery of,' occurs in the indentures of apprenticeship, as used in most branches of business; and it means, that which may be a difficulty, or even an impossibility, to be understood, by a novice, by a person only beginning to consider the subject, but which is perfectly easy, and intelligible to a master of the business, whose practice and understanding have been long cultivated by use in it.

Or, mystery, as before observed, may be defined a secret. A secret will always remain so to a person who uses no endeavours to discover it. Oftentimes we say, such a person holds such a mode of accomplishing such a business a secret. Imagine one who wishes to know this secret; he labours, strives, &c. but, unless he proceed in the right mode, the process desired continues still a secret. Suppose the possessor of this secret shows him the process, teaches him, gives him information, &c., then this secret [mystery] is no longer mysterious to him; but he enjoys the discovery, and profits accordingly: whilst another person, not so favoured, is as much in the dark respecting this secret, as he ever was.

Secrets may be considered as of various kinds: some are known to a few, but are unknown to the many; some are kept closely a long time, but are revealed in proper season; some are kept entirely, totally, and never are revealed; some are of a nature not to be investigated by us; and some so far surpass our powers, that, however familiar their effects may be to our observation, their principles, acting causes, progresses, and distributions, exceedingly perplex our understandings, and reduce us to the necessity of inference, supposition, and conjecture. This illustration of the word mystery may not be despised because of its familiarity; as it is probably not far from a Scriptural acceptance of the term. Thus, 'Great is the mystery,' secret,

'of godliness,' (1 Tim. iii. 16.); that is, a thing not to be comprehended at first sight, nor till after many reflections and considerations. 'I would not have you ignorant of this mystery,' secret, 'that blindness in part has happened to Israel.' (Rom. xi. 25.) It would be strange, indeed, if mystery denoted something utterly incomprehensible and inexplicable, that the apostle should wish them not to be ignorant of it! that he should instantly open to them what this mystery is! To the Jews, indeed, it was still a secret; and they did not believe the fact that they laboured under any blindness at all: but to the apostle, and to his fellow Christians, the mystery was clear, and was well understood by them.—'Behold I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep,' (1 Cor. xv. 51.); that is, behold I tell you a secret, we shall not all sleep; for the apostle could not intend to show a thing utterly incomprehensible.—The apostle (1 Cor. xiii. 2.) speaks of a man's understanding all mysteries, that is, they were easy to him, though not to others; and (1 Cor. xiv. 2.) he alludes to a man, who, discoursing in a language foreign to his auditors, may in the spirit speak mysteries: he may tell all manner of secrets, in a foreign language, but whilst he himself understands perfectly well his own meaning, and what he says, his subjects of discourse will continue secrets to those who are ignorant of the language he uses.—The apostle says, 'We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery,' (1 Cor. ii. 7.) that is, the wisdom hitherto kept secret: but now the secret is explained, is opened, is let out; not, indeed, to the princes of the world, to whom it is as much a secret as ever; but God by his Spirit hath given us information respecting it, and by that we know and understand it.—'Stewards of the mysteries of God,' (1 Cor. iv. 1.) are persons entrusted with some of the secrets of God, for the benefit of his church.—Thus, the calling of the Gentiles separately from the Jews was a mystery, a secret, which no Jew would have thought of, or have believed, had not God opened, and explained, and enforced it, by his Spirit, &c. (Eph. iii. 3. 6.)

Mystery signifies also an allegory, that is, a mode of information under which there is a partial instruction given, a partial discovery made; but there is still a cover of some kind; which preserves something of secrecy: but this, the person who desires to know the secret thoroughly, must endeavour to remove. So the mystery of the seven stars, (Rev. i. 20.) is an allegory representing the seven Asiatic churches under the figure or symbol of seven burning lamps. So the mystery, Babylon the Great, is an allegorical representation of a spiritual Babylon, spiritual idolatry, spiritual fornication, &c.; and to this agrees the expression afterwards, 'I will tell thee the mystery of the woman,' that is, I will explain to thee the allegory of this figure. (Rev. xvii. 5. 7.) It would seem that, originally, the fathers understood the word in this sense. Thus the mystery of the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood, is the figurative representation of the Lord's body. But the mysteries among the heathens in time perverted this, and the true idea of the word mystery, into sentiments not merely unscriptural, but unwarrantable and unwise.

Yet, it is not to be denied, that there are mysteries, in the highest sense of the word, in Nature, Providence, and Grace. The union of the human soul and body is a profound secret; the origin of life is a profound secret; the cause, manner, &c. of thought is a deep secret. So are many dispensations of Providence: why goodness should suffer, and evil prosper, is a secret; and, why one is called, and another left, is a secret of secrets, a mystery of Grace!

If the ways and works of God are mysteries, we may justly expect to find his attributes, his essence, his perfections, his nature, are mysteries to us! Could we suppose that God was inclined to instruct us in this, it would be (as we are constituted, at present) teaching us a maisterie, which we have no faculties capable of learning; it would be speaking to us in a language of which we should never be able to comprehend a word; it would be overwhelming us with too mighty, too extensive, too profound, too exalted discoveries for us to receive, or conceive; unless we were previously endued with the attributes and qualities of the divine nature; with immensity, infinity, ubiquity, omniscience, eternity, and, in short, with Deity. Since no one denies the existence of God, because he cannot comprehend his nature and essence, which is a mystery; so no one ought to deny exertions of his power, goodness, wisdom, &c. because they imply the exercise of what is secret to mankind in general. This principle, which is undeniable in nature, ought to be equally undeniable in religion. In short, what relates to God may, rather must, always have something of mystery in it. Even the most direct and profound intercourse between the human powers, and their ineffable Creator, prayer and praise, may be secrets, that is, mysterious services, but not therefore less devout, or less acceptable. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

MYSTICS, who have also been sometimes called Quietists, are those who profess a pure and sublime devotion, accompanied with a disinterested love of God, free from all selfish considerations; and who believe that the Scriptures have a mystic and hidden sense, which must be sought after, in order to understand their true import. Under this name some comprehend all those who profess to know how they are inwardly taught of God.

The authors of Mysticism, which sprang up so early as the second century, or, at latest, towards the close of the third, are not known; but the principles from which it was formed may readily be ascertained. Its first promoters proceeded upon the known doctrine of the Platonic School, which was also adopted by Origen and his disciples, that 'the divine nature was diffused through all human souls;' or 'that the faculty of reason, from which proceed the health and vigour of the mind, was an emanation from God into the human soul, and comprehended in it the principles and elements of all truth, human and divine.' They denied that men could, by labour or study, excite this celestial flame in their breasts; and, therefore, they disapproved highly of the attempts of those who, by definitions, abstract theorems, and profound speculations, endeavoured to form distinct notions of truth, and discover its hidden nature. On the contrary, they maintained that silence, tranquillity, repose, and solitude, accompanied with such acts as might tend to attenuate and exhaust the body, were the means by which the hidden and internal word was excited to produce its latent virtues, and to instruct men in the knowledge of divine things. They reasoned as follows:—Those 'who behold, with a noble contempt, all human affairs, who turn away their eyes from terrestrial vanities, and shut all the avenues of the outward senses against the contagious influences of a material world, must necessarily return to God, when the spirit is thus disengaged from the impediments that prevented that happy union. And, in this blessed frame, they not only enjoy inexpressible raptures from that communion with the Supreme Being, but also are invested with the inestimable privilege of contemplating truth undisguised and uncorrupted in its native purity, while others behold it in a vitiated and delusive form.'

The number of the Mystics increased in the fourth century, under the influence of the Grecian fanatic who gave himself out for Dionysius the Areopagite, disciple of St. Paul, and who probably lived about this period; and, by pretending to higher degrees of perfection than other Christians, and practising great austerities, their cause gained ground, especially in the eastern provinces, in the fifth century. A copy of the pretended works of Dionysius was sent by Balbus to Lewis the Meek, in the year 824, which kindled the holy flame of Mysticism in the western provinces, and filled the Latins with the most enthusiastic admiration of this new religion. In the twelfth century, these Mystics took the lead in their method of expounding the Scriptures. In the thirteenth, they were the most formidable antagonists of the Schoolmen; and, towards the close of the fourteenth, many of them resided and propagated their tenets in almost every part of Europe. They had, in the fifteenth century, many persons of distinguished merit in their number; in the sixteenth, previously to the Reformation, if any sparks of real piety subsisted under the despotic empire of superstition, they were chiefly to be found among the Mystics; and in the seventeenth, the radical principle of Mysticism was adopted by the Boehmists, Bourignonists, and Quietists.

The Mystics propose a disinterestedness of love, without other motives, and profess to feel, in the enjoyment of the temper itself, an abundant reward; and passive contemplation is the state of perfection to which they aspire. They lay little or no stress upon the outward ceremonies and ordinances of religion, but dwell chiefly upon the inward operations of the mind. It is not uncommon for them to allegorize certain passages of Scripture: at the same time, they do not deny the literal sense, as having an allusion to the inward experience of believers. Thus 'according to them, the word Jerusalem, which is the name of the capital of Judea, signifies, allegorically, the church militant, morally, a believer, and mysteriously, heaven.' That sublime passage also in Genesis, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' which is according to the letter, corporeal light, signifies, allegorically, the Messiah, morally, grace, and mysteriously, beatitude, or the light of glory.

All this appears to be harmless; yet we must be careful not to give way to the sallies of a lively imagination in interpreting Scripture. Woolston is said to have been led to reject the Old Testament, by spiritualizing and allegorizing the New.

The Mystics are not confined to any particular denomination of Christians, but may be found in most countries, and among many descriptions of religionists; especially among the adherents to the Church of Rome, the Quakers, the Moravians, the Methodists, the Swedenborgians, &c. &c. Among the number of Mystics may be ranked many singular characters, especially Behmen, originally a shoemaker at Gorlitz, in Germany; Molinos, a Spanish priest, in the seventeenth century; Madame Guyon, a French lady, who made a great noise in the religious world; and the celebrated Madame Bourignon, who wrote a work, entitled, 'The Light of the World,' which is full of Mystic extravagances. Fenelon also, the learned and amiable archbishop of Cambray, favoured the same sentiments, for which he was reprimanded by the Pope. His work, entitled 'An Explication of the Maxims of the Saints,' which abounded with Mystical sentiments, was condemned; and to the Pope's sentence against him the good archbishop quietly submitted, and even read it publicly himself in the cathedral of Cambray. In this whole affair, his chief opponent is said to have been the famous Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux. Mr. William Law, author of the 'Serious Call,' &c., and the very able opponent of Bishop Hoadly, degenerated, in the latter part of his life, into all the singularities of Mysticism; and some suppose, that his extravagant notions were one means of driving the celebrated Gibbon into a state of infidelity. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 423—428.

NA'AMAN, נעמן, signifies beautiful; otherwise, who prepares himself to motion. Naaman, general of the army of Benhadad, king of Syria, was in great credit with the king his master, because by his means the Lord had saved Syria; but he was a leper. Naaman had in his house a young Israelitish girl, a captive, who said, there was a prophet in Israel, that could cure any disorder. Naaman having heard these words went immediately to Benhadad, and desired leave to go to Samaria, to the prophet Elisha. The king wrote to the king of Israel, that he should cure Naaman; and the king of Israel exclaimed in astonishment, 'Am I God, to kill and to make alive?' (2 Kings v. 1, 2, &c.) But Elisha sent word to Jehoram, 'Let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel.' Naaman came, therefore, with his chariot and horses, and stopped at the door of Elisha's house, whether out of respect to him, or, that having the leprosy, he was impure. Elisha sent to tell him to wash himself seven times in Jordan. Naaman being very angry at this mode of cure, and at the prophet's apparent stiffness, was turning away in great wrath, when his servants said to him, 'If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? How much rather, then, when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean?' Naaman was persuaded, went to Jordan, washed seven times, and was perfectly cured.

He came back again to the man of God, and told him, 'Now I know that there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel; now, therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant.' But Elisha would receive no present. Naaman, seeing that he could not prevail with him, said, I beseech thee, then, to permit me to carry home with me two mules' lading of the earth of this country; for henceforward I shall offer sacrifice to no God, but the God of Israel. Elisha readily permitted him, seeing his regard for the Lord, which made him think that he could not offer any sacrifices agreeable to God, but upon earth that was holy, and taken out of the land of Israel. The prevailing opinion is, that Naaman intended to erect an altar of this earth, or that he intended to spread this earth for a floor, on which to pray, as if he was always in the holy country, whence he had brought it. Some, however, think, that this earth was intended for the purpose of ablution; as if Naaman had said, 'I cannot carry away with me sufficient water from this holy stream of Jordan, to supply the quantity necessary for sacred cleanliness; but earth, or sand, may be used repeatedly for ceremonial purifications, and is not soiled so readily as water.' We are told, that if the Arab Algerines cannot procure water, they must wipe themselves as clean as they can till water may conveniently be had; or else it suffices to smooth their hands over a stone, twice or thrice, and rub them one with the other, as if they were washing with water.

Naaman, speaking to Elisha, added, 'In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon, to worship there, and he leaneth upon my hand, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. And he said unto him, Go in peace.' This passage has given rise to many scruples. The greater part of commentators think, that Naaman only asks leave from Elisha to continue those external services to his master Benhadad, which he had been used to render him when he entered the temple of Rimmon, but not to adore Rimmon; and that Elisha suffered him to accompany the king his master into the temple of this idol, provided that he paid it no worship. Others, in great numbers, translate the Hebrew by the time past; 'In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master went into the house of Rimmon, to worship there, and he leaned on my hand, and I bowed myself in the house of Rimmon; when I bowed down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. And he said unto him, Go in peace.' Naaman mentions only this past sin, and asks pardon for it, because idolatry, in some measure, includes all other crimes; and he chiefly insists on this, in his declaration to the prophet, that henceforward he would worship only the God of Israel.

Naaman was returning into his own country, very joyful, but had scarcely gone fifty yards when Gehazi, displeased that Elisha his master took nothing from Naaman, runs after him to ask for something; and, in the name of his master, by a lie, begged a talent and two changes of raiment. The talent (of silver) is worth of our money about 342*l*. Naaman answered him, 'Take two talents,' and constrained him to receive them, and also sent two of his servants to carry them for him. The leprosy of Naaman was inflicted as a punishment on Gehazi. The Scripture after this makes no mention of Naaman. See GEHAZI.—Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. pp. 420, 421. Fragments annexed to Calmel's Dictionary of the Bible, No. ciii. p. 5.

NA'BAL, נבל, signifies fool, or senseless. Nabal was a very rich, but very churlish man, of little understanding, of the tribe of Judah, and the race of Caleb. His ordinary dwelling was probably at Maon, one of the most southern cities of Judah, and he had a great number of flocks upon Mount Carmel, not far from Maon. This Carmel is very different from the Mount Carmel on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, between Dora and Ptolemais. While David, fearing Saul, was obliged to hide in the wilderness of Paran, and near to Carmel, he always took care that none of his followers should injure Nabal, but rather assist his shepherds and herdsmen. Being therefore informed that Nabal was come thither to shear his sheep, he sent ten young men of his company to make his compliments to him, and to ask him civilly for something to refresh himself and followers. But Nabal answered them, Who is David, and who is the son of Jesse? We are pestered every day with servants that run away from their masters. Shall I take the flesh of my sheep, and the provisions I have brought for my own servants, and give them to strangers? The men whom David had sent went back, and acquainted him with Nabal's churlish answer.

Then David, in his anger, caused four hundred of his people to arm themselves, and went with a resolution to put Nabal and all his family to the sword. But in the meantime, one of Nabal's servants, having acquainted his wife Abigail with what had passed, who was a wise and prudent woman, and having justified also David's people, she presently prepared provisions and refreshments, with which she met and appeased David. Abigail then returned to Nabal, and found him in his house, making a feast; as it were for a prince. His heart swelled with joy, and he was quite drunk. Abigail said nothing to him till morning; but after he had slept, she told him of the danger in which he had been. This account had such effect upon him, that he became as immovable as a stone; and his heart was so struck with fear, that he died in ten days. Nabal, in the original, signifies a fool, or madman. (1 Sam. xxv. 25, &c.)

NABA'THEANS, or NA'BATHITES, נבאטאות, signifies that prophesy, that speak, or, bring forth fruit. The Nabatheans, or Nabathites, inhabited Nabathea, which extends from the Euphrates to the Red Sea, and the chief cities of which are Petra, the capital of Arabia Deserta, Medaba, and some others. The Nabatheans are scarcely known in Scripture till the time of the Maccabees. During the wars of the Jews against the Syrians, and whilst almost all other nations about them were against the Hebrews, the Nabatheans alone showed them friendship. (1 Macc. v. 24, 25, &c.)

NA'BOTH, נבט, signifies words, or prophecies, or fruits. Naboth was an Israelite of Jezreel, who lived under Ahab, king of Israel, and had a fine vineyard in Jezreel, near the king's palace. This prince required of him either to sell him his vineyard, in order to make a kitchen-garden of it, or to exchange it for a better. But Naboth declined the offer. Ahab, returning into his house, threw himself on his bed, and refused to eat. Jezebel, his wife, took on herself to procure this vineyard. She wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with the king's seal, and sent them to the elders of Jezreel, directing them to publish a fast, make Naboth sit among the chief of the people, suborn against him two sons of Belial, or two false witnesses, who might depose that Naboth had blasphemed God and the king. Accordingly Naboth was condemned, and stoned for the supposed crime. (1 Kings xxi.)

Jezebel immediately went to the king, and bid him take and enjoy Naboth's vineyard. Ahab instantly departed from Samaria, and came to Jezreel to take possession of Naboth's estate. But the Lord commanded the prophet Elijah to threaten him and Jezebel with the most ignominious deaths, and treatment after death. See AHAB and JEZEBEL.

NA'HASH, נחש, signifies snake, or serpent, or that foretells, or brass. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, attacked Jabesh-Gilead, a month after the election of Saul as king of Israel. The Hebrews of Jabesh, finding themselves not strong enough to resist Nahash, offered to capitulate. Nahash proposed to pull out every one's right eye, and to make it a reproach in Israel. The elders of Jabesh desired a truce for seven days. They sent, therefore, to Gibeah, where Saul resided; and their messengers declared their distress. Saul happening to return just at that time out of the field, and seeing the people weep, inquired the reason. They acquainted him with the message they had received from the inhabitants of Jabesh; at which, being moved by the Spirit of God, he cut two of his oxen in pieces, and sent them express throughout Israel, proclaiming that so should the cattle of all those be treated, who did not come presently to follow Saul and Samuel.

The people, struck with consternation, appeared all at the place appointed. Saul sent back the messengers to Jabesh-Gilead, and bid them expect relief on the morrow. As soon as it was evening, Saul took all his army over Jordan; and marching all night, by break of day he attacked the camp of the Ammonites with so much fury, that he entirely routed them. Thus was this war finished at once; and Josephus says that Nahash himself was killed in the battle. (1 Sam. xi.)

NAHASH, king of the Ammonites, and a friend to David, was probably son to the above. We know nothing of the circumstances of his life, nor on what occasion a friendship commenced between him and David. It is likely, however, that this might happen during Saul's persecution of David, when he was forced to abscond on the other side Jordan. Probably, Shobi, son of Nahash, of Rabbah, capital of the Ammonites, is a son of the same Nahash. (2 Sam. xvii. 27.) See HANUN.

NAHASH, father of Abigail and Zeruah, is thought to be the same as Jesse, father of David. (2 Sam. xvii. 25. 1 Chron. ii. 13. 15, 16.) Nahash, or Nachash, signifies a serpent, a crafty fellow. This might perhaps be the surname of Jesse, father of David. Others, however, think that Nahash is the name of Jesse's wife.

NAHUM, נחום, Naomus, signifies comforter, penitent, or their guide. Nahum, the seventh of the twelve minor prophets, is supposed to have been a native of Elcosh or Elcoshah, a village in Galilee, and to have been of the tribe of Simeon. There is great uncertainty respecting the exact period in which he lived; but it is generally allowed, that he delivered his predictions between the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and probably about the year 715 before Christ. They relate solely to the destruction of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes, and are introduced by an animated display of the attributes of God. Archbishop Usher places the destruction of Nineveh in the year of the world 3378, that is, according to Dean Prideaux, in the 29th year of king Josiah, and twenty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem, which time exactly agrees with the account given by Herodotus and other heathen historians.

Of all the minor prophets, says Bishop Lowth, none seem to equal Nahum in sublimity, ardour, and boldness. His prophecy forms an entire and regular poem. The exordium is magnificent and truly august. The preparation for the destruction of Nineveh, and the description of that destruction, are expressed in the most glowing colours; and at the same time the prophet writes with a perspicuity and elegance, which have a just claim to our highest admiration. Lowth's Lectures, vol. ii. p. 99; Tomline's Elem. of Christ. Theology, vol. i. p. 126.

NA'IN, נאין, signifies beauty, or youngful; otherwise, commotion, or their movement. Nain or Naim, was a city of Palestine, where Jesus Christ restored the widow's son to life, as they were carrying him out to be buried. Eusebius says, this city was in the neighbourhood of Endor and Scythopolis. In another place he observes, it was two miles from Tabor, south. The brook Kishon ran between Tabor and Nain.

NA'OMI, נעמי, signifies beautiful, 'agreeable. Naomi was the wife of Elimelech, who retired into the land of Moab, on occasion of a famine in Judea; where Elimelech dying, Naomi settled her two sons in marriage, Mahlon to Ruth, and Chilion to Orpah. These two young men dying also without children, Naomi resolved to return into Judea. Her two daughters-in-law were desirous of returning with her; but she dissuaded them. Orpah remained behind, but Ruth would accompany Naomi to Bethlehem. (Ruth i. 1, 2, 3, &c.) When they came thither, the report was soon spread in the neighbourhood, and the people came to welcome her. She told them that they must no longer call her Naomi, that is fair; but Mara, that is bitterness. 'For the Lord,' says she, 'has heaped trouble upon me. I went away full, but the Lord has brought me back empty and desolate.'

One day as Ruth went out to glean in the fields, she happened to enter that of Boaz, who encouraged her to follow his reapers, and made her eat among his harvesters. At her return home, Naomi informed her, that Boaz was her near kinsman, and she advised the proceedings of Ruth so warily, that she brought it about at last, that Boaz married Ruth. See BOAZ and RUTH.

By this marriage Ruth had a son called Obed; on which the women of Bethlehem congratulated Naomi. The exact time is not known in which this history of Ruth and Naomi happened; but we know that between the time of the marriage of Salmon with Rahab of Jericho, and the birth of David, are three hundred and sixty-six years, which are filled up only with four persons, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse. So that each of these must have lived long.

NAPH'TALI, נַפְתָּלִי, signifies comparison, likeness; otherwise, that struggles, or fights; to twine, wrench. Naphtali was the sixth son of Jacob, by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid. Rachel said, 'With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed.' (Gen. xxx. 8.) We know very few particulars of the life of Naphtali. His sons were Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shilem. (Gen. xlv. 24.) The patriarch Jacob, when he gave his blessing to his son Naphtali, said to him, 'Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words.' (Gen. xlix. 21.) Most of the Rabbins and commentators apply this to Barak, who was of the tribe of Naphtali, and who at first showed the fear of a hind, by refusing to march against the Canaanites, unless the prophetess Deborah would go with him; but he afterwards showed that he imitated the swiftness of a hind in pursuit of the enemy. (Judges iv. 6.) He also signalized his eloquence in that sublime canticle, which he composed with Deborah, to give thanks to God for their victory.

The Septuagint give another rendering of this text: 'Naphtali is a tree that puts forth young branches, the shoots of which are fine.' This sense seems as good at least, as the former. Jacob commends the fertility of Naphtali, and the beauty of his race. Naphtali had only four sons, yet at the Exodus his tribe made up 53,400 men able to bear arms. Moses, in blessing the same tribe, says, (Deut. xxxiii. 23.) 'O Naphtali, satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord, possess thou the west and the south.' The Vulgate reads, 'The sea and the south,' which the Hebrew will admit, and which denotes the sea of Gennesareth, which was south of the inheritance of this tribe. His soil was very fruitful in corn and oil. His limits were extended into Upper and Lower Galilee, having Jordan east, Asher and Zebulun west, Libanus north, and Issachar south.

The tribe of Naphtali encamped in the wilderness on the north side of the tabernacle, between Dan and Manasseh. (Numb. ii. 25, 26, 27, &c.) After the division, by Joshua, of the Land of Promise, the children of Naphtali did not destroy all the Canaanites in their country, but contented themselves with making them tributary. (Judg. i. 33.) The Naphtalites, being on the frontiers to the north, were first invaded, and first made captives by the kings of Assyria. (2 Kings xv. 29.) Isaiah (ix. 1.) foretold to them that they should see the light of the Messiah, and should be first illuminated by the light of the Gospel. Indeed, our Saviour preached oftener and longer in Galilee, and particularly in the tribe of Naphtali, than in any other part of Jordan. (Matt. iv. 13. 15.)

tonishment, stupidity, surprise. St. Paul says, (Rom. xvi. 11.) 'Greet them that be of the household of Narcissus, which are in the Lord.' This passage cannot prove that Narcissus was a Christian, any more than that in the Epistle to the Philippians, (iv. 22.) in which the apostle salutes all those of Cæsar's household, that is, probably those of Nero's family, proves that the emperor was a Christian. Origen pretends that this expression 'the household of Narcissus,' proves that this family was not all Christians. Grotius thinks that Narcissus was a Pagan; but some are of opinion that he was a Christian. As these, however, maintain him to have been Narcissus, the famous freed-man of the emperor Claudius, they must, in the opinion of Calmet, be mistaken, since this Narcissus never was a Christian, and, besides, he had been dead some years before St. Paul wrote this Epistle.

NATHAN, נָתָן, signifies who gives, or is given. Nathan was a famous prophet of the Lord, who lived under king David, and had a great share in the confidence of that prince. His country is unknown, as also the time in which he began to prophesy. The first time the Scripture speaks of him, is on occasion of the design of David to build a temple to the Lord. That prince discovered his intention to Nathan, who, not questioning but so pious a resolution must proceed from God, bid him execute what his heart prompted him to. But the night following, the Lord ordered Nathan to acquaint David, that this honour did not belong to David, but was reserved for his son and successor.

Several years after, when David had transgressed with Bathsheba, and had slain Uriah by the sword of the children of Ammon, the Lord sent Nathan to reprove him. Nathan acquitted himself of this duty in a very prudent manner, by a parabolical story of a rich man, who, having many flocks and herds of his own, yet, for the entertainment of a friend who was come to visit him, would force a lamb from a poor man, which was the only one he had. David had scarcely heard Nathan's story, before he exclaimed, the man is worthy of death! he shall restore the lamb four-fold. Then Nathan applied his parable to David himself, Thou art the man, &c. Thou hast taken by force the wife of Uriah, the Hittite, and him hast thou slain by the sword of the Ammonites. Therefore the sword shall not depart from thy house, &c. (2 Sam. xi. xii.)

David acknowledged his sin to the prophet, crying out, I have sinned against the Lord. Nathan, to comfort him, assured him that the Lord had mitigated his punishment, and that he himself should not die. But, because he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, his son, that was born of Bathsheba, should surely die. Bathsheba had a second son, called Solomon, and the Lord sent Nathan again to David, ordering him to call the name of the child Jedidiah, that is, beloved of the Lord. Probably on this occasion God declared to David, that Solomon should be his successor; that he should build him a temple, and should be the heir of the promises made to him. (2 Sam. vii. xii. &c.)

David being arrived at a great age, Adonijah, his son, began to take upon him the state and equipage of a king, in opposition to the interest of his brother Solomon. But neither the high-priest Zadok, nor the prophet Nathan, were in his interest. Adonijah gave a splendid entertainment to those of his own faction, at which Nathan, conceiving some jealousy, immediately repaired to Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, and bid her, at the peril of her own life, and that of her son, to follow his counsel. Go presently to king David, and say to him, O my lord the king, have you not sworn to me, that Solomon my son should succeed to the crown? Why, then, does Adonijah reign? While you are saying this, I will come in and confirm what you say. Bathsheba adopted this advice; and while she was yet speaking to the king, Nathan comes, and, being admitted, said to him, O my lord the king, have you appointed Adonijah to be your successor? Have you not often declared to me, that Solomon should be your successor? Then David caused Zadok the high-priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, to be sent for, and commanded them, with the prophet Nathan, to anoint Solomon king of Israel.

The time and manner of Nathan's death are not known. It is said, (1 Chron. xxix. 29.) that Gad and Nathan wrote the history of David. The same prophets had also regulated with David the order and disposition of the ministers of the temple. Lastly, that Nathan and Ahijah of Shilo had written the history of Solomon. (2 Chron. ix. 29.) Under the reign of Solomon we find mention made of Azariah and Zabud, sons of Nathan, who had considerable employments at court; but whether this was Nathan the prophet, is not said. (1 Kings iv. 5.)

NATHAN'AEL, נתנאל, signifies gift of God. Nathanael was a disciple of our Lord Jesus Christ. Philip, meeting Nathanael, told him, We have found the Messiah, described by Moses and the prophets, in Jesus of Nazareth, son of Joseph. Nathanael asked him, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? Philip bid him come and see. Jesus, seeing Nathanael coming towards him, says, Behold an Israelite indeed, without artifice or disguise. Nathanael asked him, How canst thou know me? Jesus answered, Before Philip called thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree. Nathanael then said to him, Master, thou art the Son of God, and the King of Israel. Jesus answered him, Dost thou believe because I saw thee under the fig-tree? Thou shalt see much greater things than these. (John i. 46, &c.; xxi. 2.)

Many have thought that Nathanael was the same as Bartholomew. The evangelists who mention Bartholomew, say nothing of Nathanael; and St. John, who mentions Nathanael, takes no notice of Bartholomew. We read at the end of St. John's Gospel, that our Saviour, after his resurrection, manifested himself to Peter, Thomas, Nathanael, and the sons of Zebedee, as they were fishing in the lake of Gennesareth. We know no other circumstances of the life of this holy man. Some believe he was the bridegroom at the marriage of Cana in Galilee.

NATIVITY OF CHRIST. The vulgar day of our Lord's nativity, December 25, though an early tradition, as appears from the Apostolical Constitutions, was not established till the time of the emperor Constantine, who died A.D. 337, and it was enacted, probably, about the council of Nice, A.D. 325, by the Roman church, and adopted by the Greek church ten years after, at Constantinople. At that time it was separated from the Epiphany, held on the 6th of January; but the Greek church had hitherto celebrated the Nativity and the Epiphany on the same day, supposing, as was natural, that the birth of Christ, and the first appearance of the star, happened on the same day. The church of Rome separated them, under the pretext, that the second appearance of the star to the Magi, in the way to Bethlehem, was holier than the first; but in reality to multiply holidays. This occasioned great discontents at Constantinople, when introduced there by Gregory, the theologian, from Rome, the citizens murmuring at the separation, and saying to him, 'you have divided the feast, and involved us in polytheism!' This was an early objection against the church of Rome.

The true cause of their fixing on the 25th of December is thus, perhaps, best explained by Sir Isaac Newton: 'The times of the birth and passion of Christ, with such like niceties, being not material to religion, were little regarded by the Christians of the first age. They who began first to celebrate them, placed them in the cardinal points of the year; as the annunciation of the Virgin Mary on the 25th of March, which, when Julius Cæsar corrected the calendar, was the vernal equinox; the feast of John the Baptist on the 24th of June, which was the summer solstice; the feast of St. Michael on September 29th, which was the autumnal equinox; and the birth of Christ on the winter solstice, December 25th; with the feasts of St. Stephen, St. John, and the Innocents, as near it as they could place them: and because the solstice, in time, removed from the 25th of December to the 24th, the 23d, and the 22d, and so on backwards; hence some, in the following centuries, placed the birth of Christ on December 20th, and at length on December 25th; and, for the same reason, they seem to have set the feast of St. Thomas on December 21st, and that of St. Matthew on September 21st. So, also, at the entrance of the sun into all the signs of the Julian calendar, they placed the days of other saints; as the conversion of St. Paul, on January 25th, when the sun entered Aquarius; St. Matthias, on February 25th, when he entered Pisces; St. Mark, on April 25th, when he entered Taurus; Corpus Christi, on May 26th, when he entered Gemini; St. James, on July 25th, when he entered Cancer; St. Bartholomew, on August 24th, when he entered Virgo; Simon and Jude, on October 28th, when he entered Scorpio; and if there were any other remarkable days in the Julian calendar, they placed the saints upon them; as St. Barnabas on June 11th, where Ovid seems to place the feast of Vesta and Fortuna, and the goddess Matuta; and St. Philip and St. James on the 1st of May, a day dedicated both to the Bona Dea, or Magna Mater, and to the goddess Flora, and still celebrated with her rites. All which shows that these days were first fixed in the Christian churches by mathematicians, at pleasure, without any ground in tradition; and that the Christians afterwards took up with what they found in the calendars.'

Hospinian, a learned German antiquary, is of opinion, that the Christians at Rome did not celebrate the 25th of December, as thinking Christ was then born, but to make amends for the Heathen Saturnalia; which was a season of great festivity, beginning December 16th, and continuing three days, but usually prolonged to the end of the week, on account of the succeeding feast of the Sigillarii.

To determine the true day of Christ's birth, as Scaliger says, belongs to God alone, not man. Of all the various conjectures that have been proposed, the most probable are, either, 1. that 'Christ, our passover,' was born about the time of the vernal equinox, when the Passover was celebrated; or, 2. about the autumnal equinox, at the celebration of the feast of tabernacles, when the Word became flesh, and tabernacled among us (John i. 14.); or, 3. on the great day of atonement, the 10th day of the seventh month, as 'a faithful high-priest, in things pertaining to God, to make atonement for the sins of the people, (Heb. ii. 17.) to be himself a propitiation for our sins, and not for our's only, but also for those of the whole world.' (1 John ii. 2.) Dr. Hales observes, that if this last, which is adopted by Usher, should be preferred, it gives a peculiar emphasis to the declaration of the angel to the shepherds on the night of the nativity (Luke ii. 10—14.); and that either of the two last epochs agrees better than the first, with the prevailing traditions respecting the duration of Christ's ministry. See CHRISTMAS. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 196—199.

NAZARENES', Christians converted from Judaism, whose chief error consisted in defending the necessity or expediency of the works of the law, and who obstinately adhered to the practice of the Jewish ceremonies. The name of Nazarenes, at first, had nothing odious in it, and it was often given to the first Christians. The fathers frequently mention the Gospel of the Nazarenes, which differs in nothing from that of St. Matthew, but was afterwards corrupted by the Ebionites. These Nazarenes preserved this first Gospel in its primitive purity. Some of them were still in being in the time of Jerome, who does not reproach them with any errors. They were very zealous observers of the law of Moses, but held the traditions of the Pharisees in the greatest contempt.

The word Nazarene was given to Jesus Christ and his disciples; and it is commonly taken in a sense of derision and contempt in such authors as have written against Christianity.

NAZARETH, נָצְרֶת, Nazareth, signifies guarded, or flourishing. Nazareth was a little city of Zebulun, in Lower Galilee, west of Tabor, and east of Ptolemais. Eusebius places it fifteen miles from Legio, east. This city is celebrated for having been the residence of Jesus Christ, during the first thirty years of his life. (Luke ii. 51.) Here our Saviour became incarnate, here he lived in obedience to Joseph and Mary, and from hence he took the name of a Nazarene. After he had begun his mission, he preached here sometimes in the synagogue. (Luke iv. 16.) But because his countrymen had no faith in him, and were offended at the meanness of his origin, he did not many miracles there, nor would he dwell in it. (Matt. xiii. 54. 58.) He, therefore, fixed his habitation at Capernaum during the latter part of his life. (Matt. iv. 13.) The city of Nazareth was situated upon an eminence, and on one side was a precipice, whence the Nazarenes one day had a design of throwing down our Saviour, because he upbraided them with their unbelief. (Luke iv. 29.)

Nazareth, says D'Arvieux, is about eight leagues from Acre. It is situated at the foot of a mountain, and is surrounded on all sides by hills and mountains, leaving a little valley between them, full of thistles and pebbles. This town is inhabited only by a few religious of the Holy Land, and by some poor Christians in their service, or dependent on them. The place is shown where stood the house of the Holy Virgin; but the house itself, say the Catholics, is at Loretto. Both Turks and Christians have a great veneration for the sacred precincts, and pray to the Virgin. The place where the synagogue stood, in which our Saviour preached, is shown.

Nazareth, says Dr. E. D. Clarke, who visited it in 1801, is a small town or village, situated upon the side of a barren rocky elevation, facing the east, and commanding a long valley. Its inhabitants, unable to sustain the burdens imposed on them by Djeddar Pasha, were continually emigrating to other territories. The few who remained were soon to be stripped of their possessions; and when no longer able to pay the tribute exacted from them, no alternative remained, but that of going to Acre, either to work in the fortifications, or to flee their country. The town was in the most wretched state of indigence and misery; the soil around might bid defiance to agriculture; and to the prospect of starvation were added the horrors of the plague.

In 1823, the population amounted to about 1200 persons, principally Christians.

Here are numerous reputed holy places to which pilgrims are conducted. There is a grotto which is said to have been the house of Joseph and Mary. The other objects of superstition at Nazareth, at every one of which indulgences are sold to travellers, are the following: 1. The Workshop of Joseph, which is near the convent, and was formerly included within its walls, and which is now a small chapel, perfectly modern. 2. The Synagogue, mentioned by D'Arvieux, in which Christ is said to have read the Scriptures to the Jews, (Luke iv. 16.) and which is at present a church. 3. A Precipice without the town, where they say the Messiah leaped down, to escape the rage of the Jews, after the offence which his speech in the Synagogue had occasioned. (Luke iv. 28, 29, 30.) Here they show the impression of his hand made as he sprang from the rock. From the description given by St. Luke, the monks affirm, that, anciently, Nazareth stood eastward of its present situation, upon a more elevated spot. The words of the Evangelist, however, are remarkably explicit, and prove the situation of the ancient city to have been precisely that which is now occupied by the modern town. Induced, by the words of the Gospel, to examine the place more attentively, Dr. E. D. Clarke, and those with him, went, as it is written, 'out of the city, unto the brow of the hill whereon the city is built,' and came to a precipice corresponding with the words of the Evangelist. It is above the Maronite church, and probably the precise spot alluded to by the text of St. Luke's Gospel. Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 164—179; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 605; Taylor's Sacred Geography.

NAZARITES, those under the ancient law who engaged by a vow to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquors, to let their hair grow, not to enter any house polluted by having a dead corpse in it, nor to be present at any funeral. If by accident any one should have died in their presence, they recommenced the whole of their consecration and Nazariteship. This vow generally lasted eight days, sometimes a month, and sometimes their whole lives. When the time of their Nazariteship was expired, the priest brought the person to the door of the temple, who there offered to the Lord a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a she-lamb for an expiatory sacrifice, and a ram for a peace-offering. They offered likewise loaves and cakes, with wine for libations. After all was sacrificed and offered, the priest, or some other, shaved the head of the Nazarite at the door of the tabernacle, and burnt his hair on the fire of the altar. Then the priest put into the hands of the Nazarite the shoulder of the ram roasted, with a loaf and a cake, which the Nazarite returning into the hands of the priest, he offered them to the Lord, lifting them up in the presence of the Nazarite. And from this time he might again drink wine, his Nazariteship being accomplished.

Perpetual Nazarites, as Samson and John the Baptist, were consecrated to their Nazariteship by their parents, and continued all their lives in this state, without drinking wine, or cutting their hair.

Those who made a vow of Nazariteship out of Palestine, and could not come to the temple when their vow was expired, contented themselves with observing the abstinence required by the law, and cutting off their hair in the place where they were; the offerings and sacrifices prescribed by Moses to be offered at the temple, by themselves, or by others for them, they deferred till a convenient opportunity. Hence it was that St. Paul being at Corinth, and having made the vow of a Nazarite, he had his hair cut off at Cenchrea, a port of Corinth, and deferred the rest of his vow till he came to Jerusalem. (Acts xviii. 18.)

When a person found he was not in condition to make a vow of Nazariteship, or had not leisure fully to perform it, he contented himself with contributing to the expence of the sacrifices and offerings of those who had made, and were fulfilling, this vow; and by this means he became a partaker in such Nazariteship. When St. Paul came to Jerusalem, A.D. 58. (Acts xxi. 23, 24.); St. James, with other brethren, said to him, That, to quiet the minds of the converted Jews, he should join himself to four persons, who had a vow of Nazariteship, and contribute to their charges and ceremonies; by which the new converts would perceive that he did not totally disregard the law, as they had been led to suppose.

However, most of those who think the vow (Acts xviii. 18.) applicable to St. Paul, admit that this vow was not one of Nazariteship, since the obligation of it could be fulfilled only in Jerusalem, and it is not probable that Paul would have bound himself voluntarily by any such ritual ceremony. And as to Acts xxi. 23. the subject of the passage is a vow not undertaken voluntarily, but by the advice of the apostles. It would seem, therefore, rather to have been a civil vow; and this is the opinion of Salmasius, who observes, that such vows were often undertaken by the Jews; as, for instance, when travelling, not to shave their heads before they arrived at a certain place. Such also were the vows, or anathemas, by which they bound themselves not to take food or drink till they had effected something which they purposed. (Acts xxiii. 14.) Such too were undertaken after recovery from a disorder, or being delivered from any other peril or calamity.

Several interpreters appear more rightly to follow the Vulgate and St. Chrysostom (Acts xviii. 18.); and by removing the stop after Ἀκύλας, to refer the word κείραμενος, &c. to Aquila, who seems to be the person bound by the vow. This mode of interpretation is favoured by the construction; and by it, moreover, all the difficulties attendant on the hypothesis, which supposes Paul to be the subject of these words, are removed. We are not, however, with Grotius, Hammond, Schleusner, and others, to understand a vow of Nazariteship; but, as Alberti, Heumann, and Heinricks, maintain, a civil vow, undertaken by Aquila, either on account of deliverance from sickness or other peril, or on account of something good which happened to him.

The Hebrew word Nazir, or Nazarite, is used to designate a man exalted to great dignity, as it is said of the patriarch Joseph (Gen. xlix. 26. Deut. xxxiii. 16.); that he 'was separate from his brethren.' The Vulgate and others understand the Hebrew, 'that he was as a Nazarite among his brethren.' This is variously interpreted. Some think that the Hebrew word signifies one who is crowned, chosen, separated, distinguished. Nezer in Hebrew signifies a crown. The Septuagint translate, a chief, or him that is honoured. Calmet thinks that this was a term of dignity in the courts of eastern princes; that at this day, in the court of Persia, the word Nezir signifies the superintendent general of the king's household, the chief officer of the crown, the high steward of his family treasures and revenues; and that in this sense Joseph was the Nazir of the court of Pharaoh. Le Clerc translates the Nazir, a prince, and calls Joseph the 'prince of his brethren;' and Mr. Poole declares in favour of this translation. Bloomfield's Recensio Synoptica, vol. iv. pp. 605, 606.

NEBUCHADNEZ'ZAR, נבוכדנאצר, signifies tears and groans of judgment; otherwise, trouble or sorrow of judgment. This word is foreign from the Hebrew, and includes the name of the Babylonian god Nabo, or Nebo.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, NEEBUCHADREZZAR, NEBUCHADONOSOR, &c. king of Assyria, otherwise called SAOSDUCHINUS, began to reign at Nineveh in the year of the world 3335. In the twelfth year of his reign, in a set battle, he overcame Arphaxad, king of the Medes, in the plains of Ragau. Nebuchadnezzar sent to Cilicia, Damascus, Mount Libanus, Phœnicia, Judea, and the other nations adjoining, even to Ethiopia, to require them to acknowledge him as king, and to submit to his empire. But these people sent back his ambassadors with disdain, and slighted his menaces. Nebuchadnezzar, enraged, swore by his throne that he would be revenged; and in the thirteenth year of his reign he assembled his chief officers, and acquainted them with his resolution of bringing the whole earth under his government. He appointed Holofernes his generalissimo, gave him his instructions, put large sums of money into his hands, and sent him with a great army to reduce all those nations. See JUDITH. Nebuchadnezzar, otherwise Saosduchinus, had Saracus or Chynaladan for his successor, in the year of the world 3356.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, otherwise NABOPOLASSAR, was father of Nebuchadnezzar the Great, so much celebrated in Scripture. Nabopolassar was a Babylonian, and Saracus, king of Assyria, gave him the command of his army. He made a league with Astyages, otherwise called Ahasuerus, who gave his daughter Amyitis in marriage to Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar. Ahasuerus and Nabopolassar, joining their forces, revolted against Saracus, king of Nineveh, besieged him in his capital, took him prisoner, and upon the destruction of the Assyrian monarchy raised two kingdoms; that of the Medes possessed by Astyages or Ahasuerus, and that of the Chaldæans, or of Babylon, founded by Nabopolassar, in the year of the world 3378.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the Great, son and successor of Nabopolassar, succeeded to the kingdom of Chaldæa, in the year of the world 3399. Some time previously to this, Nabopolassar had associated him in the kingdom, and sent him to recover Carche-ish, which had been conquered from him four years before, by Necho king of Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar having been successful, marched against the governor of Phœnicia, and Jehoiakim king of Judah, who was tributary to Necho king of Egypt. He took Jehoiakim, and put him in chains, in order to carry him captive to Babylon; but afterwards he left him in Judea, on condition of paying a large tribute. He took away several persons from Jerusalem; among others, Daniel, Annaniah, Mishael, and Azariah, all of the royal family, whom the king of Babylon caused to be carefully instructed in the language and in the learning of the Chaldeans, that they might be employed at court. (Dan. i. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

Nabopolassar dying about the end of the year of the world 3399, Nebuchadnezzar, who was then either in Egypt or in Judea, hastened to Babylon, leaving to his generals the care of bringing to Chaldæa the captives whom he had taken in Syria, Judea, Phœnicia, and Egypt; for, according to Berosus, he had subdued all these countries. He distributed these captives into several colonies, and in the temple of Belus he deposited the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and other rich spoils.

Jehoiakim, king of Judah, continued three years in fealty to king Nebuchadnezzar; but, being then weary of paying tribute, he threw off the yoke. The king of Chaldæa sent troops of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who harassed Judea during three or four years; at last Jehoiakim was besieged, and taken in Jerusalem, put to death, and his body thrown to the birds of the air, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. See JEHOIAKIM.

In the mean time, Nebuchadnezzar being at Babylon, in the second year of his reign, had a mysterious dream, in which he saw a statue composed of several metals, a head of gold, a breast of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet half of iron, and half clay; and a little stone, rolling by its own impulse from the mountain, struck the statue, and broke it. This dream gave him great uneasiness; yet afterwards he forgot it, and could not recover the least notion of it. He ordered all his diviners and interpreters of dreams to be sent for, but none could tell him the dream, or the interpretation. Nebuchadnezzar, in wrath, ordered them all to be put to death, which was about to be put in execution, when Daniel was informed of it. He went immediately to the king, and desired him to respite the sentence a little; and he would endeavour to satisfy the king's desire. God in the night revealed to him the king's dream, and also the interpretation, to the following effect:—Yourself, said Daniel, are represented by the golden head of the statue. After you, will arise a kingdom inferior to yours, represented by the breast of silver; and after this another still inferior, denoted by the belly and thighs of brass. After these three empires (the Chaldeans, Persians, and Greeks) will arise a fourth denoted by the legs of iron (the Romans). Under this last empire God will raise a new one, of greater strength, power, and extent, than all the others. This last is that of the Messiah, represented by the little stone coming from the mountain, and overthrowing the statue.

Then the king raised Daniel to great honour, set him over all the wise men of Babylon, and gave him the government of that province. At his request, he granted to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, the oversight of the works of the same province of Babylon.
